in particular of your Honours
gratefull acceptance of the meafeare, and enabled my weake faculties to adde this vnto the rest of my oblations, which I consecrate vnto your LL. vp-on the Altar of my deuotion. I must confesse that your fa-uorable reception of my French and Netherland Histories hath added courage to my will, to passe the Pyrennee Moun-

which I held (in my weake judgement) for many respects, as worthie the knowledge of our Nation, as any other. It is diuers Princes, are vnited; being collected out of all the best authors that haue written of that subiect. These considerations I say, were the inspiring meanes to moue me to vnder- take the traduction of this Historie of Spaine, and haue giuen me resolution, and constancie to finish it, and to send it forth to the view of the world. The worke I hope will giue good content, it being a faithfull relation of so many variable and strange accidents as haue happened in those Countries, during the manie alterations and changes of that State, and the long and cruell wars betwixt the Moores & Spaniards. If I, in my plaine maner of translation, haue not giuen it that grace which a more eloquent penne might haue done, I most humbly craue pardon, and intreat that my desire to benefit others, may giue satisfaction for my disability and defects. I haue presumed to shroud the fruites of my poore endeours, vnder your LL. countenance and protection; desiring to leaue a testimonie to all posteritie how much I am

To the Reader.

Gentlemen, in the last edition of the Historie of France, I did willingly omit all matters acted by the Spaniards, wherein the French were not principally interessed, hauing then a resolution to make the Histories of those countries distinct and priuat. And for that I would not leave you long in suspense, I promised within the yeare to publish this Historie of Spaine: wherein (notwithstanding my publike seruice, and many other difficulties) I haue forced my selfe to keepe my word, and to giue you satisfaction, though it be with some preiudice to my health. I will not vse many complements in the behalfe of the Author, his worke shall plead for himselfe: This Historie was written by a Frenchman, who is yet liuing, a man of grauitie and iudgement: It is no translation, but a collection out of the best writers that haue treated of that subiect. his chiefe Authors were Stephen Garebay, Ierome Surites, Mariana, Ambrose Morales, Iohn Valsee a Fleming, with many other Spanish, Italian & Latin writers: out of all which he hath compyled this worke, and as it were vnitied and tyed together the discourse of all these realmes with a continued style, by reason of the warre, accords, marriages, and other treaties and alliances which they haue had common among them: yet hath he so distinguished them, as seeing them all, you may easily read any one seuerally by it selfe, by the direction of notes and inscriptions set in the margent at euerie section or breach, whereby you may choosethat belongs to Nauarre, Portugall, Castille, or to any other of those realmes, and read the Historie apart from the beginning to the end.

The antiquitie of this Spanish Nation (whereof he hath breiefely made mention in the beginning of the first Booke) he confesseth to be obscure and vncertaine, and the writers thereof ignorant or negligent, so as it may be his discourse agreeth not with some authors which treat of the same men of whom he maketh mention, as of Hercules, Cacus, Gerion, Denis, and such like; but he pleads thus much for himselfe, that he could not contemne nor reiect the Spanish authors which haue so written of them, the which are to be receiued as obserued and produced by them. This Historie comes but to the winning of the Terceres, which was in the yeare 1583; he hath finished the rest vnto these times, I my selfe haue seene it in his studie at Paris, but he hath not yet put it to the Presse, so as I haue bene constrained, in the continuance thereof, to helpe my selfe out of the best that haue written of these later times, wherein I haue been assisted by some worthy gentlemen in the relation of some great actions, and haue continued the Historie, rie, unto my Lord Admirals returne out of Spaine. You must not hold it strange, if you find a great part of Philip the seconds raigne barren of any great actions done in Spaine: his chiefe designes were against forcine States, employing his bravest men abroad, either against France, England, or the United Prouinces, at the Indies, or at Sea; all which actions are either related here, or in their distinct Histories.

I must aduertise the Reader, that, from the yeare 1530, I have not directly followed my Author, for I haue both inserted diuers things out of other Authors, whereof he makes no mention, and haue related some more at large then he hath done, for your better satisfaction, as I haue found them written in other approved Authors. My last suit must be for my selfe and the Printer, yet will I not vse any great circumstances to captivate your fauors in mine owne behalfe: my stile (I confesse) is plaine and barsh; it were folly (nay madnesse) in me to seeke to conceale it, being so well knowne unto you: yet let me intreat so much fauor at your hands, that as I haue spent my spirits to giue you content, so you will spare your spleenes, and censure fauorably, untill you come to the like tryall: then shall you find, that either by your owne mistaking, or by the errors of the Presse you shall haue iust cause to sue for the like grace; which is, to supply all escapes and errors with your iudicious reading. And so I rest

Yours,

He beginning and antiquitie of nations farre fetcht, is alwaies fabulous: for most of them that haue vndertaken to write histories, either generall, or particular of some one nation, haue thought it expedient (for their reputations) to offer a perfect worke unto the world; and not to passe any season without some memorie of them of whom they write: imagining that the studious Reader would hold it an argument of their loth or negligence, to leaue any thing in blank. And therefore when as they wanted the testimonie of graue authors, they haue countenanced their owne imaginations; or haue imitated the fabulous inuentions of others, employing their time, toyle, and eloquence in vaine things: wherein they may hap-

ly fatisie some curious heads, but not such as desire to leame. For as a lye cannot be so disguised, but either the conference of ages doth discouer it; or a spirit knowing the force and effect of things created, doth reject it; or the religious condemne it, as it is fit; when it shal once appeare that the author of any historie hath supposed things doubtfull and vncertaine, for true, thereby to enlarge his volumes. He that is studious, and loth to loose his time, growes discontented, tened, and reads it with distast. Wherefore men of best judgement, hold, that the subject of a historie is truth, in serious matters, and worthy to be imparted to posteritie; giving libertie to them that write, to season the examples with praise or blame: observing the rewards & punishments which have followed, without respect of persons, or yielding to any passion, either of loue or hatred, but stirred vp by the merits of vertue, or the horror of vice; to the end that such as read their writings, may be encouraged by the worthy acts of some, to liue virtuously, and deterred by the dishonour and vnfortunat successe of others, from all bad affections: and the rather, for that they do therein find imitable steps of vertue. And for that the memorie of many things is buried in obliuion, or miscaried, they have not been so strict, as to forbid them that find themselves ingaged in the defars and obscuritie of the antiquitie of nations, to observe some steps, and go by probable conjectures, to a way passable. This is allowed them, so as they doe it by constraint, and with judgement; remembering, that a good huntsman can judge of a wolues footing from a dogs, which are something like.

The historie of Spaine, which were solue to write, is herein defective, as in a manner all others be: for before the coming of the Carthaginians into that country, and the wars of the Romans, it cannot be directly said, by what people Spaine was held, nor at what time, nor by what policie it was gouerned, but by ill grounded conjectures. For of the acts of the first men which were disperfed vpon the face of the earth after the deluge, we haue no author but Moses, who is carefull to describe the estate and succession of the Hebrewes, in that chiefly which concerns the establishing of the Church of God. Of other nations he speaks but by occasion, and as God would doe good vnto this nation by them, or punish it for their ingratitude. Wee must not then seeke for any mention of Spaine or Spaniards in him. The Grecians had so little care of other nations, & haue so much respected their own, as they haue scarce vouchsafed to speake of them, but with contempt; and to amplyfie their own glorie, they haue sometimes fed the Latines with fables: who haue adorned and enriched their Rome and Italie, and haue had care to proclaime their getts, making vse (in regard of antiquitie) of Grecian fables, or of conjectures; as the moderne haue in like manner done. What can we then do in matters which are so doubtfull, but only touch these conjectures as farre as they shall seeme receivable: passing that slightly ouer, which the Historians haue written of our first Spaine, to the end we busie not our selues in a vaine labour more than is fit.

Wherefore, according to Iosephus report, and vpon their consciences which haue supposed vnto vs a Berosus, we say after many others, that Tubal, one of the sonnes of Japhet, otherwile called Tubal, or Iabel, is father to the Spaniards, although it be verie likely, that he neuer set foot in Spaine, being then a country without a name: but that from Armenia or the neighbour places, taking his way towards the North, he stayed in a region since called Iberia, situated vpon Mont Caucasus, which couers it from the North, betwixt the Caspian and Euxine seas: a country then inhabited by them which we call Georgians, whereas afterwards the Chalbises, or Alibes were, a name approaching to Iubales, as some would wrest it, changing some letters, as it happens in the corruption of tongues. These people were Smithes, handling yron, whereof the country abounds, and applying it by their art to many good vses. The descendants of Tubal in these places, were afterwards called Iberians, and the country Iberia, by some man of qualitie which caried that name, and whose memory they would preferre, as it is likely. From thence the most receivable authors doe maintaine, that the Iberians Spaniards parted some ages after Tubal, or Iabel, and that the people being so multiplied, as the country could not well feed them, nor containe them, a part of them were constrained either by force, or by casting of lots, to abandon the place, and seeke some new abode: the which hath bene ordinarie among all nations, and in all ages, but especially in the first age, when it was necessarie the world should be peopled and inhabited: and it is credible, that nature was at that time wonderfull fruitfull, God providing for the propagation of mankind. The common opinion is, that these Iberians haue wandered much, being arriued vpon the frontiers of the region whereof we treat, staid in the vallies of those mountaines, which were since called Pyrence, and that they did liue long there, finding them fit to entertaine them in their first inclination and breeding: for that country abounds in yron mynes as much as any in Europe; and therefore they found means wherewith to imploy themselves, and to feed, for that these mountains were full of all things wherof these new come men, and ill provided, had need, that

2 That there was either good religion, knowledge, gouernment, or any thing else, but great simplicitie, ignorance, and pouertie, we can hardly beleue: and wee persuade our selues, that ciuilitie, industrie, experience and knowledge of valour and profit of things, was taught them by necessitie, the mistresse of Artes, and by strangers which came into their country from Phenicia, Ægypt, Greece, Carthage, Gaule, and elsewhere; to whom they were for a long time a prey, and in the end they learned armes, and many other malicious practices, whereof they had the root in their hearts, but grossly planted. As for religion, wee shall find by this discouerie, that it was most barbarous and infamous among them. And who doubts, but the successe of Tubal did suddenly forget the true God, and his pleasing seruice, seeing this corruption did so soone enter among the sonnes of Sem, and namely those of the family of Heber, of whom the Eternall did frame his chosen people and his church. I will not busie my self to contradict them which beleeue, that their first language was that of the Biscanians in those times; discouering, that seeing it hath so long maintained it selfe in that propriety, and that it cannot be discerned that this tongue hath taken any tearms from other auncients, nor from other nations which inhabit about their country, with whom notwithstanding they conuerse and traffique, wee must beleue that there is something verie remarkable in this language, and thereby conclude, that it was one of the first tongues which did confound the builders of Babel, and by consequence the whole world, God being pleased to haue preserved in Spaine this note of the first inhabitants thereof. Admit it be so, and that the Bascogade, which the Biscanians at that time did vse, a part of Nauarre, and they of Alaua, are the first, or of greatest antiquitie vpon the frontiers of Spaine.

3 Let vs be no lesse difficult to beleuee the opinion of a certaine Spanish doctor, who maintains, That one of the nephewes of Sem, or else of Cham, called Sepharad, came along the coast of Affricke to the strait, and hauing crost it with great troupes, he did people the bankes of the Ocean and the Mediterranean seas, whereas the riuier of Guadaluquiber doth ingulph, grounded vpon that the Hebrews call the Spaniards Sepharadin, & that they may apply the beginning of many names of towns, riuers, islands, and mountains of the country, to the Hebrew, Caldee, and Syriack tongues; as Gaddir, Sepyla, Betis, Calpe, Auila, and the like. All this is not strange, although there were no danger to deriue these names from the Phenicians, who vied the Syrian tongue, and had great affinitie with the Hebrew which was vsed among the Lewes, a nation also of Syria: and to beleuee that they were brought into Spaine by the Tyrians and others which invaded those quarters, when they came to spoyle the treasures thereof. That Spaine hath alwayes from the beginning bene peopled in two severall parts, vpon the East and Pyrence mountaines by the Iberians of Asia, and Caucasians descending from Tubal; and towards the South at the strait, by Sepharad and his troupes, which came out of Syria and Affricke: and that of either side, as the people multiplied, they advanced farther into the country: we may vndoubtedly beleuee, that those of the Pyrence mountaines passing the vallies by little & little on the West side, did people such a part of the country as they gaue their name to the first nauigable riuier, and to the whole region, celebrating the memory of their native country, and of this Iberus, of whom they were named, whatsoeuer he were.

4 Among the most auncient captains or kings of this vagabond nation, they make mention of one Idubeda, of whom the mountaine of Iubalda, or Idubeda, might be named, whereof we will speake hereafter. Then they produce Brigus king or gouernor of these troupes, who began a ciuile gouernment, and built (as they say) many castles in Spaine, which caried the marks of his name, all in a manner ending in Briga, as Nemetobriga, Mitobriga, and such like, by reason whereof he caried painted in his standard a castle (although the skill to blaze Armes was not then well knowne;) and the authors of the Spanish antiquities say, That of him the assemblies of people were called Brigies, and afterwards Brigues, and Brigades: the which did so multiply vnder his gouernment and conduct, as they were forced to send whole armies out of the country, to seeke new habitations; whereof some of these Brigues coming into Thrace, and then into Asia, they brought the name of Brigie thither, the which since by corruption hath bene turned into Phrigia: and that Castille, now called Viegia, was in old time tearmed Brigia, and that the new Spanish tongue hath since turned it into Biegia, calling it Castille la Biegie, in stead of Briga. For my part I beleue, that this word Briga, was brought into Spaine by the Celtes, which did hold a great part of that country, for that it is of the language of the old Gauls, by the which was signified people, town, or assembly. Moreover, there were many townes in France, which had their names deriued from it; as the lake Brigantium vpon the Alpes, which is that of Constance at this present; and Brigantium, which is Briançon in Dauphine; the Latobriges neere vnto the Suisses, and others, whereas the Celtes did in old time inhabit. And if there were a king so named, it is verie likely he was a Gaule, capitaine of some troupe of Celtes, in whose time there were great alterations of people, and by consequence ambitious thefts, the best exercise the noble men then gaue themselves vnto. This is what may be spoken of this Briga.

After whom Tagus was famous, from whom it may bee the riuer Tayo tooke her ancient name. Hee following the steps of his predecessour, sent many superfluous and vnneccessarie troupes out of Spaine, to seeke new habitations, whereof some past into Asia.

Betis came after, who was also called Turditanus, hee gaue that name to the country which is betwene the holy Promontorie, now called Cape S. Vincent, and the riuer of Guadalquivir, the which was also called Betis: and in succession of time did communicat that name to a great part of the neighbour country, whereof they did afterwards name one of the chiefe provinces of Spaine. In regard of him that country vpon the strait towards the West and South, began to be famous, and knowne to strangers, especially to the Ægyptians, and other Africans, nations which were then mightie and warlike, and withall cunning and politike, good mariners, and abounding in ships, to whom the entrie into this part of Spaine did offer it selfe, and was more commodious than any other. And therefore the names of other inhabitants within the country, did for a long time after remaine obscured and vnknowne. They doe attribute some lawes and policie vnto this Betis, and the bringing in of some learning into Spaine, but what it was, is vnknowne.

To confirme that which is said, That in the reign of Betis strangers began to taste the riches and commodities of Spaine: Authors report, that presently after his death, a capitaine, mightie in shipping and men, came out of Affricke, landed in Turditanie, and seised thereon. Hee was a Libian, and was called Gerion, and by some Deabus, furnamed by the Greekes Chrysee, as one would say, of gold, or gilt; by reason of the treasures he gathered by violence and tyrannie. For knowing that Spaine was full of mynes of all sorts of mettals, he became curious to search for them, forcing the people to worke with such rigour, as if they had beene brute beasts; many fainting vnder their burthens, ended their miserable liues: so as the brute of his crueltie (an inseparable companion to couetousnesse) infected in a manner the whole earth, in places most remote, and was abhorred of all those that had any feeling of humanitie.

Ofiris Denis then reigned in Ægypt, who moued with pitie, and of a generous spirit, came into Spaine with a great armie of Ægyptians, Syrians, Arabians, and other neighbour nations, to ruine this detestable tyrant; whom he vanquished in battell, and slew: which is the first that was giuen in Spaine, that any mention is made of since the deluge. And for that he came neither to conquer, nor to enrich himselfe, being moued with a zeale of iustice, hauing settled the affaires of the country, he deliuered the feignorie of the Turditanians to three of his children, who had beene punished for his wickednesse, admonishing them not to follow the wretched auarice of their father, least their ends were like vnto his. Some Arabians Scenites of his troupe, would needs remaine in Spaine, to whom he assigned the country about Cape Saint Vincent.

Neere vnto it (and where as the riuer Anas disgorgeth it selfe) dwelt the Curetes, descended from Curis, nephew (they say) to Champ among the Tercenian, or Tartessian forests, which did run along the shore vnto the island of Gadir, then called Tartesse (in our time Calis: ) in which island Gerion was interred, the first of any dead bodie that was put in the ground in Spaine; for before the custome was to cast dead carcases into the sea, or into riuers, or to hang them vpon trees, or else they left them in the fields.

Ofiris left in this island a sister of his, called Erythree, who (it may be by one of these young Gerions) had a sonne called Noras, who (as some say) did build Nora, the first mansion in the island of Sardinia.

These

A These three young princes, who were called Lominians, were so like in face and manners, and did agree so well together, as the Poets haue fained, that they were but one king which had three bodies. They gouerned their subjects with more modestie than their father. Imagine that the feare of punishment kept them in awe, yet could they not so subdue their courages, but they fought all vnworthie means to reuenge their fathers death. Wherefore the seas being now open to the Turditanes, & commerce brought in from the West to the East, they had secret practises with Tiphon, whom they knew to be ambitious, and procured him to kill king Ofiris his brother, and to seise vpon the kingdome of Ægypt.

B the Ægyptian Apollo, Mars, & Oron: by him the Gerions Lominians receiued a worthie reward for their ingratitude. For hauing gathered together a great armie of diuers nations, he past into Spaine, whereas these three brethren were ready to make head against him: yet Hercules grieving that so much innocent blood should be spilt for the offence of three men, he offered to fight alone with them all three in single combats: which being accepted by the Gerions, they lost their liues. They say, that this passage of Hercules, was at the same time when as Jacob and his family went into Ægypt, or a little before. By this victorie Hercules was receiued and honoured of the Turditanes, and other Spaniards: who after that he had settled their affairs, and planted two pillars vpon the straits, the one in Europe, and the other in Affricke; and two others in the island, since called Gadir: which some hold were towers, and not pillars, for a marke and testimonie of his conquests and toyles, he tooke his course towards Italie, leaving the gouernment of Spaine to one of his captaines called Hispal, which some will haue to bee his sonne. They say also, that he left in those islands, which are now called Majorca and Minorca, a Gouernour called Balee, of whom they since tooke the name of Baleares: although that most men beleue they were so named, for that the inhabitants were expert in fliings.

Hispal remaining Gouernour of this part of Spaine, which is at the straits and thereabouts neere vnto the two seas (for as we haue said, those that liued within the country, had not felt much of these forraigne inuasions) he began a towne called by him Hispalis, since named Sevilla, and at this day Seuille.

Hispal succeeded him, a wife and an aduised man, and a louer of vertue, as they write of him: and we must beleue that he was some great personage (if there were euer any such in being) seeing the whole region whereof we treat hath retained his name, and preferred it in such sort as it hath not beene changed since. Others notwithstanding acknowledging in no sort this Hispal to be the author of the name which hath remained to Spaine, affirme, and it may bee not rashly, That it came of the people of Iberia in Asia, the which in old time was called Pana, of the name of one Pan, who gouerned there vnder his father Liber: and therefore this of Europe was indifferently called Iberia and Pana: but those that came after, corrupting the word, did adde some letters, and called it sometimes Spana, and sometimes Spania, as in truth the Latines did name it in the beginning, terming it Spania, and not Hispania. The Spaniards comming afterwards to imbrace the Roman tongue, added an E, and called it Espania, as they haue beene accustomed to do to all Latine words which begin with S, as Escala, Escala, Escribo, &c. and the like. These Iberians did also call themselves Abasgi, whereof it may bee came Basco, Basco, and Bascongado. Such as beleue that Hispal reigned in Spaine, say, That he was the first which tooke the royall diademe, and that he caused towers to bee built in the island of Tartesse, and in Galicia, which they call Phares, or Beacons, for the helpe of saylers: yet others hold with more reason, that that in Galicia, which is yet standing, was the worke of Ostianus Cæsar.

Hercules hauing done many great exploits in Italie, he left Atlas Kitin there to gouerne, carrying back his brother Hesperus, he returned into Spain, where he found Hispal deceased: wherefore he himselfe did gouerne it in person for many yeares, and dyed there, as they say. His bodie was buried in the island of Tartesse, where at that time the kings court was, in a sumptuous and stately tombe.

After him reigned Hesperus, brother to Atlas Kitin, of whose name they say that Spaine and also Italie were called Hesperies; that is, Italie Hesperia the great, and Spaine the later Hesperia, for that he reigned sometime both in the one and the other. But Atlas enuious of his brothers greatness, came with an armie and dispossessed him of the kingdome, forcing him to flie into Italie, from whence Hercules had brought him: where hee was well entertained, and raigned. The which Atlas vnderstanding, hee suffered him not long quiet, but returned into Italie with a good number of Spaniards, and chased him away; meaning to hold Italie as his royall fear, and Spaine as an accessarie, to draw gold, siluer, and all other commodities from thence.

Oris, Atlas parting from Spaine, he left the gouernment to Oris his sonne, who was called Sic Oris, Sic feruing as a fore-name. Of him they say the riuier Sicoris, now called Sigro, was named: the which passeth by Lerida, and falls into Ebro. But no man can tell vpon what occasion he was so called, nor how hee extended his limits thither, being so farre from the straits, and isle of Gadir.

Anus succeeded Oris, whom they also called Sicanus, and of his name the riuier of Guadiana tooke the auintent denomination. Wee must conjecture, that his predecessour Oris did establish some estate and principallitie, or made some fort and retreat about the riuier of Sigro, whereof this that succeeded him had the first gouernment: seeing they place along the banks thereof, the people which are called Sicanians, so named of this Sicanus, who it seemes were his souldiours, and the troups which he commaunded. Some of those bands hauing past into Italie, to helpe their country-men, which had bene led thither by Atlas Rittin, and hauing inhabited the countrey of the Latines (which is the territorie of Rome) they were there encountered by the naturall Italians. Passing on, they carried the name of Sicanians, into the island then called Trinacria, and since Sicile: into the which, they say, that Sicanus past in person, hauing in Italie fought with the Ligurians, Oenotrians, Lestrigons, and others: and that he was there encountered by the Cyclopes, cruell and barbarous men, who would not suffer the Sicanians to come and dwell in their island: but they were forced to yeeld.

Steeleus the sonne of Sicanus raigned in Spaine, after his father, and passed in like manner into Italie and Sicile, where he changed the former name, calling it Sicile, the which it holds. The occasion of his passage, was the controuersie betwixt Dardanus and Iafus, his cousins, sonnes to Electra the daughter of Atlas, for the rule of Italie; the which he reconciled. But Dardanus hauing afterwards slaine Iafus his brother treacherously, Steeleus pursued the reuenge so vehemently, as Dardanus was forced to abandon the countrey, and to go into Samo-thracia, and then into Asia, to seeke a new habitation. This mans raigne concurreth with the time that God sent plagues vpon the Egyptians, by Moses and Aaron.

Steeleus being dead, his sonne Lufus held the scepter of Spaine; of whose name some will haue Lusitania (a part thereof) to be called. He past also into Italie, and at his returne brought many Italians into Spaine. Where, after him, Plus, or Siculus, his sonne, raigned: whom they called Neptune, for that he entertained many ships and gallies at sea. He past, as his predecessors had done, into Italy and Sicile, to succour the Spaniards which were feared in those regions, against whom the Cyclopes and others of the countrey renewed the wars. After him many stranger thrust into Spaine, vpon diuers occasions, but for one only cause, which was, for spoyle, being easie to take, by reason of the simplicitie of the Spanish people.

Hee that shall consider duely hereof, will not thinke it to agree with that which we haue said before, as in truth it doth not: For if these kings (of whom we haue made mention since Atlas) which haue raigned, according to Historians and Cronickers, for two hundred and fiftie yeares, haue not onely had the meanes to defend Spaine from strangers, but to lead forth many armies, and to subdue the people of Italie and Sicile; to make themselves vmpiers of kings quarels, to build townes there, and to commaund the seas: and that from Spaine to Italie, and from Italie to Spaine, the passage and commerce was ordinarie: How could it be, that so soone after the death of Siculus, the Spaniards should grow so simple and vnwarlike, as if they had neuer seene armes? And that it was in the power of the first pyrat that came from Affricke, Phenicia, or Greece, to seise vpon it, and insult ouer them, without any resistance? Had they learned nothing? had they gotten no courage in so many warres which they had seene in Italie? What was become of those capitaines which these late kings had so happily employed? had they all cursed their countrey, or found some Lethe flood, to make them forget it, and to stay in Italie? Or if they were dead, did they leaue no discipline, nor any impression of vertue in their youth? It is not likely, and there-

A fore we must put all these discourses among idle tales, or find some meanes to vnfold this difficultie. Euery one hath free libertie to discourse: For my part I beleue, that these men which they say had reigned in Spaine since Atlas, haue bene Italians, acknowledging the Soueraignetie of Italie, and gouerning Spaine as a subdued Prouince: or else respecting onely their profit, they made voyages like vnto pyrats, shearing them to the bloud, and then carrying their spoyles into Italie, employing the lewest people in the countrey to oppress the rest; and in the meane time, through the fauour of some fort, which they did maintaine to assure their landing and their shipping, they caused themselves to be called Kings. Then seeing that the Spaniards (which had joynd with them to doe ill) did multiply too fast, or grew more cunning than was fit for their purpose, they found meanes to embarke them, and to send them into Italie vpon some vaine hopes, whereas being once arriued, there was no more any meanes to returne into Spaine. Such in my opinion were the armies which those kings led out of Spaine into Italie, that is, troups of theues, of whom they would be assured, that they should not conspire against them, nor take their practise from them, after they had instructed them in their trade. By these subtilie practises they did spoile Spaine both of men and treasure, holding the grosse and rude multitude in ignorance, and setting an opinion in them, that they were good men, and louers of justice; yea religious, for that they dealt in the pacifying of controuersies, which happened among the people, and sometimes they payed vowes, or made some superstitious dedication of a Temple or Chappell. I say moreover, That those which we haue before named were not alone, which made this worke in Spaine; but in their times, and whilst they were buisie in one part, other nations did the like in some other quarter of the countrey. So as it is no maruell, seeing the Spaniards had yet no meanes to see a lawfull and settled Estate among them, and that those which did gouerne them, had alwayes this affected end, to entertaine them in their simplicitie; an assured marke of Tyrants. So as the race of these men sayling, this poore nation was presently made subject to the first that did invade them, the children proouing as vnable as their fathers.

6 They report, That about that time some Greekes of the Island of Zante, in old time called Zacynthe, arriued vpon that coast whereas since the towne of Valencia was built, and there made a little fort, or store-houfe, for their traffique, the which they called Zacynthium; the which did since encrease in people and building, and became a good towne, from whence Sagunte had her beginning, renowned for the loyaltye of the citizens to the people of Rome, the beginning and for the occasion which shew gaue of the long and bloudie warres betwixt the Romanes and the Carthaginians, which they called the second Punicke warre. These Zacynthians trafficking with them of Iberia, which dwelt within the countrey, and were neighbours to the mountaines, did receiue from them gold and siluer, little esteemed by these simple men, for that these metalls grew in their countrey, giuing them in exchange trifles of small value: so, as growing rich in a short time, they published among the other Grecians, and among the nations of Asia, the fame, happinesse, and abundance of treasure in Spaine, inciting many thereby to goe and discover the countrey, and to attempt something. And for that (as we haue said before) religion hath alwaies bene a lure for cunning and malicious men to assure the simple, to whom they intend some mischief, these Zacynthians caused a goodly Temple to bee built to Diana, in the place which is now called Denia, according vnto some, but falsely, prouiding by that meanes and maske of religion, for their Zacynthium, which they had built vpon that coast, that by the reuerence of this Temple they might be assured from all violence.

7 In the meane time an Affrican called Tessa seized vpon Gadir, and of all the maine Tessa land thereabouts, calling himselfe king of Spaine. It may be that of his name they were called Contestans, which did inhabit along the banks of the Mediterranean sea, whereas Murcia and Carthage are at this present.

After him he left the gouernment to his sonne Romus, to whom they attribute the building of the towne of Valencia (yet Titus Livius doth not make it so ancient) the which was first called Rome, of his name, since by the Latines, holding this name to be Greece, they turned it in their language to Valencia, which was all one; for Rome in Greece, and Valencia in old Latine, is power and force.

In this kings time there came a pyrat into Spaine, well followed by men of his owne fort, who spoyle the whole countrey adjoining vnto the sea, and then hee returned with his spoyle, leauing an opinion of him, that hee was the father Liber Denis, or Bacchus: for the custome of those obscure times was, That great pyrats and heads of vagabond people (whereof the world did then abound) did take vpon them the names of great personages and famous men, who had gone before them, and whom foolish superstition had deified; giuing the people where they came to vnderstand, That they were gods, which came to visite them, to deliuer them from tyrants, and to doe them good; so as they were often deceived. By such fained deuices these Harpies found lesse resistance in their enterprises. It may be this Denis was the sonne of Semele, and nephew or grand child to Cadmus king of Thebes in Beoce, but not that great Denis, Conqueror of the Indies, who was much more auncient. They say, that he built the towne of Lebrissa (the which he called Nebrissa) vpon one of the chanelles of the river Betis; the which in those dayes fell into the sea with two gulfes. Nebros in Greeke is a Hynds calfe, with the skins whereof they did attire those that did celebrate the Bacchanalia. It was at the same time when as the Phenicians began to encroch much vpon the Spaniards, and to come with whole armies into their countrey, and to make their prey, as the Grecians, Egyptians, and others of Affricke did.

To Remus they make Palatua his sonne to succed him; who as they say was founder of the towne of Palenza: but there did rise a pettie king or captain against him, out of the mountaines, neere vnto the river Ebro, called Cacus Licinius, who in the end became master thereof, and Palatua was forced (being yet young) to fflye out of the countrey, and to sue for succours in vaine, begging his bread in a manner for many yeares, of forraigne princes and potentates. This Cacus was industrious, and the author of many subtilie inuentions; to purge and forge yron, and to fashion it to diuers instruments fit for the warre: for hee taught how to make breast-plates and other furniture for the defence of the bodie: and some beleue, that he had the art to make that infernall powder, which they vse for artillerie. For these inuentions, wherein he was very expert, he was celebrated by the Poets, as the sonne of Vulcan, the god of Forges. Palatua after that he had long slied in vaine to princes and townes, whereas hee expected some succours, to recouer his estate, hee resolu'd in the end to returne into Spaine, and to obserue, if the inconstancie of humane things had not prepared him some meanes to recouer his dignitie, and to chafe away his enimie: whereas hee arriued so happily, as the Spaniards, whether moued with pittie of his calamitie, or wearie of the others command, they receiued Palatua, and gaue him men and meanes to recouer his kingdom. So Cacus being dispossessed of that which he had held, fled into Italie, where they say that Hercules the Grecian slew him (whereof we will make mention) although that the author thereof doe not agree well vpon this point. There Cacus bred discord betwixt all the people and townes of Italie by his lewd practises.

Palatua being dead, the Tyrians of Phoenicia, who had now learned the way to Spaine, came with their king Erythree, and good store of ships, who giuing them to vnderstand, That he had bene commaunded by the Oracle to come and build a Temple to Hercules Libique, in the Island of Tartesse, that is, Calis; they were not onely receiued, but Erythree was also chosen king of that part of Spaine; who built a stately Temple in the Island to Hercules, changing the name thereof, and causing it to be called Erythree, or else renewed that name, which it might haue had from the sister of Orus aboue mentioned, or of the Erythreeans of the East, who followed Hercules Orus, which had dwelt there. To this Temple, which some hold was built vpon the maine land, where at this present Medina Sydonia stands, was due the tenths of all the thefts and spoyle of the West, by a perpetuall decree, the which was long obserued.

Of this king Erythree there is nothing more spoken: to whom they giue for successefour Gargoris, a Spaniard: he taught the people the vse of honey, and was therefore called Mielie. The chiefe force of this kings estate and others his predecessors, were the Curetes, a brutish and sauage people, dwelling in the Forrests of Tartesse, which contained a great part of the Ocean shore, from the holy Promontorie, or Cape S. Vincent, vnto the Island of Erythree.

In his time Hercules the Grecian, sonne to Alcmena, passed into Spaine, to whom the Greek Poets, and others that haue followed them, did attribute such prowesse, but falsely: for this

A this Hercules was but an insolent man, yet well beloued of the Grecian princes, by reason of his boldnesse and his strength of bodie fit to rob and steale, whereunto the nobilitie of that age was commonly addicted. The wealth of Spaine, which was so much spoken of in Greece and Asia, made him affect this voyage, after the first Trojan warre, against Laomedon. Having then gathered together all the pyrats and theuees he could, as well in Europe as in Asia, hee set saile, and coasting along Italie, hee landed in the place of Tuscane, which since hath bene called Port Hercules. From thence hee arriued in Sardinia, where hee found some few inhabitants, where hee left one Sardus, with some of the idle multitude that was in his armie. Of this Sardus, Sardinia tooke the name. Before hee passed on, hee made a great sacrifice vnto the gods, in a little Island, betwixt Corfica and Sardinia, the which for that cause doth still retain the name of Isle Hercules. Then hee directed his course towards the Islands of Baleares, then called Gymnades, whereas the inhabitants made some weake resistance with their slings: in the least of which Islands hee dedicated a Temple to Ianus, whereas since the towne of Ciuitella was built. Then continuing his voyage, hee toucht the Islands of Pituyfes, and gaue the name of Ebusa to the greater. In the end hee arriued vpon the maine of Spaine, whereas Dianes Temple was built, the which hee enriched with gifts, and did reuerence with sacrifices, for his prosperous voyage; and forthat Diana was held to be the goddesse which had care of trauelers. Then sayling along the coast, hee came through the strait into the Ocean, and to the Island of Erythree, where hee landed his armie vpon the firme land, and stayed there some few

C dayes to refresh his men; hee in the meane time honouring his Temple (whose name hee carried, and did challenge his acts) busied himselfe in making of playes and sacrifices. Hearing then that the Curetes and other Spaniards had put themselves in armes to fight with him, hee went to meet them, gaue them battaile, and did easily defeat them, repulsing them into their Forrests, out of the which they durst not fallie like enemies. This combat is supposed by the Poets for that of the Titans against their gods, faining, that the Herculeans were gods, and the Curetes and Spaniards the Titans.

After this victorie, the whole countrey was at Hercules deuotion: who imitating the auncient Hercules of Lybia, planted pillars in the straits; the one in Europe, the other in Affricke; enlarged the towne which was in the Island of Erythree, and left many Tyrians and Sydonians, which had followed him, there: and it may be it then tooke the name of Gadir, or Gades, which in the Phenician tongue signifieth a Terme, or Limit: and tearming himselfe a god, would haue all diuine honours done vnto him. And some hold, That it was hee which made a law, to pay the tenth of the enemies spoyle, and to offer them to Hercules Temple: at the least hee did exact it being in Spaine, that hee might haue part of other mens spoyle, and know the greatest theuees. This done, hee marched towards the Pyrene mountaines, spoyleing the coast vpon the Mediterranean sea, and drawing after him a great traine of all nations, which came at the bruit and fame of this great theefe, and the treasures of Spaine: Hee passed into Gaule, and from thence into Italie, polluting all good families where hee passed, as hee had bene accustomed to doe all his life time. The cause of his suddaine departure, was the news hee heard of the great preparation which the Grecian princes made, to warre against the Trojans, for the rape of Helena, whither hee was inuited by his friend Telamon of Salamine. Thus was Spaine in a short time beaten, and deliuered from a great scourge. Of this Hercules the Poets haue fained all that is written, of the conquests, prowesse, and trauels of many other Hercules, more auncient and better men than hee: hee was a Grecian, but not of Greece it selfe, but of that part of Italie which they call the great Greece, and of Tarentum, conceived in adultery by Alcmena, the wife of Amphitruon, a priuat man, and an vknowne father, bred vp at Thebes in Beoce, and nourished in theft, fornication, and execrable murders: a companion and counsellor to Iason, in the voyage of Colchis, at the spoyle of the treasures of Medea, and the rape of his daughter Medea: the author and executioner of the ruine and death of Laomedon king of Troy; whose daughter Hesione, a noble and innocent virgin, hee did prostitute to his companion Telamon, bold and hardie in all bad actions: so as hee purchased the name and reputation of a valiant captain, and was readily followed into Spaine by men of his owne fort, whereof there were store, and finding nothing left to steale in Asia.

As hee carried away many bad persons when hee went into Spaine, so hee left others of diuers nations behind him, who built cities and townes, or finding some of their countrey men already alreadie ſeated, planted themſelves among them. Calpe, which was called Heraclea was then built. In this paſſage alſo, Barcinon, ſo named of fifthermens Cabbins, made of oyziers, which were fiſt there, was enriched with a Temple, which this Hercules cauſed to be built to Iupiter. Turiaſſo neere vnto Montcaio, was the Tyrians worke; Aulonſia the Italians, it is now called Vic: Ilerda, now Lerida, the Illyrians, and others of other nations, whereof Hercules army was compoſed. To Dianes Temple (which the Zacynthians had begun before his coming) there were (by him, or by the Zacynthians of his companie) great beames of Iuniper ſet; the which were ſpared by Hanniball when as he ruined thoſe places, and continued vnto the time of the Roman Emperors. There remained many other marks of this paſſage long after in Spaine.

As for Gargoris, who was king, he recovered his authoritie with great difficultie, and kept it with more paine; yet he reigned many yeares, and left the realme to his grand child, which his daughter had by ſtealth: wherewith Gargoris was ſo much offended, as he cauſed this child to be left in the fields, to be deuoured of wild beaſts; the which, by the will of God, did not only leaue him vntoucht, but did alſo nourish him with their vrine: whereof the old man being aduertified, he commaunded him to be laid in the high wayes, that oxen, horſes, hogs, and ſuch like going and coming, might tread him vnder their feet: yea, he cauſed him to be preſented to famiſhed maſtiues, which had bin kept hungry of purpoſe: but he was ſtill preferred by the fauor of heauen; and the brute beaſts (more kind than his grandfather) turned from the infant, and did not hurt him. In the end, this cruell man not content to put the poore child to an ordinarie death, he cauſed him to be carried far into the Ocean ſea; yet could not his deſire ſucceed: for the infant was caſt by the waues vpon the ſands, whereas a hynd hauing newly calued, was ſo farre in loue with it, as ſhe forgot her own fruit, and nourished the child, vntill he grew great, and got his liuing in the woods and rocks, feeding vpon wild fruits; who in the end grew ſtrong, and ſo actiue, as he ran as ſwiftly as any ſtagge. He was often ſcene, and purſued by the huntſmen of the cuntry, who could not conceiue what it was; yet they layd fo many ambuſhes, as in the end they tooke him, and preſented him vnto Gargoris their king: who hauing carefully conſidered and viewed the countenance of this ſavage priſoner, he was of opinion, that it was his grand child: whereof he was the better aſſured by certaine marks which he had made vpon his bodie, and cauſed him to be attended on as his Eſtate required; then dying, he left him heire of his realme of Spaine: where he ſhewed himſelfe wiſe, vertuous, and a louer of the good of men, notwithstanding that he had bin bred vp among wild beaſts in his youth. For they ſay he made politicke lawes, and taught them to tyll the land; accuſtomed the barbarous people to a more ciuile life, and fought the meanes to better the fruits of the earth by manuring, remembering his hard and rough breeding in his younger yeares. Hee is called by Albin, Habidus, or Habis, by others Habidus, or Habis. He appointed exerciſes for the Spaniards, and diuided the people into ſeuen townes or cantons.

8 After him there is no mention of any kings in Spaine for many ages: which giues ſome occaſion to conjecture, that they erected many Commonweales; or that this region lay open to the inuaſion of many ſtrangers, which came from diuers parts; namely, after the deſtruction of Troy, which happened in the time of this Habidus; in whole life time certaine Celtes coming out of Gaule, came into Iberia, where they had long and ſharpe warre againſt the inhabitants of the cuntry, with whom they would ſhare their lands; & in the end forced the Iberians to receiue them, and to contract alliances with them, giuing them their daughters in marriage: and ſo communicating both ayre, cuntry, and names with them, they made of two nations one, which was called Celtiberian, and the cuntry of Celtiberia; which is, all that lyes betwixt the Pyrennee mountaines and the riuer of Ebro. Other Celtes and Gauls had paſſed farther into Spaine; it may be, before the Iberians came there, and had run beyond the riuer of Ebro, vnto the Weſt Ocean, where they had held a part of Portugal and Betica; in which provinces they did alſo carry the names of Celtes, Celtiques, Galates, and Gallicians, and there did build townes. Ephorus (for that the Celtes did hold all that North part of Spaine, and part of Portugal) extended Gaule vnto the Iſland of Gades. Habis reigned yet, when Elna, a towne in the cuntry of Roſſillon, was firſt founded; the which ſome haue ignorantly written, was named by Helene, mother to Conſtantine the Great, or built by her grand child Conſtans.

Many Grecians in thoſe times came into Spaine, among the which (as they ſay) was Tener, the ſonne of Telamon, who (hauing beene chaſed away by his father, and after his death excluded

A cluded from the ſucceſſion) landed whereas now Carthage now ſtands, and ſo paſſed on into Galicia. They attribute vnto him the foundation of the towne of Salamanca; a name which commeth neere vnto that of Salamina, where Tener was borne: yet ſome affirme, That in auncient time it was called Elmantica, and more properly. Diomedes alſo came into Spaine with certain Aetolians, and they hold, that the towne of Tude vpon Myrio was his worke, for Tude, that this name hath ſome affinity with Tydeus, the father of Diomedes. Aſtur, who was coachman to king Memnon (no ſmall office in thoſe dayes) being come with the Grecians into this Region, gaue the name vnto the Aſturians, and to the towne and riuer of Aſtorga. Some Aſturia maintaine, That Liſbon, Olyſſippo or Vlyſſippo, hath bene built by Vlyſſes, and in it a Temple to the goddeſſe Pallas. Of Mneſthem of Athens (to whom there were diuine honours conferred after his death) was named the port of Mneſthee, neere vnto Gades. Finally, infinite Grecians, which could not or would not returne into their cuntry, after the deſtruction of Troy, came into Spaine, and erected many petty Eſtates: and among them there were many other nations, who had ſome ſtrength at ſea, and were expert in nauigation, but at diuers ſeaſons, and very vncertaine; as the Thracians, whereof the towne of Veta, or rather that of Almerie, Almeria, giue ſome teſtimonie: for in old time it was called Abdera, as another which was in Thrace. The Rhodians did build the towne of Roſes, now deſart, at the foot of the Pyrennee mountaines, Reſta, whereas the Conſull Cato firſt landed, when hee came to make warre in Spaine. Theſe men taught the Spaniards the vſe of hand-mylles, and to coyne money. The Phocians of Aſia did build Marſeille, and founded the towne of Empurias, which in like manner is now ruined. It was in auncient time inhabited by three kinds of people, of diuers manners and languages, diuided by wals, and liuing in continuall jealousie one of another, which were naturall Spaniards. Theſe Phocians, and afterwards Romans, which were added by Iulius Ceſar, who hauing reduced Spaine vnder his obedience, and chaſed away Pompeys children, and their faction, made one bodie of theſe three nations, and a towne well vnitied. The Mileſians and the Caryſtians came alſo to inhabit there; and the Leſbians iſſued from the Maſſagetes, to whom they attribute the foundation of Concauo, Caſtulo, at this preſent Caſlona, in old time a great towne, and the limit of two gouernments of Spaine: vnder the Romane Empire it was called Pamaſia; which maketh ſome thinke, that they of Phocide in Europe were the founders, for that Pamaſſus hill is in their cuntry. Then came the Phrygians, which were extract (as ſome ſay) of Spaine and the Egyptians, vnder the leading of a capitaine called Tarracon, of whom the towne of Tarracone tooke the name. Hauing taken great ſpoyles along the Mediterranean ſhore, he went and payed the tenths of his thefts to Hercules temple at Calis, according to the auncient order. He had a nobleman of the cuntry, whoſe name was Teron, that oppoſed himſelfe, but he could not hinder him from ſpoyling of the cuntry: For in truth the Spaniards, vntill the warres betwixt the Romanes and the Carthaginians, had no commendation to bee good warriors, in regard of other nations. When as the Egyptian was gone, Teron demanded of the Gaditanes the offerings which this theefe had made vnto their Temple, as taken away by violence and iniuſtice: whereunto the Gaditanes oppoſed themſelves, and did ſo well defend the rites of their god, as they ſlew Teron, and defeated his men in a battaile at ſea.

Some Cipriots came alſo to dwell in Spaine, and moreover they beleue, that the towne of Biana, in old time Alba, and of Madrid, firſt called Mantua, be the worke of the firſt Latines and Italians.

The reaſon why ſo many nations came into Spaine, was the abundance of mynes, and the ignorance of the Spaniards, which made them leſſe couetous, and by conſequence leſſe giuen to armes, and therefore they were a prey to all theſe theeuilh nations: whom (as all things haue their changes and reuolutions) they haue in this laſt age not only imitated, but exceeded them farre in crueltie, couetouſneſſe, and inſolencie, to ſimple rude nations diſcouered by them, as will appeare by the diſcourſe of the Hiſtorie.

F About 880 yeares before the Natiuitie of Ieſus Chriſt was that memorable fire in the Pyrennee mountaines (I ſpeake it according vnto the Spaniſh Authors) the which diſcouered more plainly the treaſures of Spaine: For the heardfmen hauing ſet fire of the woods (where the mountains were full) and it continuing many dayes, the vynes of the earth were ſo mooued with this violent heat, as the ſiluer melting ran downe by ſtreames: whereof, pyrennee rats and ſtrangers which did traffique there, being aduertified, they came running to this booty.

The

The Phenicians among others, vnder a kind of traffique, and with the exchange of certaine trifles of small value, laded their ships aboue once, being conducted (as some write) by Sichee, husband to Elisa Dido; yea, in so great abundance, as they made the anchors of their ships of siluer; so as Sichee grew so rich, as his brother in law Pigmalion through enuie and couetousnesse slew him: who afterward bent his course for Spaine; but running vp and down the seas, he died: wherefore his companie wanting a head, came to Gadis, to their brethren and countrymen, which were planted in this Island, who entertained them courteously, and the towne was better peopled by them: so as in the end it became a mightie Commonweale, inhabited first without all doubt by this nation of Tyr.

Tyrians did first people Calie.

9 Tyr was at that time, and long after, one of the most famous cities in the world, and most abounding in people and wealth, which the townes that haue taken their beginning from her, in diuers parts of the earth, doe witness. And although it had in a manner no territories, and that it was often taken and spoyled by the kings and potentates of Asia, and by Alexander the Great, yet did they easily recouer their first happinesse, by reason of the industrie of the inhabitants, and the commoditie of the sea; the which they did frequent with more experience and knowledge than any other nation of that age. It was the mother city of that mightie Commonweale of Carthage, which for so long a time did contend for Emperie with Rome; the first foundation whereof was layed by one Carchedon a Tyrian: it was afterwards enlarged by Dido, sister to Pigmalion, about 135 yeares before the foundation of Rome, and did encrease daily both in people and wealth. The citizens whereof some 562 yeares before the Natiuitie of Christ, bent their course for Spaine, to spoyle as others had done, by reason of them of Gades: who hauing gotten a great territorie in Spaine, which made them to bee feared and honoured of their neighbours, yet not contenting themselves with their owne, they fought to take from others: yea, being right merchants, and seeking to make their profit of all things, they tooke away men from the neighbour townes and villages, and caried them to sell as slaues in strange countries: a traffique which had bene alwayes vied by the Phenicians of Syria, their progenitors, to the prejudice of the people of Palestina and Iudea, who bordered vpon them. These inhumane fashions did in the end stirre vp the other people of Spaine against the Gaditanes, whereof followed much warre of small fame, by reason of the weakenesse of the Commonweales and Potentates which did manage them, if wee will compare them with others of those times.

is: ever it be, it is alwayes reuerenced.

Onely there is an honourable mention made of a noble man commanding vpon the coast of the Ocean, neere vnto this Island of Gades, called Arganthon, happie in wealth and long prosperitie of his affaires; for they say he liued 155 yeares, and reigned 80, and withall loued iustice: whose time is conferred with that of Ancus Martius, reigning in Rome about 150 yeares after the foundation thereof. The Gaditanes were kept somewhat in awe by him and others; yet not so subdued, but they tooke armes vpon all occasions; so as the people round about conspired against them: who finding not themselves strong enough to oppose against so many enemies, they resolued to call the Carthaginians to their aid; who in the end became masters of Spaine, vntill the Romanes slayed the course of their victories and conquests: the which shall be related in the following Bookes with more delight, for that we are better assured than of these things.

Hitherto we haue discoursed of the beginning and antiquitie of those nations which came first to inhabit Spaine, following the obscure steps of those that haue left any thing in writing, or read or conjectured, hauing scarce obserued any order of times, being without any sure grounds: for euen the places, whereas euery one of the Gouernors, Captains, or Kings, whereof we haue made mention, did reigne, is not very certaine. Yet it is most apparent, that the Isle of Gades hath been the most famous place of all Spaine, and that the superstition of idolatrous people hath preferred it from the inuasions and spoyle of strangers, by reason of the famous Temple of Hercules, which was built there: and that the maine land which is about this Island, and the strait which is neere vnto it, haue bene sooner and more particularly knowne than other places within the heart of Spaine, by reason of the commodious landing for Armies, and the abound of merchants strangers, which came thither by sea. And it is credible, that within the country there were many pettie kings, heads of people, without fame, and it may be without any good and lawfull policie; and it is not impertinent, that some townes,

A townes, famous in after ages, and euen in our times, whose beginning is not known, haue had their first foundations from these vnkowne people.

Wee haue willingly omitted many discourses written by others, for that wee haue held them fabulous, or at the least very doubtfull: as the coming of Noe into Spaine, and the voyage and conquest thereof by Nabuchodonozor, and such like, which we may read in counterfeite Ereosus, or in Iosephus, being deceived by the memorial of the Chaldeans, who put this last Nabuchodonozor about all the Heracles that euer were, to whose acts (the which in truth were great, as we may gather by the holy Scriptures) wee doe not any way derogate, by calling in question his coming into Spaine, for that Asia, Egypt, and Africk, which were neere, might furnish him wherewith to erect his trophies.

The great drought (whereof some haue left remembrance) seemeth as incredible vnto vs, as Prodigious the which continued six and twentie yeares, and burnt all the trees and plants in Spaine, except some Oliue and Pomegranet trees, as they say; as if these trees could not be hurt by the extreame heat, as well as the rest: it dried vp all the riuers, except Ebro and Guadalquivir, which became small vnprofitable riuers; so as the people were forced to goe out in great troupes, to seeke for other dwellings. These things, for that they haue not bene written by any auncient and good Authors, who would not haue passed ouer so memorable an accident with silence, and for the absurdities which follow, they are with reason rejected.

C And for as much as in that which we are hereafter to treat of, we shall find Spaine more manured, better peopled with men, townes, and burroughes, limitted and distinguished by more apparent bounds, and hauing some better forme of government and policie than it hath hitherto had, we haue thought it expedient (for the Readers ease) before we enter into the subject, to make a particular and briefe description thereof, making some mention of the fertilitie of the soyle, qualitie of the ayre, and nature and manners of the Spaniards, both auncient and moderne.

10 Spaine in general, and in regard of other countries, had from the beginning natural limits, as they are at this day; vlesse they will say, that the continuall beating of the waues of the sea hath made some breaches, or hath diuided it from Africke, to the which some belecue it was joyned in the beginning, or that the forme hath bene changed by some other accident. There may well be some diminution: for in Islands, the which (for that they are little) are better comprehended and measured by the fences, we find without all question, that some at this present are much lesse than they were in former ages, and others that haue bene famous, are now perished, and are no more, hauing bene vndermined by the waues, and swallowed vp in the sea. But whatsoeuer hath happened since that Spaine had any fame vnto this day, it doth not appeare that there hath bene any great portion cut away, or that it is much altered or changed.

Description of Spaine.

This Region hath bene very fitly compared by the Auncients to an Oxes hyde spread abroad: for beginning by the necke somewhat narrow (which is the passage of the Pyrence mountains, by the which it is joyned vnto Fraunce) it extendeth it selfe to the right and to the left, going towards the West: so as making in a manner a square forme, the Promontories or heads which thrust into the sea, on the one side vpon the coast of Biscaye, and at Finis terræ, and on the other at Cap de Gates, and at the strait of Gibaltar, represent the legs; then the point of Cap S. Vincent, stretch forth behind towards the West, makes the taylor.

That which is taken for the East part of Spaine, runs along the Pyrence mountains, beginning neere vnto the towne of Bayonne, vpon the limits of Fraunce, where was heretofore the Promontorie Easo, and runs vnto Cap de Cruix, whereas Venus Temple was in old time; that is, from the Ocean to the Mediterranean sea; being 80 leagues, or thereabouts, taking the way by Fraunce: for these mountaines haue no strait course, but bend much towards Spaine, and hold a great part of that country: so as he that would goe from the Ocean to the Mediterranean sea within the country of Spaine, on that side of the mountaines, should find it much more than 80 leagues. Although that this coast of Spaine be called the East, yet all this passage of the Pyrence mountaines turnes much towards the North, and is subject to that wind which the Italians call Gree, and by our mariners Northeast.

The South coast
of Spaine.

From Cap de Crux, or Venus Temple, along the Mediterranean sea, and passing by the strait into the Atlantick Ocean, vnto the holy Promontorie, or Cap S. Vincent, is the South part of Spaine; the which notwithstanding turning towards the East, is for the most part subject to the wind which the Italians call Sirocco, and we Southeast, and contains about 275 leagues; that is, 202 leagues to Gibraltar, and 73 leagues from thence to Cap S. Vincent, the which are distinctly measured after this manner.

Provincies out of Spaine vnder
the jurisdiction
thereof.

We are not ignorant, that in old times was comprehended vnder the jurisdiction of Spaine, on the one side the Prouince of Gaule Narbonoise, which is now called Languedocke, and on the other side a portion of Mauritania in Africa, beyond the strait, as well in the times of the Romane Emperours, as of the Gothes; but for that it was an accessorie onely for a time, and vpon extraordinary occasions, and that it is most certaine that these people are by nature excluded out of the limits of Spaine, and haue alwaies had diuers humors and manners to the Spaniards, wee will containe our felues within the compasse which wee haue described and measured, in the whole course of this Historie; and if we be forced to goe out of it, wee will hold our felues there as strangers. Having turned round about Spaine, let vs now come into the heart of it, and before we speake of the particular Prouinces, let vs see what mountaines and riuers are famous in the whole country, the better to distinguish euery nation, both ancient and moderne.

is called.

The Pyrenees, which haue taken their name either of the great fire, whereof mention hath bin made (for Pyr in Greeke is fire) or from the ordinarie lightning which falls vpon the tops of the hills, or else (if we will receive fables) of the nymphe Pyrene, daughter to Bebrix, whom Hercules did get with child as he passed that way, extend their greatest masse from Venus Temple, or Cap Crux, vnto Bayonne, this is to say, from the one vnto the other sea, stretching farre into Spaine, where they doe hold a great part of the countrey, which lyes betwixt them and the river of Ebro, casting moreover many branches along and crosse this Region, from whence doe fall many riuers and small streames, the which some haue numbered to be 150; meri-

A meriting the names of riuers. The front of these mountaines, which stretch vnto the Ocean neere vnto Bayonne, bending in that part, runs along the Cantabrians, Asturians, & Gallicia, vnto the last Westerne limits, extending it selfe far into the country, and making almost halfe Spaine crooked and hilly, whereas the river of Duero doth passe, and further. These hills were heretofore called Cantabres and Vindius, and since they took diuers names, which were giuen them by the people which dwell thereabouts, and in the vallies thereof. At this present they be the mountains of Biscaia, Nauarre, Sentillana, the mountains of Oca, Asturia, and Gallicia. Out of them doth flow the river Ebro, in old time Iberus, neere vnto a place which they call Fuent Ibres, & hauing run a little towards the East, the turneth her course to the South, by the ancient country of the Autrigones, Vardules, Valscons, Illegetes, Ederanes, and Illeacones, the which are in our time the Nauarrois, Arragonois, and Cattelaunians, and hauing run about 120 leagues through the country, it falls into the Mediterranean sea, beneath Tortosa. Duero doth also take her beginning in these mountains, a great river, and the ancient limit betwixt Portugal and Tarraconese, two of the principall Prouinces of Spaine, neere vnto a Bourg called Aquilar, not farre from Soria, bending in the beginning towards the South, but afterwards she takes her course to the West Ocean, into the which it dischargeth it selfe neere vnto the towne of Porto Galego, hauing run about 120 leagues by the Arcuaces, and betwixt the vallies of the Galliques and Lusitanians, which in our time are those of Castille the old, Leon and Portugal, towards the North. Into it falls the river Auia, vpon the banks whereof they say that no tree that is pricking will grow; although that all the countrey thereabouts is full of Pomgranets, Oranges, Cytrons, and such like, the which it hath common with another river in Galicia, called Alesfe.

From the same Pyrenees, as from a common stemme, parts the mountain, called in old time Idubeda or Iubalda, the which thrusts forth into two other branches, the which diuides Spain from the East vnto the West, and passing by diuers people, gets also diuers names: for in the beginning they call it Sierra, or mountaine of Acienca, by reason of the ancient towne of Aua, the ruines whereof are yet to be seene, about the towne of Bourgois: then it is called Sumo Sierra, Puerto de Tablada, of Palomera, of Abilo, Pico, of Tornauacas, & in the end enters into Portugal, making a great front neere vnto the Ocean, the which they call the mount D of Stella, vpon the top of which is an admirable lake: for they doe often find in it pieces of ships which haue suffered shipwracke vpon that coast, notwithstanding that the mountaine is very high, and a good way from the sea: and they say moreover, that when the sea is troubled with tempests, they doe heare the waues beat, and all that lake and mountaine make a noyse, with the horrible sound of the winds and tempest, as if they were in full sea.

This course of the mountains running betwixt the riuers Duero and Tayo, doth now cause a distinction of the people of the Prouinces of Spain; for which reason they are called, on this side, or beynd the mountains. The other branch of this most Idubeda runs towards the South, neere vnto the towne of Sigüenza and Cuenca, keeping in the river Ebro, that it bend not towards the West, the which in our time hath also gotten diuers names, that is, Solorio, Sierra Molina, Sierra d Alcarraz & Sigura, in old times, Mons Argentum, and sometimes rising high, and sometimes falling and opening in some places, it is in a manner plain neere vnto Valence: then it riseth againe, and passeth to Carthagea, and to Cap de Palos, in former times called Scombraria, the ancient limit of two governments of Spaine, at what time this mountain was called Ortopeda or Ortopeda. Passing on by the sea shore riseth the mountaine, in old time Ortopeda, M. called Illipula, and now Sierra Vermeia, Sierra de Rondas, and other hills of the kingdom of Illipula, M. Granado, which extend vnto the strait whereas they make Mont Calpe, called at this time Gibraltar, the which should properly be called Gibal Tarif, a name gotten by the dissent of a capitaine Moore, called Tarif, who landed in this place with the first armie of Moores that came out of Affricke into Spaine, when as the Gothes kingdom went to ruine. Other mountaines diuiding themselves from this, and going far from the sea, run about Cordoue and Seuille, the which in old time were called Mariani Montes, and Castulonensis Saltus, now Sierra Morena. Out of these aboue named mountaines, which keepe in the river Ebro, bending from the North to the South, there flowe three great fouds or riuers, Tagus, Anas, and Betis, according to the ancients, but now called Tayo, Guadiana, and Guadalquivir, besides many others of lesse fame, which these doe receive and carrie into the Ocean.

Tayo

Tagus.

Tayo hath his spring at a place which is now called Sierra Molina, neere vnto the towne of Cuenca and Toralba, the which passing almost through two parts of Spaine, runneth by Toledo, the country of Estrema Dura and Portugal, towards the West Ocean, where it enters by a large and spacious channell beneath the royall citie of Lisbon. This riuer was famous among the Auncients, by reason of the little graines, and as it were scrapings of pure gold, which they did often find in the grauell and sand, which the torrent and streames of water had brought from the mountains.

The beginning and course of Guadiana.

Guadiana commeth out of the country which in old time they called Campus Laminitanus, and now Campo de Montiel, a place which is otherwise drie and wanting water. This riuer directeth her course in the beginning towards the West, neere vnto the towne which was called Pax or Pezaguista, but now Badaios: turning there to the South, it dischargeeth it selfe into the Atlantick sea, bounding in at this day the kingdome of Portugal on the South side, as in old time it diuided the prouince of Betica from Lusitania. Towards the Spring they call it Rodiera, and from thence (which is admirable) hauing run some leagues in the country, it hides it selfe vnder the ground, neere vnto a place called Argamasilla, and runneth so hidden about eight great leagues: then it comes forth againe into certaine moores, continuing her course in that manner, neere vnto the auncient townes of Cecilia, Gemela, Emerita, and Pezaguista, towards the sea, by reason whereof the Spaniards breed admiration in strangers, bragging, that they haue a bridge in their country, vpon the which about ten thousand cattell feed daily.

Guadalquivir,
the name, springs
and course.

As for Guadalquivir, so named by the Moores, which is as much to say, as a great flood, and in old time Betis, her beginning is vpon Mont Argent, called now Sierra d'Alcaras, and runneth towards the West into the Atlantick sea, beneath Seuille, by a large channell; although in old time it had two: whereof the one passed along the wals of Nebrissa, which at that time was Lebrissa; the which is at this day about two leagues off, for that the channell is filled vp: vpon the which Afta did also stand, which in those times was also called Zeres de la Frontera.

Cape.
Iulii.
The ladders of Hanniball.

There are other mountains in Spaine of lesse fame, as Mont Cayo, neere to Tarrasone in Arragon, in old time Caunus; M. Iulii or Mons Iouis, neere to Barcelone; the ladders of Hanniball, called in that time the coast of Garaph, and others. Moreouer, there are many riuers besides those which we haue described, giuing the names or bounds to Prouinces: as the riuer of Ruscino, whereof the towne and country was named; of the ruines whereof Perpignan was built: Astorga, which seemeth to giue the name vnto the Asturians: the riuer of Calybs, which passeth according vnto some, neere vnto Tarrasone, and in his name carrieth the marks of the beginning of the Spaniards, the water whereof is excellent to sleepe yron: Sicoris, or Sigro, which passeth at Lerida; about the which were the Sicanians, which passed into Sicilie, Cinpa or Senga, and the greater and lesse Arragon; floods whereof the kingdome of Arragon is named, with others which are observed by the curious. But it shall be easie for vs, among these great mountains and riuers which we haue described, to find out euery people and prouince, and the particular places of Spaine, as well according to the distinctions of the Auncient, as their limits and diuisions, since the euerfion of the Romane Empire.

Turdulans.

Beginning then with the Westerne point, we say, That from Cape S. Vincent vnto the Island of Gades or Calis, did dwell the auncient Turditanes, vpon the sea, and within the land, holding both bankes of the riuer Anas, and the country which lieth betwixt it and Betis, beyond the which they did occupie some leagues of the country towards the South. This Region was in the beginning full of woods and forrests, which they called Tercenians and Tarteftians, but being cut downe, it hath bene alwaies very fertile and abounding in all things. The towne of Híspalis, called after Sepila, and since Seuille, was of this nation, being also called Romulenſis Colonia, situated vpon the bankes of Betis, a great and navigable riuer, and lower towards the sea, Nebrissa, and Afta Colonia, and within the country Italica, whereas the Emperours Traian, Adrian, and Theodosius were borne, with the Poet Statius, and Carmon retaining still the name, Pax Iulia and Beia, at this present Portugall.

Turdulans.
Gordone.

Neere vnto this towards the East were the Turdules, whose country is also bathed by Betis, and vpon this riuer is the towne of Cordoue, called Colonia Patricia, built by the

A Confull M. Claud. Marcellus, about the yeare of the foundation of Rome 602. Which country of the Turdules did extend to the Turditanes and the Bastules, from the Ile of Gades, vpon the Ocean, vnto the Mediterranean sea, neere vnto the Promontorie Charidemum, or Cap de Gares. The places which the Turdules did hold lying vpon the Ocean shoare, towards the strait, were the port of Melithee, the Temple of Iuno built by Hercules, and the citie of Belon, on which side there are at this day S. Marie, Trafalgar, and Tariffe: and within the country the mountaine Ilipula, and Ilipula Magna, at this present Ilpa; Illiberis, or Liberia, which some thinke was Granada in those times; and Aftigi, one of the iudiciall seats of Spaine, which may be Eccia at this day, although there were another of that name vpon the sea shoare. Among this nation it may well be the Meleffians were, and their towne Oringe, taken by L. Scipio, which they say was Aryona.

After were the Bastules, within the straits, and along the Mediterranean sea, who were sumamed Pœni, continuing vnto the Promontorie of Charidemum, or Cap de Gares, and to Balaria, now Bara, or Vera, next vnto the Turdules, of which nation Calpe was, otherwise called Heraclée, the which at this day they name Gibaltar, neere vnto the which in old time was the towne of Cartheia, called also Tarteſſe, the which was a common name in old time for the riuer Betis, the Island of Gades, and all the neighbour country. It is likely, that this towne of Cartheia was situated whereas Algezire now standeth. Titus Algezire.

Linus setteth it without the strait, vpon the Ocean. Then Malaga, a port which retayneth his name; and Abdera, which is Almerie, vpon the Mediterranean sea, belonging vnto the Bastules; and it may be Munda, whereas Pompeys eldest sonne was defeated, if it be that Ronde which is at this day, as some will haue it. The countries inhabited by these three nations, are at this day comprehended in Granada, Andalusia, and a part of Portugall, and made the Betique Prouince one of the chiefe members of the kingdome of Spaine.

Next vnto them, and continuing along the coast of the Mediterranean sea, were the Bastitanes and Contestanes, whereas in our time lyeth Murcia and Valence, seperated by the mountaine Orospeſa. The towne of Bafa was in old time the chiefe mansion of the Bastitanes, otherwise called Bastitanes, to whom Acci did belong, now called Guadix, and vnto Beiar and Origuella, in old time called Bigerra and Orcelis. But Murcia, then called Menlaria, Satabis, which is Xatua, and towards the Promontorie Scombaria, now called Cap de Palos, new Carthage, Alone, which at this day is Alicant, Illici, it may be Elches in our time, and the citie of Valence, were belonging vnto the Contestanes, among the which it may be Illiturge was, lying farre from the sea, or else among the aboue named Bastitanes.

Then followed the Editanes and Illecaones, from Valence vnto the mouth of the riuer Ebro. The townes and places renowned among the Editanes, or, as others tearme them, Seditanes, were Dianium vpon the sea, and Sagunt higher, destroyed by Hanniball, whereas now Moruiedro standeth, Cæsar Augusta, farre off from the sea, is Saragossa, in old time Salduba.

Among the Illecaones were Dertosa, in these times Tortosa, and old Carthage, ruined by the two Scipios brethren.

Ioyning vnto them, and still coasting along the sea shoare, and on this side the riuer of Ebro, were the Acetanians, Laetanians, and Indigetes, all which are comprehended at this day in Catalogne, vpon the sea. To these Acetanians (who were also called Coferanians) belonged Terraco; of the which, the greatest part of Spaine was named; a towne peopled by the two brethren Scipios, to oppose it against new Carthage.

F Barcelone growne great of a small beginning, by the ruines of Rubicata, a Colonie of the Africanes, situated vpon the riuer Rubricatus, at this present Lobregat, was of the Laetanians, or Laetanians.

The Castellans (who, according vnto some, haue left their name to our Catalogne) were Castellans, whereas it may be the Duchie of Cardone now is.

C iij

Indigetes.

Vpon the declining of the Pyrene mountains, were the Indigetes, or Endigetes, where-as the towne of Empurias or Emporium now is, and Rhoda, or Rofes, now ruined, and in old time the Temple of Pennus, whereas now Celibre stands, a name taken from Illiberis, which was at the foot of the Pyrenes, as some suppose.

Rufino
Rufillon.

For a frontier to Spaine on that side, we will place Rufino, which is the Countie of Rosillon, although it were in old time of the Province of Gaule, but it hath of long time beene annexed vnto Spaine: there was Elna, which hath not changed her name, and Rufino, both riuier and towne, of whose ruines Parpignan was built. Neere vnto it is a small riuier, called Illeris, and since Tetrum, that is to say, filthie, for that the water thereof is blacke, by reason that it passeth among the mynes of metall, whereof those mount-taines are full. In this countrey there was also a towne called Illiberis, as that of Gre- nade, whereas the first Councell of Spaine was held: but at this day there remaineth no marke of it.

Celtiques.

Comming now to the holy Promontorie, or Cape S. Vincent, from whence wee are parted, we will describe the people dwelling along the Westerne and Northerne Ocean, vnto the other end of the Pyrenes, neere vnto Bayonne; whereof the first were called Celtiques, who came without all doubt from Gaule, after that the Celtes and Iberians were mingled together, comprehended partly vnder the Lusitanians, who held a great Continent of the countrey, as well by the sea side, as within the land, and gaue the name vnto one of the chiefe members of Spaine, containing the Vergons, of whom wee will make mention hereafter.

Lusitanians.

These Celtiques and Lusitanians comprehended a great part of our Portugall, of E- strema Dura, and Castille the new; and entred as farre as Andelouzia into the Celtiques countrey. The auncient townes which they had, and the places most renowned, were Vlyppo or Olyppo, now Lisbone, at the mouth of Tayo, the mouthes of the riuers of Monda and Duero, and within the countrey Scalabis, or Turris Iulia, now Tru- gillo, Talabriga, Talauera now Ebura, Norba Cæsarea, at this time Alcantara, Augusta Emerita, now Merida. These two last were betwixt Tayo and Guadiana, and Norba Cæ- farea was ruined by Pompeys faction, for that they had beene two faithfull vnto Cæsar: of the ruines whereof, and the remainders of which people, Emerita was afterwards built, in Augustus his time. There were also Euandria, Cecilia Gemellina, now called S. Marie of Guadalupe: Aronda among the Celtique Betiques, called also Munda, not that whereas Pompeys eldest sonne was defeated. Beside these townes, there were vpon the marches of the Lusitanians, Ilipa, which it may be is Niebla at this day; Ostraca, Carmel, Ituca, and others, whereof there remaine no markes.

Callaiques or Galleges.

Beyond the riuier of Duero were the people called Callaiques or Galleges, now Gal- legos, so named of the Gauls, Galates, or Celtes, holding a great countrey, which was barren and hillie, for the most part, but where it joyneth vpon the Lusitanians; which is that which is contained betwixt the riuers of Duero and Minio, belonging at this present to the realme of Portugall; the which hath taken this name since the coming of the Moores, of the towne of Porto, right against the which, they or the Gauls pyrats built a fort, which was called Gal: it may be it is that which is called the tower of Gaya, the which is in this countrey, whereas Duero falleth into the sea. These people of Callaiques were diuided into two; those which were called Brecaires, by reason of the towne of Bre-
car Augusta, which was among them (the which is now Braga, Metropolitane of Por- tugal), and the Callaiques Lucenses, by reason of the towne called Lucus Augusti, now Lugo. Of the Brecaires was the riuier Lemia, called Lethes, for that the Celtes inhabiting about the riuier of Guadiana, comming with other of their neighbours into this coun-tre, after some tumults, and the losse of their captaine, being vagabonds, and without counsell, they wandered vp and downe without conduct, and without any care to returne from whence they came, as if they had forgotten their first abode. The Brecaires and their towne Breca tooke their name from certaine souldiours of Affricke, which were leued about the riuier of Bragada, in the Province of Carthage, and then mingled with the Celtes, or Gauls, were called Callaiques, or Galleges Brecaires.

Brecaires.

A Among the Lucenses were the Artabres, about the Promontorie Nereus, which is now Artabres, Finis terræ: there were the altars of the Sunne, and Flauium Brigantium, it may be Compo-
stella at this day, or Betauzos, or rather Corunna, and Trileucum, a Promontorie, and Iria Flauia, at this day S. Marie of Finis terræ, or Padron, and Aquæ Calidae, now Orense.

Asturia joyned to these Callaiques, at that time diuided into many iurisdiccions: there was Lancia the chiefe towne, taken by Augustus captaine, Legio Germanica, or Gemina, at this time Leon, a royall towne: Bregetium, called since (according vnto some) Ouedo, an assured refuge for Christians, when as the Moors did ouerun Spaine: Asturica Augusta, at this day Astorga: Forum Egurrorum, Medina of Rioseco, and towards the sea Flauianauia,

B Among them was the towne of Segisama, taken by Ottavianus Cæsar. They did comprehend the Antrigones, Caristes, Bardules, and Vascons, the which extended themselues farre from the sea into the countrey, on this side the riuier of Ebro, and coasted the Py- rene mountains. The neerest vnto Asturia were properly called Cantabrians, to whom Vel- lencia did belong, about the place where as now Victoria stands, the chiefe towne of the Prince of Alaua, Iuliobriga, at this day Logroño. The riuier of Ebro did run through the middelt of the Autrigones. Alba was among the Vardules, since called Viana: and to the Vas- cons belonged Pompeloni Martua, which is now called Pampelone Iacca, which according to Ptolome hath held the old name: Calagorina, now called Calaorra, or Calahorra: Bal- con-ton, of the name of Baleo, or Valco: Suessia, which may be Sanguessa, and others.

Hitherto we haue briefly described the people and prouinces of Spaine, which joyne vp-on the seas, and observed the chiefe places thereof, applying them as neere as might bee to thesetimes: Let vs now enter into the countrey, beginning with the confines of the Callai- ques, Asturians, and Cantabrians, towards the North, and comming to the South.

The Vacces did joyne vnto the Gallicians Brecaires of the West, to whom the Murbo- ges, Areuaces, those which were called Beli and Tithi, confining with the Celtiberians, the Pelendones, and Berones were neighbours, approaching neere vnto the riuier of Ebro, which D was to the East of them, and that of Duero vpon the South. All this compasse is comprehended in our time within Castille the old, and the realme of Leon.

The townes of Viminacium, Auia, or Liua, which is now Villalon, Segisama Iulia, at this present called Tordeillas, which they call otherwise Turris Sillana; Palantia, which hath preferred the name of Palencia; Pincia, which is Valledolit, Septimance, or Sinanca; Sen- tica, or Sarabris, at this day Zamora, and Cauca, whereas Lucillus committed great cruel-tie, and Interactia. These townes I say were among the Vacces: But Branum, or Auca, of whose ruines the towne of Burgos hath bene built, belonged to the Murboges.

Among the Areuaces, whose countrey is washt with the riuier Duero, running through the middelt thereof, were the townes of Clunia Colonia, Segorgia Laða, at this present Sepul- ueda, Ocilis, Segobia, which keeps his name, Termania, and the old Numance, whereas at this day Soria stands.

Vnder the said nation were the Vergones or Vedons, confining vpon the Lusitanians, and making a part of that prouince: which countrey is now comprehended betwixt the frontier of Portugall, towards Cite Rodrigo, the kingdome of Leon, Castille the new, and Tole- do. To these people Elmantica did belong, now called Salamanca, a famous Vniuersitie. On the East side were the Carpetanians, there stood Toledo, which retaines the name, called also Serezola, Ebura, Hippo, Complutum, now called Alcala Enares, Mantua, now Madrid: and it may be among them were the Olacdes, and their townes Althece.

Towards the South were the Oretanes, confining on the East with the Celtiberians, and on the West with the Beturians, neighbours to the Lusitanians, which are those of Estre- ma Dura. The countrey of the Oretanes makes at this day a part of the realme of Toledo; it comprehends the fields of Calatraua, the passage called the fields of Alcoacer, and part of the mountaines Marianes, at this present Sierra Morena, vnto Iaen, and to the frontiers of Granado. Oretan of the Germanes, which some thinke to bee Calatraua, Castulo, then a great and mightie towne, and now a small burrough, called Castilla, vpon the riuier Guadi-

ana,

ana, where Himilca the wife of Hannibal was borne, issued from the race of Milium, who built it: Mentifa, which is laen, according vnto some, and Astapa, a famous retreat of desperat theeues; Nobilis, Cusibis and Illustia, were of the Oretanes.

Celiberians. Among the Celiberians were Ergauica, Alce, Turiaso, (that is Tarassone) Bilbilis, at this present Calataub (whereas the Poet Martiall was borne) Saguntia, now Siguenza, Contrabia and Valeria, which is Concha.

Lobertanes. Betwixt the Celiberians and the river Ebro, were the Lobertanes, and on this side Ebro, vnder the Falcons and mount Edulius, dwelt the Ilergetes, and towards the Pyrene mountaynes, and at the foot of them, the Sueftanans, Lacetanes, Authetanes, or Aufetanes, and Cerretanes, being all contained partly in Nauarre and Arragon, and part in Catalogne at this present. Succia the chiefe towne of the Sueftanans, may be Sanguessa in Nauarre: and Iacca at that time was of the auntient Lacetanes. The towne of Ilerda, which is Lerida, gaue the name to the Ilergetes: to them there also belonged Osca, Huefca at this day, and Bergidum, which is Vrgel, and Anitorgis, or Athanasia.

As for the towne of Iliturgis, it is obscurely limited by the auntients. Some of the later will haue it among the Ilergetes, others place it in the Oretanes countrey, and others in the Betique prouinces, places farre distant one from another.

The Authetanes, or Aufetanes, did possesse Geroñda, in our time Girone: and among the Cerretanes, were Aufonia the auntient, and Iulia Libica, which some hold to be Linca.

This is all which I haue thought fit to gather of the people inhabiting the firme land of Spaine, the which were found there, and augmented by the Carthaginians and Romanes, when as they contended for the possession thereof, whereof some markes appeared at that time, and that they had immutable limits, the which doe now assure vs of their habitations.

Islands about Spaine. There is mention made by some authors, of many islands about Spaine, whereof some are no more, others are yet famous. The Cassiterides, fertile in tinne, were placed by the Cosinographers neere vnto Cap Finis terre: but there is no more any mention of them; whereby it seemes they haue been swallowed vp in the sea, vnlesse they will say, they be those of the Axores, which are too far from Spaine.

Islands of the gods. The islands of the gods in the West Ocean, may be those of Bayone, neere vnto Ponteuedra in Gallicia.

Celtis and the ancient names. The island of Gades was in old time called Tartessè Erythrea, or according vnto some Erythie, Cotynusia, Aphrodisia, Gadira, Gadir, and Gaddir (although that Gaddir in the opinion of some, is a common name to the island, and to other places of Betique Spaine, neere vnto it, as well as Tartessè) and now they haue named it Gadiz or Galis. It hath beene the most famous of all others about Spaine, and is yet renowned and rich, but much more in auntient times. For although that in the Romanes time they had scarce any territorie, yet was it one of the greatest, the richest, and best peopled townes in Europe. It appears by the description of Censures at one time, That there were fise hundred heads of families, of the order of Knights, among the inhabitants thereof. One Balthus a Gaditan enlarged the towne almost halfe bigger than it was, and called his new worke Neapolis.

In this island there was a fountaine flowing and ebbing daily with the sea. Ioyning vnto it there were two other small islands, whereof the one was called Didima. They write, That in old time the island of Gadis was much greater than it is now. It hath in length from the South to the North, fometen or twelue miles, and is seperated from the maine land by a narrow channell, and distant from the strait of Gibaltar some threecore miles, or fiftie leagues.

Islands Balearis. In the Iberique, or Mediterranean sea, are the two islands Balearis, called in these times Majorca, and Minorca; for that the one is bigger than the other. Their first name was Gymnasies, for that the inhabitants thereof went all naked: Gymnos in Greeke, is naked in our language. But for that the men of this island were good Archers, they were called Balearis, vnlesse wee will beleue that this name was giuen them by one Balee, whom Hercules gaue them for their Gouvernour, as some write. In those dayes great Commonweales drew good souldiours from thence, who did commonly vse slings, and

A and did euer carie three; with the one he did bind his head, with another he did girt himselfe, and the third he held in his hand: and with these armes they wrought great effects, and did much amaze their enemies; for they were practised in it from their youth by their mothers, who set their breakfast bread vpon the top of a post, the which they must beat down with their slings, or else they fasted. These islanders were long before they would vse either gold or silver, remembering the great calamities which Spaine had suffered, by reason of these metalls: wherefore they held themselves to be well assured in forbidding the vse of it. They did sometimes Gold and silver forbidden by the Carthaginians, who often employed their souldiours in their warres, capitulate with the Carthaginians, who often employed their souldiours in their warres, that they should giue them wiues and wine for their pay, and no silver.

B These are two fertile islands, hauing this benefit moreover, that they doe not breed any hurtfull beast, although the warre which they had with the conies be no fable; but they were brought from other places, and of one bucke conie and a doe, they did multiplie in such great numbers, as with the working of their holes and burrows vnder ground, they vntrooted trees, and vndermined the foundations of houses, so as the inhabitants sent embassadors to Rome, to demand helpe and succour of the Senat against these beasts (a certaine argument of their simplicitie) but afterwards they learned to take them. The greatest of these islands is about fiftene leagues long, and verie narrow. The lesser yeelds nothing to the other in bountie and fruitfulness. About them are the little islands of Cabrera and Dragonera. Neerer vnto the maine land, and more Westerly, are the two Pityufes, whereof the greater was called Ebusus, which hath about twentie miles circuit of hard access, hauing a port vpon the South side: It is now called Yuica, the which they say hath no serpents, and if they bee brought from any other place, they die. But the other, Ophiussa in old time, and now Fromentaria, is so full of them, as the island hath remained desart and not inhabited. In Yuica they make excellent fish.

C These islands are right against the shore betwixt Barcelona and Valence. The islands of Sardinia and Corfica were in old time giuen by the Popes in fee to the kings of Aragon, who haue contended by armes for the right thereof, against the Genenois and Pisans, for many yeares, till that in the end the Aragonians got the quiet possession of Sardinia, of which conquest we shall speake often; wherefore wee will describe it briefly, without making any particular mention of that of Corfica, which the Genenois hold.

D The isle of Sardinia lies in the Mediterranean sea, hauing that of Corfica neere vnto it vpon the North. It runs out in length from North to South, neere threecore leagues, accounting foure miles to a league. It is held to be about an hundred and fiftie leagues in circuit: It is fise and thirtie leagues from Africke, the neereft place vnto it is Tunes or Bizerte. Betwixt it and Corfica are but foure leagues, and in some places but three: in the which there are many small islands, which they cal Buinares. This island was in old time called Ico, Ichnusa, and Sandaliotis, for that it hath the forme of a sole, or of a mans foot. The first inhabitants were Tufcanes, and then Grecians, led by Iolans and Sardus, companions to Hercules. After which there arriued some Troianes, and then Athenians. After them the Carthaginians leised vpon this island, who were dispossest by the Romanes, which was the cause of the third warre betwixt E them.

Hauing beene long vnder that commonweale, and consequently vnder the Romane empire, the Saracens got footing there, against whom the Genenois and Pisans, then mightie commonweales, did arme, by the Popes persuation; conquered it, and planted themselves there. But for that it was a subject of their warre and quarels, and withall the Popes bearing a spleene against the Pisans, it was giuen in fee to the kings of Aragon. It was heretofore a store-house for the Romanes, it was so fertile, and would be so still, if the people were industrious; much better for tillage than Corfica, especially that part which lies towards Africke, which is a plaine, and lyes lower than the other towards Corfica, which is hilly. In it there grow vines and all sorts of fruites, as in Corfica, except oyle, by reason of the negligence of the Sardinians: for nature bringing forth in the woods and mountaynes, infinite store of wild oliues, thewes it is their owne fault if this plant be not made good. The island abounds in cattell of all sorts, as it appears by the great quantitie of hides and cheefe which they transport into Italie and other places. There are great store of wild goats, called by the countrey men Mufines, or Mufles, which haue their haire like staggas, and their heads like rammes, but their hornes bending backwards: they are verie light and nimble, and liue in the mountayns, where- of

of the Sardinians (who are better huntmen than the Corsicans) take three or foure thousand at a time, the which they flea to sell their skinned, whereof the Cordeuan leather is made, leauing the carcases in the fields, notwithstanding that the flesh be reasonable good to eat; wherewith it may be the ayre is impaired, the which doth naturally infect that countrey, by reason of certaine South windes which blow in Summer. The horses of Sardinia are hot, strong headed, and hard to be broken, but they last long; and there are many wild. Among their tame cattell there are certaine small bullockes, which amble naturally, which the countrey men vse like Affes and Mules, to goe from one place to another. Heretofore there have bene mynes of sulphur or brimstone, alume, siluer, and salt; and it is but the negligence of the people, that they are not found at this day, and with good profit. Neither doth it want bathes which are good for many infirmities, especially betwixt Montreal and Saint John. In Sardinia (as some maintaine) there are no wolues, nor any venomous nor hurtfull beasts, the which they haue common with many other illands: yet they haue verie great foxes, fierce and cruell, which easily kill a sheepe or a goat. There growes the hearbe Sardonique, which causeth death, with such a contraction of the sinewes, as they seeme to smile when they are dead.

This island hath in former times bene better inhabited than it is at this day, and they haue bene more warlike than now they are. When as the Geneuois and Pisans did hold it, they distinguisht it into two prouinces, that of Cap Caillery which looks towards Africke, the which was the Pisans part, and the greater; and Cap of Lugodori, joyning vpon Corfica, which the Geneuois held for them. Then the Sardinians had their rulers and Gouernours, whom they call Iudges, diuided into foure iurisdictiones or prouinces; one at Caillery, another at Arborea, since called Oristagny; one at Turrita, or Torre, and the fourth at Galluri. This kind of gouernement was entertained vntill the conquest of the island by the Arragonis, and the Spaniards rule. At this day there is a Viceroy resident at Caillery, with absolute authoritie, who of necessitie must bee a Spaniard, and is assisted by a Councell, or royall audience, consisting of a President, and a certaine number of Counsellours. The two prouinces aboue mentioned, into the which the island is diuided, haue either of them a Gouernour, who is a Spaniard, or of the island indifferently, which doe gouerne and haue authoritie in the absence of the Viceroy, but hee being present, it ceaseth.

The towne and chiefe places of this island, bee Caillery, commonly called Calger, a towne seated vpon the side of a hill towards Africke, hauing a goodly port, haunted by merchants and saylers from all parts: it is well built, and enriched with diuers towers, and a stately temple, built by the Pisans, and an Archbishops seat. This citie hath by priuiledge a iurisdiction apart, besides the Viceroyes authoritie, and is gouerned by the citizens themselves. Next is Oristagny, in old time called Arborea, the which is also a bishopricke, and was sometimes a marquissate with a particular lord: but one of them rebelling, the kings of Arragon haue vnaited it vnto their demaines. There is a port also towards the West. Arghero, or Alguero, followes on the same West part, the which hath no port, but onely a road. Boffa vpon the Sea, the tower in old time was called Libiffon, a Colonie of the Romanes, and afterwards called Torre, or Turrite, the which is now ruined. Saffari, ten or twelue miles from the sea, where there is an auncient conduit of water, the which continues about twelue miles, vnto Saint Gaudins temple. Then castile Arragonois towards Corfica.

There are many other burroughes and castles in the island, of small fame. The ruines of old buildings which are to bee seene in many parts of the island, shew that in auncient time there were many cities and great buildings. In places not inhabited there yet are many towers to bee seene of a round forme, built of a verie hard stone, hauing the doores and entrie narrow, and the stayres in the maine walls. Those buildings are called by the inhabitants Noracs, a marke of great antiquitie, some thinking that Norac sonne to Erihree did first inhabit this island, by whom the buildings were so called. The illands which are about Corfica and Sardinia, are few, and of no fame. Afanara and Tolaro, are towards Cap Logudori, the one of the East side, the other of the West, the rest are rather themselves islands.

The

A The Sardinians had in old time a proper language, but the often change of their lords, and the access of diuers nations, hath corrupted their speech: The most ciuile at this day speake Spanish Cattelán: the vulgar sort haue a language mixt of the Cattelans, Italians, Moors, and other strange and barbarous words. Among the ruder sort, there is not in a manner any religion, and not much in townes; for in all Christendome you shall not find Churchmen more ignorant than in Sardinia. Their religious exercises are to heare masse on Sundayes, and on some Saints daies, and then they feast and daunce euén in their Churches, men and women together, with immodest songs and jestures.

In townes their apparell is verie stately, especially of the women; but the countrey peoples is simple and grosse. The men are of a small stature, but strong and rough, and great huntmen with crossebowes: quiet and peaceable among themselves, and courteous to strangers.

Spaine, as wee haue described it by the prouinces and particular people, was diuided into three principall members, or three great prouinces; that is, Betica, Lusitania and Tarraconense. Betica was so named of the river Betis, that is, Guadalquiber, which passeth through the middle of it. It did containe that which is inclosed by the river Anas, or Guadiana, on the one side, and by the Ocean sea, from the mouth thereof stretching towards the strait, and then running along the coast of the Mediterranean sea vnto Carthage, or the Promontorie Charidemum, called Cap de Gates: From whence going by land to Castulo, or Calsona the old, it was bounded in on that side by the mountaine Iudabeda, which is at this day called Sierra of Alcarrias, and others, as if they would draw a direct line from Muxacra, which is neere vnto Cap de Gates, vnto Almagra. This prouince was the best and most fertile of Spaine, and the first affected and vsurped by the Phenicians, Africanes, and other strangers.

From the river Anas, or Guadiana, and his entrie into the sea, mourning to the place whereas Duero falls into it, was the West part of Lusitania, the second member of Spaine, the which did lyce betwixt those two riuers, on the North and South sides, and within it had for the Easterne limits, the Carpetanes and Oretanes, going from Castulo, or Calsona, vpon Guadiana, vnto Septimania, at this present Simanca, in Castille. The riuier Tayo passeth through the middle of this region, where in some places there are store of all sorts of fruits.

All the rest of Spaine, from the mouth of Duero along the shore vnto Fonterabie, or Easo, and from the Promontorie Charidemum, or Cap de Gates, or else Bara, or Vera, or Muxacra on the Mediterranean sea, vnto Venus Temple, or Cap de Crux, and all the people which are betwixt the Pyrenees and the limits which wee haue giuen to the prouinces of Betica and Lusitania, made the third member of Spaine: yet if wee shall beleue Mela, the Calaiques, that is, the inhabitants of Galicia, were comprehended among the Lusitanians; and that others haue made a fourth prouince of them during the emperours: accounting also the Carthagenoise for a fifth, and adding the sixth in Africke: for as much as all that which the Romane Emperours did possesse beyond the strait in Mauritania, was subject to the iustice of Spaine. But this tripartite diuision of Spaine, is the most auncient, and is not entertained by the Romanes, during their great exploits of armes, and conquests thereof; especially for the gouernement of justice among those nations, hauing wholly subdued them: for they erected Courts, which they called Conuents, appointing to euery prouince his iurisdiction. In Betica there were foure established, at Gades, Corduba, Astigi, and Seuille. In Lusitania three, at Emerita, Pax, or Pezagausta, and at Scalabita, or S. Iren. And in Tarraconense feuen, at Carthage, Tarracone, Cesar Augusta, Clunia, Astorga, at Lugo, and at Bracar.

As for the diuision of Spaine into the hither and further, that happened in the beginning when as the Romans came to make war against the Carthaginians, who held it in a manner all, or at the least had reduced it vnder their obedience. The riuier of Ebro made this separation, and the Romans called that part of Spaine where they first entred, the hither part, and the other beyond Ebro, the further: for they came first by sea vpon the coast of Catalogne, to Roses, to Empurias, or to Turracon, notwithstanding after they had enlarged their command on the other side Ebro, they did also extend the limits of Spain by little & little on that side.

as in the end it was bounded by the Promontorie of Scombraria, or Cap de Palos, neere to Carthage, and the descent of the mountaine Idubeda, and so through Castille, by the townes of Cuenca and Seguenza, vnto the Cantabres, or Biscanes. And this distinction continued in two principall gouernments, for matters of warre and state, till Augustus Caesar; the Romanes sending sometimes Consuls, sometimes Proconsuls, or Pretors, euerie one to gouerne in his iurisdiction. Afterwards Augustus reduced Spaine into one prouince, the which was entertained by his successors in the empire, at the least vnto Constantine the Great, who changed the Courts of iustice into another forme, making fise chiefe townes, and as many prouinces, that is, Tarracoe, Carthage, Seuille, Merida, and Bracara; the which was afterwards entertained by the Gothes, vpon the declining of the empire, who notwithstanding made it but one kingdome while they enjoyed it.

13 But after that the power of the Arabian Mahometists, who had subdued the empire of the Persians, and extinguished the name of other Potentates in the East, had extended it selfe vnto the farthest bounds of Africke, and into the prouinces of Europe, which lay neere vnto it, Spaine which was not without vices and defects in the chief members thereof, being suddenly invaded & overrun by this nation, being euer an enemy to peace and good gouernment, was dismembred, & diuided again into diuers principalities, the names wherof we retaine vnto this day; that is, Ouedo and Leon, Nauarre, Arragon, Cattelogne, Valence, Murcia, Granada, Tollede, Castillia, Gallicia, and Portugal, which for the most part had distinct titles of kingdomes, some being held by the Moores, and others defended by the Gothes and them of the country. Of euerie of which kingdomes we meane to make mention in this historie, and to continue it, with the helpe of God, vntill that all Spaine was reduced vnder the command of one king, although it hold still the former diuisions, and their limits, as they were set downe in the time of the Arabians and Moores.

For Cattelogne, which comprehends the auintient Indigetes, Castellans, Leetanes, and Acetanes, runnes along the Mediterranean shore, from Cap de Cruz, vnto Alfaques, to the mountaine of Moncia, and S. Peters fontaine, where there is a little brooke called Cinia, which makes the limits.

Hauing pass this river, the Bourg of Vimero is the beginning of Valence, which holds on to Alicante, and in this realme in old time were comprehended the Edetanes, Illecaones, and Contestanes.

Then they enter vpon the borders of Murcia and Carthage, which extend as farre as Almerie, by the Contestanes, Bastitanes, and some part of the Bastules.

From Gibaltar to the mouth of Guadiana, are the banks of Andelouzia, which some say was so called, for that it is before Lusitania, as if they would say, Ante-Lusitania. Others deriue the name from the Vandales, which haue held it, and call it Vandalusia: There did the Turditanes, and a part of the Celtique people dwell.

After which they enter into Portugal, which runs on vnto the river Minio, where it falls into the sea, the auintient limits of the Lusitanians, and of the Gallique Breccaires. This realme according to the suruey which king Sebastian caused to be made in our time, contains 260 leagues in circuit, wherof there is an hundred and twentie towards the sea, and an hundred and fortie to the land.

Gallicia follows from Minio, Bagone, and Pontueudra, vnto Ribadeo; they were in old time the Lucentes.

Then they come to the Asturians of Ouedo; from Castropol to Llamas, from Llamas to Castro Deordiales, are the banks of the Asturians of Sentillana. These people alone haue retained their auintient name. After which followes the coast of Biscaie, where is Portugalette and Bilbao, and stretcheth vnto Ondarroa. Then they come to Guipiscoa at Montroico, which ends at Fontarabie. These were ancient Cantabrians, and part Autrigones, Caristians, Vardules, and Valcons vpon the sea.

Nauarre lyes for the most part vpon the sides and vallies of the Pyrenées, which enter into the country of Spaine by Ronseual, by the valley of Salefar, and the valley Roncal, vnto Hifana, which is the limit of Arragon, and passeth vnto Logogno, where it confines with Castillia the old. It was the country of the Valcons, Vardules, Caristians, and other their neighbours.

Leon was in old time part of Asturia.

Castillia the old and new, comprehended all the middle countries of Spaine, betwixt the Gallicia, and nations aboue named.

As for the passage of the Pyrenées, if these hills went in a direct line, the passage would bee short betwixt the two seas, for they say, that both the one and the other may be easily scene in a cleere day from the tops of some of them, yea from that of S. Adrian.

Spaine is then both in general and in particular, as we haue descibed it: and if we consider well the situation of this region, we may rightly say, that it is rampared and defended by nature against all the attempts and enterprises of strangers, as much as any country in the world, being compassed in with the daungerous gulfs of the two seas, and walled vp behind with the hard passages of the Pyrenée mountains: being moreover of a temperat and whole some ayre, and hauing a soyle fit to nourish all things. For there are neither violent winds, nor thicke foggy vapours, nor any insupportable heat of the Sunne: but the aire is sweet and calme, being continually refreshed with the North and Westerne winds which come from the sea.

It was Spaine which gaue courage to the Carthaginians to attempt those high enterprises which wee read of them, and did furnish them with meanes to entertaine so many mercinarie fouldiours, wherewith for so many yeares they did trouble and annoy the Romane empire, and other nations, without cost or daunger to their owne citizens, who in all these wars did hunt after nothing but honour and profit, to the prejudice of Spaine, and with the bloud of other people.

Wee haue before made some mention how rich it was in mynes of gold, silver, and all other kinds of metall: let vs now say boldly, that nature had heapt vp mountaines of treasure there, and that the auintients did rightly say in tearmes besitting their Idolatrie, That Pluto dwelt vnder the couering of this earth: the which was the cause of infinit calamities to the Spaniards. For these greedie robbers came from all parts, being drawne thither with the desire of gaine: so as the best aduised were forced to forbid the vse of gold and silver among them by an expresse law. Among others the Betique prouince, which now hath the name of Andalusia, Granada, and thereabouts, was exceeding rich of mines of gold and silver, and yet the soyle was verie fertile in fruits, the which seemes to be against naturall reason.

When as the Carthaginians came first into Spaine, vnder the conduct of Amilcar Barca, they found among the Turditanes, the verie mangers for their horses, and hoggeheads, made of pure silver. Then they began to digge new mynes, and did cruelly toyle the people in those workes; and it is said, that out of one onely myne or pit called Bebelo, of his name that found it neere vnto the frontier of Aquitaine, Hannibal did draw about three thousand crownes profit euerie day. The Romanes discovered others neere vnto Carthage, where they had foure hundred daily at worke, and did receiue euerie day fise and twentie thousand Drachmes, amounting in a manner to two thousand and fise hundred French crownes. Yea the plough-men many times in their tillage, raised vp with their ploughshares crusts of gold: and many times vpon the sands the fisher-men did find great store of graines of this mettall, verie pure, which had bene brought from the mountaines with the floods: yea if they carried water into a drie ground, and watered the earth, the gold would presently shine: so as there were more found in Spaine gathering vp of gold, than in digging out of their mynes and pits. There was as great abundance of copper, yron, tinne, and all other sorts of mynes, and exceeding good.

Their large and spacious plaines and mountaines did feed infinit troupes of all sorts of cattell: the forests were full of red deere, wild boares, and other wild beastes, and all sorts of foule. They say, that in South Spaine there was oftentimes such abundance of conies, as they were a great ruine vnto their fruits, spoyling the roots vnder the ground, with their working, so as they were much annoyed with them, being ignorant by what means to take them, vntill they were taught to vse ferrets, the which were brought them out of Africke.

If the land did so abound in all things, what shall wee thinke of the sea? The shore (saith Strabo) is full of oysters, and of all other shell-fish: yea in the Ocean, whereas all things exceed in greatnesse and multitude those which are in the other sea, by reason of the flowing and ebbing thereof. There are to be seene huge Whales, Grampasses, and other such monsters of the sea, which spout out water, the which seemes a faine off, to bee great pillars or towers of cloudes. How much shall we say that the Congres and Mullers of that Ocean doe exceed ours? About Carteia the Pourcelaines are of ten pounds weight, but without the strait the smaller Mullers and Congres weigh commonly foure score pounds, the Poulpe or many feet, therefore, the fish called the Cuttle, are two cubits long: the Thon comes thither in great abundance, delighting in the acornes which fall into the sea, from a certaine kind of small oske which growes along the shore, yeelding such abundance of this fruit, as being afterwards cast vp by the waues of the sea, the banks both within and without the straits, are exceeding full, but especially the Ocean, wherewith this fish (which is verie common in that sea) is much delighted, and growes verie fat with it. Many other commendations are given by the aunts to Spaine, whereof they might well iudge, that neuer went out of Italie, by the number of great shipping laden with merchandise and prouision of victuals, which came daily out of that countrey, to the ports of Ostia, Puzzol, and others of Italie, wherein Strabo, Plinie, Mela, and other authors, may satisfie the curious. So as it hath not bene impertinent, if the Poets haue placed the delightful Elisian fields in this part of the world.

Wee cannot with reason doubt of that which they haue written: for although that the mountaines of Galicia, Asturia, Biscaie, Nauarre, and Arragon, which containe a great countrey, seeme rather to bewray a defect than any great abundance of fruits; and that in Castille, and part of Portugall, the drought is not fit to bring forth corne: yet considering Spaine in generall, and the whole circuit, wee shall find daily by experience, that it is rich and plentifull of all those things, wherewith it was in old times furnished. For if at that time they did feed whole armies, so doe they at this day great and well peopled cities and townes, better frequented and inhabited than in those times.

this day.

As for rich mettals, we must confesse, that it yeelds now to antiquitie, and no wonder, for how could the earth supplie the greedie couetousnesse of men, who haue not ceased for many yeares, and with great toyle to digge into the bowels of the earth? Wee see at this day the pits and caues, out of the which the Romanes drew their siluer, neere vnto Carthage, with great heapes of drossie like vnto mountaines. But yet this countrey is not so bare and walled, but that they haue found in our age, at Guadalcanal, a myne as rich as any at the Indies, which our elders doe witness: and there is no doubt, but that gold, siluer, and copper, are to be found in other places.

Iron and Steele
abounds there.

Biscaye and Guepuscoa alone can furnish yron and Steele ynough for a world, and with workes which are made of this mettall, namely with Armes, being the verie storehouse of Spaine. Vitriol, Brimstone, Alum, Orpigment, mineral salt, and such other things, are found in Spaine, both for their owne vse and their neighbours. What wanteth it of the fertilitie and diuersitie of all sorts of good fruits in a good part of Portugall, Andalusia, and almost all along the Mediterranean sea? But who can condemne

eum

A euen the montaines of this region, of barrenesse, which beare se good wines, and so many sorts of fruits?

To conclude, Fraunce, England, and Flanders, are familiar witness of the fruitfulness and delights of Spaine: and if they will not serue, wee will appeale to Asia it selfe. Their raisins, oliues, figges, oranges, limons, dates, cytrons, pomegranets, sugar, saffron, and such things, are dispersed into all countreies, and are better, and more fauourie than in any other place.

In what place of the world doe you find more sorts of good hearbs, or more pleasant gardens, than in the prouince of Valence? From thence wee haue the best silkes in the world, cotton of Murcia, scarlet, crimson, and other precious colours, with sweeter and pleasant perfumes. Finally, all the fences of man are wonderfully pleased with that which comes from thence, and growes in that happie region.

And as for the hilly countrey, which they hold to be barren, and the plaines to be drie, euery one knowes what commoditie those places doe yeeld: and wee find it by experience in Spaine. There they feed infinit troupes of sheepe, whose wooll is admired throughout the world: and yeeld vs also infinit store of Spanish leather, necessarie for many vses, and verie profitable for their neighbours.

They haue timber to serue them as well for the building of houses, as for shipping, whereof they haue great store. And who can denie, that in Nauarre, Asturia, and Galicia, there are goodly and fruitfull vallies? Can wee desire a countrey more abounding in all good things, than that which is betwixt the riuers of Duero and Minio, at this time belonging vnto the Realme of Portugall? the which being scarce a day and a halfe journey in length, and much lesse in breadth, hath an Archbishopricke, which is that of Braga, Porto Gallego, a bishopricke, and contains in it about one thousand and foure hundred parishes, five hundred Colledges of Canons, and one hundred and thirtie Conuents: it hath six ports of the sea, about two hundred bridges of stone, and two thousand and five hundred fountains.

But who doth not admire the Genets of Spaine, which I had almost forgotten, their beautie, swiftnesse, and easinesse to breake, especially of those of Andalusia, which drinke of the water of Guadalquivir, whereby, according to the Spaniards opinion, they are made more nimble and swift? Of this race was the horse which Julius Caesar esteemed so much, as when hee was dead, hee caused his image to be set vp in Venus Temple at Rome. Of them and of the Lusitanians their neighbours, the aunts would make vs beleue, that they were conceiued by the winds which the mares did receiue when they were desirous of the horse, blowing from the West, namely from the places where the horses feed; the which some thinke not impossible. Of all these things no man that hath any knowledge of the world can doubt.

And if any one would object, That Spaine cannot bee so fertile as wee make it, for that they are supplied with corne from Fraunce, England, Sicile, and Germanie: and that they carrie great store of linnen cloth, and other merchandise, out of Brittain, Normandie, Flanders, Holland, and elsewhere, without the which the Spaniards must of necessitie perish: Let him consider the great regions discovered by the Spaniards, within these hundred and twentie yeares: what great fleets Spaine hath continually entertained, rigged, and victualled, as well for the East as Westerne voiaiges; and what need they haue to furnish those countreies with such things as they borrow, whereof without doubt they should haue sufficient for themselves, but not to furnish a new world: the which doth also waite their men daily to people these discovered countreies: And withall let him adde the haughtie and couetous disposition of the Spanishe nation, who doe willingly leaue their labour, to goe vnto the mynes, or to goe to the warres, and neuer follow any worke, but when they are forced by necessitie.

15 Having hitherto discoursed of the situation and fertilitie of Spaine, let vs speake something of the manners and kind of life, which the Spaniards haue from time to time obserued; that being entred into our discourse, wee may not bee interrupted therewith. When as the Carthaginians came into Spaine, and long after the Romanes had got some footing,

footing, there were few walled townes in the country, but many great burroughs and villages. The most ciuile were they of the Betique prouince, and the worst fouldiours of them all, giuing themselves to trade of merchandise by sea, and somewhat to letters, and in a manner like vnto those that liue vpon the coast of the Mediterranean sea. But as for the rest, they were all rustick and barbarous, namely the Mountainers, and aboute all the Gallicians, Asturians, and Cantabrians, whose ordinarie trade was to rob and steale, contemning labour, vntill that the Romanes taught them to liue more ciuilly and peaceably, ruining their forts and retreats. They were traitors, spies, and readie vpon all occasions to steale. They carried targuets two foot long, & a dagger at their sides, clothed in a doublet of linnen cloth stined and quilted: and these were their armes. For there were no cuirasses nor head-peeces among them, but on their heads they carried high hats made of sinewes, and on their legges boots of haire, and in their hands many darts: some of them carried jauelins whereof the heads were of copper. They wore long haire like women. Their exercises were fencing and running both on foot and horsebacke, and their combats by troupes: They loued libertie aboute all things, which made the Romanes to see many examples of crueltie, even in the weakest sex: for there were many mothers among the Cantabrians, which slue their own children, many daughters who for the like cause murdered their parents: so deere libertie was vnto this nation; to maintaine the which, and fearing they might be forced in any thing, they did vially carrie payson about them: and if they were surprisid and made slaues, they fought by some notable villanie to giue their masters occasion to kill them. It was often scene, that when they were tyed to the crosse to be executed, they did sing for joy of their approaching death: but some haue shewed this resolution vpon good and commendable occasions, as to conceal the secrets of their masters and friends, or after they had reuenged their death, or the wrong which had bene done them.

Their religion was infamous, for they sacrificed humane creatures vnto their gods, euen their prisoners, cutting off their right hands, to offer them vp: Their Priests and Duiques tooke their conjectures from the intrals both of men and beausts; but aboute all they tooke their diuination from their countenances, when as they receiued the deadly blow, and fell to the ground.

As for their manner of liuing, it was simple and rude: they dranke water, lay vpon the ground, and did eat the fesh of goats which they did sacrifice vnto Mars: they made cakes of dried acornes, the which they did eat warme. They did willingly banquet with their parents, and had tables and seats of stone, against the wall, where they did appoint the most honourable places according to their ages and dignities. They had no vse of siluer coined, but did exchange ware for ware. They had a beaustly and filthie manner of washing and perfuming themselves, with vrine which had stood long stinking, with the which both men and women did rub their bodies and faces, yea euen their teeth, imagining that it was a preferuatiue against many infirmities; the which is not disallowed by the Physitians. This filthie obseruation was common then in Spaine among them all.

They did severely punish malefactors, and especially parricides, whom they did stone without their confines. If any one were sicke, they carried him into the highways, and corners of the streets, after the manner of the Egyptians, to take counsell and helpe of such as had bene troubled with the like diseases. Vntill the time of the Romane emperours, they had vsed boats made of beausts skins afterwards they began to make them of wood, raking the bodies of great trees, and making them hollow like vnto troughes.

In this simplicitie and rudenesse did the ancient Spaniards of the mountaine liue, which were those of Galicia, Asturia, and Cantabria, and the inhabitants of the Pyrenees, whose country was full of wood and water, but otherwise verie barren: by reason whereof they enjoyed their libertie long, and were last of all subdued by the Romanes: so as in the time of the emperor Tiberius Nero, there was yet some contention. The Iberians, and Celtiberians were somewhat more ciuile, for that they had more commerce with strangers, and were neere vnto the Mediterranean sea, which was more frequented than the Ocean. In the war they carried round targuets, fortified with sinewes, short swords, darts, and slings: in their battails they did mingle some light horsemen with their footmen: they did accuse them of

A horses to hills and vallies, and by that meanes kept them in breath, and made them swift, yea they did teach them to kneele when they made a certaine signe. They attired themselves of blacke wooll and short. They prepared yron to forge their armes and harnes, druing it out into plates, the which they buried in the ground for certaine dayes, vntill the rust had eaten away that which was vnprofitable, & then they made their swords and other cutting weapons. They did commonly carie two swords, and did fight more willingly on foot than on horsebacke: for when as they found themselves to haue any advantage vpon the enemy, they left their horses, to ioyne with their footmen, pursuing them that fled with great agilitie, the which was naturall to all Spaniards. They were reasonably courteous to strangers; but they did punish them that had done them any wrong verie cruelly. They did lue of fesh and fruits, and did drinke water with honie, whereof their country did abound; and sometimes they had wine, which they bought from strangers coming from the neighbour coasts. Their neighbours with whom they had the greatest amitie and commerce, were the Vaccaces, and Areuaces, at that time a part of Castilia the old: they agreed well with them in all sorts of traffique. Euerie yeare they made a diuision of their lands, and assigned them by portions and lots to certaine particular persons, who did till and sow for the rest, whilst that others were employed in the warres, or about some other affaires: then they diuided the fruits which they gathered. And if any one were convicted, that he had embeslied any thing, he was punished with death. In time of peace they did banquet and daunce, leaping and frisking with great agilitie: and they went to the warre according to the measure of instruments, singing rusticke and militarie songs.

Such in a manner were the Lusitanians, with whom the Celtes were mingled, and feared in their country, leading their liues for the most part as theues, which they learned from them of Galicia and Asturia, their neighbours. Generally all the most barbarous Spaniards were nimble and active, so as they could easily escape from their enemies, or pursue them when they had the better; neither were their spirits lesse active than their bodies: great vnderakers of few words: patient and hardie in trauell, enduring hunger, thirst, and other discomforts. Their women were nothing daintie, but did exercise themselves like vnto the men: and if they were deliuered of child, they lay not long, but fell soone to their worke: they walsh their children as soone as they were borne in the neereft brooke, and then they wrapt them vp in their feshing clothes. But after that the Romanes were entred, and somewhat settled in Spaine, these people were forced by little and little to learne another discipline, and to frame themselves to a more ciuile kind of life, being governed by more politike lawes, they of Betica and the Turditanes exceeding the rest alwaies in mildnesse and humanitie: for these were presently changed to the Romanes manners and discipline, forgetting their owne language, to imbrace the other. Many townes were also built and peopled in diuers parts of Spaine, and the Romanes and Latines mixt with the Originaries of the country, who accustomed themselves so well to the Latine tongue, as it since continued in Spaine: for the Castilian tongue at this day is nothing in a manner but a corrupted Latine. And the Spaniards grew such, as many among them did make their fame equall with the most esteemed among the Romanes: the two Senecas were Spaniards, with Silina, Martial, Lucan, Pomponius Mela, Portius Latro the Orator, Quintilian, Colomella, and the good emperours Traian and Theodosius, were Spaniards.

The Romanes by the experience which they had, and the more to augment their owne glorie, gave great titles of honor and commendation to this nation, whom they found somewhat instructed in armes, and some discipline, by the Carthaginians. They call it rich in fouldiours, and a seminary of the enemies armies, which had fashioned that great captain Hannibal, and in all they speak highly of Spaine, & not without reason: for the great courage and resolution of them of Numantia, was memorable, a towne without walls, without towers, and without defences, feared only vpon a little hill, and covered on the one side with a riuer, and defended by a few fouldiours, who notwithstanding withstood the force of mightie Roman armies for the space of 14 yeres, & not only made head against them, but also repulst them off to their great losse. In the end being besieged by about 40000 men, or, as some say, 60000, being prest by famine, and forced to demand a peace, finding no grace with their enemies, who had compassed them in with forts and trenches, being refused vpon the last refuge, which was death, they made so furious a fallie vpon the Romanes, as an infinit number of them were slaine vpon the place, which was a deere purchase vnto the enimie. This happened during the Celtiberic warre, which continued twentie yeares. This magnanimitie, courage, adrefse and militarie discipline, were thus begun, and by little and little augmented in this nation by the Carthaginians and Romanes, in making warre against them: whom without doubt they might haue bin able to haue resisted, if they had knowne their owne force and wealth, and if they had sooner learned good lawes and policie, which maintaine people in amitie and concord. This was the first prouince which the Romanes did assaile vpon the firme land, and the last which they subdued. The strength of Pompeyes armie when he encountered Cesar in Macedonia, were the Spanishe bands, which were in his armie, if he could haue vsed them.

Faith and constancie in the end tooke place among this nation, whereof Hannibal had often made triall. But what example can we find more memorable, than the fidelitie of the Saguntines to the people of Rome, for the which they lost wiues, children, citie, and liues?

By little and little they also left that diuelish superstition of sacrificing of men, accustoming themselves to more mildnesse and humanitie, and practising daily better discipline vnder the Romans command; as if God would reforme them by their meanes, and prepare them to receiue the true and wholesome doctrine of Iesus Christ: the which this nation did embrace happily in the beginning, with great fruit and notable examples in the Church of God. But after that the barbarous nations were dispersed ouer all Europe, hauing troden vnder foot the Majestie of the Romane empire, and invaded the chiefe prouinces thereof, chased away all learning, and good discipline, and infected the earth with heresies and superstitious ceremonies, the ignorance of God and of his seruice, entred into Spaine, which our age doth yet feele. Then was a time when as they kept publike schools of Magicke arts and conjuring, to the which they had made subject Philolophie, Astrologie, Physicke, yea and Diuinitie it selfe.

But leauing these things which belong to other discourses, let vs say, That the Spaniards in those dayes were of diuers conuersations, as they were a mixture of diuers nations. They are apt to receiue discipline in all things, according to the disposition of princes and lords, whom they serue, they are faithfull and constant vnto them, desiring to be in perpetuall action, by reason of the agitation of their spirits, which is like vnto the agilitie of their bodies, who for the most part are leane and drie. They are sober and vigilant, but verie couetous, patient of heat, cold, hunger, thirst, and all other discomforts, especially if there be any hope of profit or honour, for the which they hazard themselves resolutely to all dangers: they desire to be well apparelled, and esteeme armes and horses aboue all things: they are impudent braggers of their owne actions, vertue, and nobilitie: ciuile to conuerse withall, louing good townes, copious in their language, much giuen to women; for the most part vnlearned, shewing little art in that they do, disdaining labour, & a country life. The women are sober, louing their husbands or their friends deere, but wonderfull delicat, and curious of painting and perfumes, retaining therein nothing of the auncient Spaniards: they nor their children drinke not any wine. The country language at this day, is for the most part Roman or Latine corrupted and mingled with some other words of such nations as haue held it in these last ages. The Biscane tongue is preferred in Biscaye, and part of Nauarre, and other their neighbours: but in Granada, Andalusia, Murcia, and Valence, especially among the rusticke multiuude, the Moorish and the Arabian tongue is in great vse: and in all ages almost, the people of Spaine haue vsed diuers languages, and were different one from another. Making an end of this booke, we will relate in the following, by what meanes and titles euerie nation hath from time to time held it.

The Tyrians of the race of Iauet

Carthaginians desire more to be great than just.

One ages before the first warre betwixt the Romanes and the Carthaginians, which grew by reason of the Isle of Sicile, the Gaditanes extracted from the cite of Tyr. couetous and malicious according to the nature of flauies, from whence it may be they were illused (for we read, that the bondmen of the Tyrians on a time slew all their masters, and made themselves Lords of the towne; the which they held vntill Alexander the Great, who did root out the race of them) began to torment the Spaniards their neighbours, chasing them out of their lands and possessions, making them flauies, and entreating them in the vildest manner they could; which was the cause of great warre and diuision in that quarter of Spaine: so as injuries on either part encreasing daily, the naturall borne disdain of these strangers, and enuying their greatesse, made a generall league of many Commonalties against them: whereupon they of Gades finding themselves too weake to make head against so great a multitude, they resolved to call in to their succour, and to the spoyle of Spaine, the Carthaginians of Africke, their brethren, comming from the same race and towne. The cite of Carthage was then a great Commonweale, the which had a great iurisdiction among the Africans, and fought onely to enlarge their Empire; so as they were ready to run into Spaine, with this honest and religious pretext, to succour the oppressed: whereas they not onely freed the Gaditanes from all feare of the Spaniards, but did also subdue the people of Spaine, scetled themselves there, and gouerned it as their Prouince: from whence they drew afterwards so great treasure and other commodities, as they presumed to assaile the greatest Potentates in the world.

The name of Spaniards, before this warre, had beene great among other nations, onely in regard that they serued as a prey to all strangers: which were they only which held the lower countrey, and the coast of the Mediterranean sea, and part of the Ocean, South and West: among the which, some nations of Europe and Asia had built and peopled some townes. As for those which liued in the heart of the countrey, and in the mountains, their fame was more obscure, being for the most part rough and barbarous, hauing scarce any commerce with strangers, but to rob and steale, which was their best practise: and therefore vntill the coming of the Carthaginians, they had benee as it were free, and assured both from inuasion and trade, doing wrong rather than taking any: but afterwards they did all in generall leaue to manage armes with discipline, they vnderooke parties, contracted alliances among themselves, and with other nations, growing by little and little more politicke, ciuile, and courteous. The Celtes were already mingled with the Iberians about the riuier of Ebro; and passing on, they obtained lands and habitations in Lusitania, and in a corner of Betica, which was neere vnto them: then passing the riuier of Duero, they planted themselves betwixt it and Minio; and consequently to the mountains, in the countrey, which from them tooke the name of Galicia, and doth still hold it; whereas they built the towne of Porto, vpon the confines of the Lusitanians, which is at this time a Bishopricke, retaining the name of Portugall, and so goes on to the Westerne sea.

The Celtes, Iberians, and other Spaniards farre from the sea, as they were almost like in manners, had (as is sayd) maintained their reputation free and vnited, vntill this descent of the Carthaginians: who hauing resolved to settle themselves in Spaine, seized first vpon the Island of Iuisa, and fortified it, Masse being Generall of this Armie. This was five hundred sixtie two yeares before the coming of Christ, and an hundred eightie nine yeares after the foundation of Rome. After which time, watching their opportunity, eight and fortie yeares after, they sent a great fleet of shippes into Spaine, led by one Maherbal, vnder colour to relieue the Gaditanes, who had benee vanquished by Baucus Capi, then reigning ouer the Turditanians, their neighbours. The name of the protection and support of this puissant Commonweale of Carthage, purchased the Gaditanes a peace and free trade; the which drew so manie families from Carthage into the Island and Citie, as exceeding the rest, they got the absolute command thereof, Maherbal yet liuing.

The Carthaginians continued for a time without any care of the affaires of Spaine, being very much afflicted with drought and other discommodities, they hauing great

A warre in Sicile and Sardinia, but about the yeare 255 they vnderooke againe the conquest of Spaine, whither they sent Afdrubal and Amilcar, sonnes to Mago. Passing by Sardinia, Afdrubal was slaine there, leauing three children, Hannibal the eldest, Afdrubal, and Pappho. Amilcar was diuerted from Spaine by the warres of Sicile, where he was also slaine, and had three sonnes in like manner, Himilco, Hanno, and Gisgo. The yeare 272 after the foundation of Rome, they sent a small supplie of nine hundred fouldiors into Spaine, whom they would haue land in the Islands of the Baleares; but they were repulled: and soon after Pappho, sonne to Afdrubal, had charge to keepe the Spaniards in awe (who were solicited by the Africane Moores their neighbours, to ioyne with them against the Carthaginians) who by his wisdom restrained them; and moreover, got sufficient forces from them to force the Moores to sue for peace, and to giue ouer their enterprises against the cite of Carthage. In this warre the vertue of Saru of Barce (a towne neere vnto Carthage) author of the Barcinian faction, was very famous. Pappho liued in great reputation, who after his death was by opinion receiued into the number of the gods; the which he had procured during his life. For he had caused certaine birds to be taught to speake, and made them learne to say, That Pappho was a great god. Which birds being let flye, they chattered out those words in the fields, to the great admiration of the people. After his decease the Prouince of Spaine was committed to Himilco and Hanno (the sonnes of Amilcar) his cousins, who tried by faire and plausible means to draw the inhabitants of the Baleares to liue in amitie with their Commonweale.

C Hanno being arriued at Gades, and desiring to discouer the countrey, and the coast of Spaine without the strait, he sayled vnto the holy Promontorie, or Cap S. Vincent: and hauing giuen aduice vnto the Senat of that which he had seene and vnderstood, he obtained leaue to continue his discouerie as well vpon the coast of Spaine as Africke, in the Ocean sea: whereupon he prepared two fleets; the one for the coast of Europe, and to passe vnto the Gaules, and farther if he might; the charge whereof he gaue vnto his brother Himilco, and of the other he would be captaine and conductor himselfe, and sayle towards Africke: so in the beginning of the yeare 307 of the foundation of Rome they set sayle, either of them taking his course. Himilco parting from the port of Heraclee, which was in the strait, coasted the Mesenians and Selbitians, passed the Promontorie of Iuno, and the mouth of the riuier Cyllbis, which runneth betwixt Barbarie and Huelua, neere vnto the which in old time was the Island of Erythrea, which is not to be seene at this day, vnlesse it be that of Gades it selfe: and then he discouered the Tartessian forrests, and did see the Turditanes coast, whereas the riuier Betis fell into the sea at that time by foure mouthes, afterwards reduced to two, but now there is but one. Passing on, there came into his sight Mont Cassius, rich in veines of Tyne, from whence it is likely it tooke his name: beyond the which, the riuier, which they now call Tinte, (whose water is excellent good to dye blacke) falls into the sea, neere vnto Palos of Moguer. This riuier was in old time called Iberus, as that which passeth and loofeth it selfe at Tarracone. From thence Himilco passed neere vnto Proserpinus Temple, built vpon a point which runneth farre into the sea; vnto which place come the Marian hills: and a little more forward riseth Mont Zephrus, whose top is alwaies hidden in the clouds: about the which for a good distance the shoare is full of rockes vnto Mont Saturne, the which is among the Centis, by the which the riuier Anas or Guadiana doth run; at the mouth whereof were two Islands, whereof the greatest was called Agone. Passing on by a long course towards the holy Promontorie, and hauing doubled it, this Carthaginian armie came to the port of Cenis, neere vnto the Islands which they now call Persegueres. Not farre from thence dwelt the Dragans, a people of Lusitania, compassed in by the mountaines Cephis and Sempis, right against the Islands of Stremmie, the which stands farre into the sea: but neerer vnto these Dragans was another Island called Alcala, about the which the waters were blew and wonderfull cleere, but very stinking, whereof there are at this day no markes. About Alcala was the mountaine Cyrrilian. Himilco hauing sayled along the coast, he discouered the Island Pelagic, full of greene trees, the which he durst not touch, being consecrated to Saturne, hearing that if any saylers would land there, the sea was troubled. The shoare which goes vnto the mouth of Tayo was inhabited by the Saries, a cruell and a barbarous people, whose Promontorie was for that cause called Barbareque. There notwithstanding was planted the Greeke Colonie Olyppo, which is Lisbon at this day. These Nauigators came to the Promontorie Nerium, which which is Finis terræ, and to the neighbour Ilands called also Stremnies, for that the inhabitants of the Island of Stremnie about mentioned, being forced to leaue it for the multitude of Serpents which were there, they rettyred into these Ilands. There is no further mention made of Himileos nauigation.

upon the coast of Africa.

As for Hanno, he made a longer voyage: his armie consisted of many vessels, carrying about thirtie thousand persons of both sexes: hee planted a Colonie vpon the sea coast of Africke (the which is now Azamor) the which he called Thimateria: he passed on beyond the foot of Mont Atlas, towards Numidia and Lybia: he discovered the fortunat Ilands, which are the Canaries, and those of Cap Verd, which is the point of the Hesperides; the Island of Argin, in old time Cerne; and the Gorgones, so named by him; the mouths of the great riuer Niger, the which hath Crocodiles in it, and sea horses as well as Nil, vntill he came vnto the Island named at this day S. Thome, vnder the Equinoctiall. Some say, that hee doubled the point of Africke, or Cap bonne Esperance, and passed as farre as the Arabick sea, and from thence returned to Carthage by Egypt, reporting, That he had seene men all couered with haire; which it may be were Apes, for there are very great and dangerous ones in some part of Africa; and other wonders. He returned to Carthage five yeares after his departure.

It was in the yeare 312 of the foundation of Rome, when these two captaines vnderooke their voyages; Gisgo their brother gouerned Spaine in their absence: and thinking to returne to Carthage, to be partaker of the feasts and joy which were made in regard of their prosperous voyages, he perished with all his ships at sea.

Hannibal sent into Spaine.

Hannibal brother to Pfappho, and cousin to these, surnamed the ancient, was sent into Spaine, and with him Mago his kinsman. Mago stayed at the Baleares, and he passed to Calis: and some hold, that he built a fort at the place which is called Lagos, the which was named Port Hannibal: there was also built in his time, at the mouth of the riuer of Betis, Lucifers Temple, dedicated to the goddesse Venus, whose stane was called Phosphoros, or Lucifer: it is S. Lucar of Barraneda at this present. During their time and gouernment there grew great warre betwixt the Spaniards of Betica and the Lusitanians, dwelling by the riuer Anas, the which was nourished by the Carthaginians and their captaines Hannibal and Mago.

Warre in Sicily
by the Carthaginians.

The Commonweale of Carthage had then great warres in the Island of Sicily, kindled about the yeare 346 of the foundation of Rome, by the Agrigentines, who did murder the Carthaginian garrisons, being busie at their sacrifices: wherefore by decree of the Senat there were leuies of men made in Spaine, and in the Ilands of the Baleares. But the Agrigentines were defeated in battaile, and then besieged for the space of two yeares, who in the end were forced to yeeld to their mercie, who entreated them very roughly: whereupon they had recourse vnto Denis the old, by whose aduice they freed themselves of those that did oppresse them, and tooke from the Carthaginians the townes of Camerine and Gelce. Denis although he dissembled, seeming to be a neuter, found himselfe so engaged, as he was forced to take armes against the Carthaginians, by whom hee was vanquished, but with great losse of their men: the rest of the Carthaginian armie, where Himileo was had the leading of tenne thousand Spaniards, was consumed by the plague: whereat Himileo was so grieved, as being returned to Carthage, refusing to see either children or friends, he flew himselfe in his house. After these ruins, by the industrie of Denis a peace was concluded betwixt the Carthaginians & the Sicilians, or rather a truce for 30 yeares. This was in the yere 356 of the foundation of Rome.

About that time some ships of Carthage, dispersed by tempest, or else of set purpose following Hannos discoverie, or imitating his designs, came vnto a great Island, which wee may thinke to be that of S. Dominique at this day: which made them of Carthage to affect these voyages with such vehemencie, as to diuert them, the Senat resolved to cause them to be slaine which were returned, and had brought the newes, fearing least their citie and countrey should be vnpeopled.

New warres in Sicily.

The truce being expired, the Carthaginians prepared againe to warre in Sicily; during the which truce, they had advanced their authoritie and credit among the Spaniards, entertaining diuisions among them, and taking parties: so as they had meanes at one time to bring to the warres of Sicily 20000 foot and 1000 horse of that nation, making them by this means weak against their own designs: to which forces they added 300 Majorquins, which vied lings, and 10000 Africans, making Hanno chiefe of this armie, who should suddainly invade the Island, whilst

A whilst that Denis made warre in Italie. But Suniat a Carthaginian enuying Hannos charge, aduerted Denis of this preparation; and as he continued in this trecherie, he was discovered by the taking of a ship in the strait by them of Carthage, in the which were found his letters and aduertisements to Denis, written in Greeke; whereupon he was taken and punished: and it was decreed at Carthage, That no Carthaginian should learne the Greeke tongue: but Denis his armie at sea was defeated, whereby the Carthaginians affaires prospered in Sicily.

Denis being dead, and his sonne of the same name succeeding him, vnder the gouernment of Dion his kinsman, the warre ended by a long truce betwixt the Carthaginians & Sicilians, and Hanno returned with great treasure which he had gotte of those spoiles. He was presently sent to Calis, and Bostar to Majorca, and to that part of Spaine which is opposit Hanno tyrannizing over the people in his gouernment, prouoked them to rebell; so as to subdue & punish them, he called the Moores into Spaine, who assisted them cruelly. The complaints being come vnto Carthage, Hanno was called home and discharged of his gouernment; who in diddian there- of attempted to payson the whole Senat in a banquet which he prepared for his daughters marriage. This trecherie being discovered and dissembled, they presently made Sumptuarie law, limiting the number of persons, and the sorts of meats at such feasts. But hauing elaped punishment, yet fearing it, he fought notwithstanding to trie his force, with a multitude of slaues which he, his kinsmen, and friends had: wherewith the people being incensed, they besieged him, & tooke him in his house, and then deliuered him to the Iudges; by whose decree his eies

B were put out, his lims broken, his body torne with whips, and then hung vpon a cross: his children and all his kinsfolkes were also put to death, that they should haue no desire of reuenge. A cruell example, but excusable in the Africans, for the foulness of the offence and the interest of their country. The Carthaginians affecting much the conquest of Spaine, purified it without any disturbance, sending good Gouernors and wife captaines: wherein they prospered daily in such sort, as they might terme themselves masters thereof, and so did enjoy it for about 350 yeares, all the people of Spaine being their subjects or allies, vntill that the Romans began to make some practices, seeking to draw the people vnto them, and to be assured of them, when any occasion should be offered. So either of these Commonweales made way for their great designs, yet not entering into any ouert action: but the Island of Sicily assailed by the

D Carthaginians, and especially the towne of Messina, did so engage them, as it could not be appeased but with the ruine of the one party. For the space of 115 yeares there was either open war, preparations for war, or a counterfeit peace betwixt the Romans and the Carthaginians. They entered into this hostilitie 489 yeres after the foundation of Rome, and about 262 yeres before Christ. This first warre was decided in Sicily, and in the Mediterranean sea, during 24 yeares; in which time the people of Spaine did adhere sometimes to one partie, sometimes to another, as their affaires succeeded: the Carthaginians being in the end forced to demand a peace of the Romans, the rest of their hatred and spleene continued yet in Spaine for a time: for those which had rebelled against the Carthaginians, sought to maintain their liberties by the fauour of the Romans, who encouraged and assisted them vnder hand: yet Amilcar, surnamed

the hatred betwixt the Romans and Carthaginians.

E Beres, father to Hannibal, being appointed Gouernor and Lieutenant general for the Carthaginians in Spaine, subjected vnder their obedience almost all the nations and townes which had beene distracted, and did shake the allies of the contrarie faction. He was an irreconcilable enemy to the Romans, and would that his sonne Hannibal should succeed him in the like affection, and (as we say) should sucke it from his mothers breasts, binding him thereunto in his youth by othes and religious ceremonies. For as he prepared to passe into Spaine with the armie, offering the accustomed sacrifices vnto their gods, to haue a prosperous voyage, he caused his sonne Hannibal (being then scarce nine yeares old) to approach vnto the altar, and hauing commanded him to lay his hand vpon the sacrifice, he made him sweare, That as soone as he should be able to beare armes, he should employ them to annoy the Romans, and declare himselfe their enemy. Whilst that Amilcar relies too much on his good fortune, and pursues the

Afrabad his sonne in law succeeded him, a wife and a valiant man, vnder whom Hannibal learned his first precepts of warre. And as the troubles did not onely continue, but also encrease encrease in Spaine, new rebellions growing daily, by reason of the Carthaginians crueltie G and tyrannie, the Romans were sollicit by many to take them into their protection; whereunto they did willingly giue care. Whereupon the two Commonweales were vpon teames to enter into a more cruell warre than euer: to auoid the which, it was aduised by the Senate of Rome to send Quintus Lucilius into Spaine, to treat with the Carthaginians, and to settle some good counsell for the affaires of that country. So as betwixt Lucilius for the Romans, and Asdrubal for the Carthaginians, there was a peace renewed and confirmed betwixt those two Estates, and the friends and allies of either part in Spaine; appointing the riuier of Ebro for a limit and barre betwixt them, beyond the which they might not lead any armie. And for that the towne of Saguntum being then rich and populous, held them long in debate, either desiring to haue it on his faction, in the end (not able to agree) it was concluded, That it should remaine neuter, vfe her owne lawes, and be maintained in her libertie, and that neither partie should attempt any thing to the preiudice thereof.

A new accord betwixt the Ro-manes and Carthaginians.

The Estate of Spaine being thus ordered, the peace (which was not well assured betwixt the Romanes and Carthaginians) continued three and twentie yeres, or thereabouts, accounting from the day that it was concluded in Sicile. Asdrubal gouerned Spaine beyond Ebro eight yeres, and aduanced the affaires of his Commonweale more by mildnesse than by armes; whom they make the founder of new Carthage: but returning to a rigorous counsell, his crueltie incited a Gaule, who serued him, to murder him, reuenging the death of a Lord of Lusitania his master, whom Asdrubal had caused to be slain, whose head he caused to bee carried through the country vpon a lance, after that he had hanged the bodie vpon a crosse. I This seruant being taken, died in the extremity of his torments, singing and laughing for joy that he had done the deed.

The greatest resolution of a seruant louing his master.

Before the death of Asdrubal it was propounded in the Senat of Carthage, If it were expedient to send Hannibal into Spaine, vnder the discipline of his brother in law, who demaunded him? Among the Senators there was one of great esteeme, called Hanno, being of a contrarie faction to the familie of the Barciniens, which also was great and rich, either hauing their partisans. These pleaded vehemently, letting the Senat vnderstand on the one side, that Hannibal was bred vp in armes, and by that meanes did imitate his fathers vertues: the others to hinder this resolution, feared least the hatred which Hannibal bare vnto the Romans, K and whereof he made publicke profession, would ingage and draw their Commonweale into new troubles and calamities: For although the Carthaginians were exceeding ambitious, and in that regard enemies to all mankind, yet did they feare the magnanimitie and constancie of the Romans, and their valour, which they had tried. Besides, the forepassed warres as well against them, as against others, yea, against their owne mercinarie fouldiors, had wasted their treasure, vnsumishd them of ships, and consumed their best captaines; so as it behoued them to liue many yeres in peace, before they vnderooke any difficult warre. But their miserie, and that of Italie, would haue the Barciniens preuaile; and so Hannibal was sent into Spaine to his brother in law Asdrubal, vnder whom he liued some three yeres: after whose decease, he was demanded for head and Generall by the men of warre, and by their fauour obtained L of the Senat and people of Carthage the government of Spaine, being then about two and twentie yeres old. There was not in any age a more remarkable man than this, as well for his great vertues as vices: for he was of a generous spirit for great attempts, and inuincible in all dangers: bloudie combates were his delights, neither did he want judgement nor counsell: in the warre few men had better practised the knowledge how to obey, and how to commaund, than he: he was neuer tyred with any toyle: he endured heat and cold indifferently:

he gouerned his feeding as nature required: he hated rest, and slept onely when hee found himselfe idle, not vpon a soft and delicate bed, but most commonly vpon the ground, in a Corps de guard, among the fouldiors: he was not curious in his habits, but delighted much in faire Armes and good horses: being alwayes the first in fight, and the last at a retreat. So M many vertues had for companions in the same subject, a brutish crueltie, damnable infidelitie, sacriledge, and contempt of all religion. When as he found himselfe possessed of these forces, he sought all meanes to breake the peace with the Romanes; propounding within himselfe, not onely to chafe them out of Spaine, but also to assaile them in Italie within their owne strength, and in the very feat of their Empire. He began to make warre against the Ol-cades,

A cades a people beyond the riuier of Ebro, who were in good termes with the Carthaginians, but not their subjects, and rooke Althee their chiefe towne, and sackt it; the which did very much terrifie their neighbours. Then he quarrelled with the Vaccees, sometimes pretending a right, as being subject to the iurisdiction of Carthage; sometimes doing them iniurie, or pretending that he had receiued some wrong from them, hee so prouoked them, as among many acts of hostilitie, after the taking of Hermandicia and Arbocla, townes of the Vaccees, and a great defeat which he gaue vnto the Carpetanians and the rest of the Olcades and Vaccees, and in the end the conquest of all those Prouinces, he came vnto that which he had propounded vnto himselfe; which was, to besiege Sagunt. The complaints of his excesse B came daily to Rome; yet the Senat being busied with the warres of Gaule, and against the Il-lyrians, were not much moued, vntill that the Saguntines seeing a siege continuing before their towne, quickened the Romanes by their embassadours, letting them vnderstand, That if they made any account of Spaine, it was now high time to oppose themselves against the violence of Hannibal; who hauing broken their treatie and accords in a thousand forts, might be at that instant about their walls with an hundred and fiftie thousand fighting men. This did moue the Senat of Rome not to neglect their allies, and to apprehend the dangers which did threaten themselves, if they suffered the Carthaginians their enemies to prosper. Wherefore they sent two embassadours to Carthage, which were, Publius Valerius Flaccus, and Quintus Bebilius Tamphilus, with charge to passe to Hannibal, and to summon him to retire, and to C leaue their allies in peace; otherwise to let both him and the citie of Carthage vnderstand, that they would not endure the wrongs and iniuries which had bene done them. But Sa-gunt was besieged vnder colour of some controuerfies and quarrels which they had with their neighbours. Hannibal being entred into their territorie, abandoned it to the spoyle of the fouldiors, and then assailed the towne in three places. There was one part plainer and more accessible than the rest, where he intended to begin his batterie: but hauing made his approaches with great toyle and difficultie, the successe was not answerable to his designe:
for there hee found a strong tower, and the wall rayfed higher; besides, the place where there was most danger was manned with their most valiant fouldiors; who at the first repulsed their enemies with their arrowes: but in the end not contented to shoot from their towers and defences, they made sallies, and came to fight with them hand to hand: in which skirmishes there was no great aduantage on either side. Hannibal himselfe approaching too venturosly neere the wals, was wounded with a iaeline in the thigh, and ouerthrowne; the which did much amaze them that were about him, so as they fled; and it did so trouble the rest, as they abandoned all their workes. Then had the Saguntines some leysure to breath, and the towne was for a time rather besieged than assaulted, whilest that Hannibal was vnder cure; yet they ceased not to make all sorts of engines to batter the towne: the which was done afterwards, and more violently than before, and in so many places, as the besieged were scarce able to make their defence: and there were three towers with their courtines betwixt them already ruined, so as the towne was discouered, and seemed to lye open; which made both assailants and defendants to run thither: where they did fight with such obltinacie, E both parties being in battaile betwixt the ruines, not as at the entrance of a breach, but as in an open champaigne, animated by two feuerall passions, the one hauing hope to vanquish, and the other no hope of mercie in their enemies. In the end, the Carthaginians were forced to retire; and soone after the Romane embassadours arrived in the rode of Saguntum:
but Hannibal would not heare them, but let them vnderstand, That a man busied with so many affaires as he was, could not spend his time in words, and that he saw no great safetie for them, if they landed among so many fouldiors, of diuers barbarous nations. Whereupon they passed into Africke, and hauing deliuered their charge vnto the Senat of Carthage, and demanded in vaine, That Hannibal (the author of the warre) should be deliue-red vnto them, after many protestations, they returned with bare words: For after much contention among the factions in the Councell of Carthage (whereas Hannibal had manie kinsmen and friends) answer was made vnto the embassadours, That the warre had F bene begun by the Saguntines, and that the Senat and people of Rome should not embrace their quarrell against the Carthaginians, with whom they had liued in peace and amitie for so many yeres.

The simplicity
of the Romans.

Whilest the Romans were thus busied to resolute and to send embassadours, Hannibal pursues his siege, and presseth Sagunt by all means possible: He builds new engines, animates his souldiours, and promisseth them the spoile of a rich towne: the Saguntines ramp up their breaches, and labour day and night: the batterie begins afresh, and they haue many assaults giuen, and with greater furie than before. In the end, being tyred with the multitude of assaillants, who had fresh supplies continually, they could not keepe the Carthaginians from entering by their breaches, their walls being newly repaired with earth, after their accustomed manner, and therefore easie to pierce: so as they seized vpon an high place within the precinct of the towne, whereas they planted many of their great crosse-bowes and artillerie after their manner, and casting a wall about it, they made as it were a citadell, against the which the Saguntines did presently make a trench, diuiding it from the rest of the towne, which was not yet taken. And as it happened diuers times, that the one getting the other, must needs retire, the towne was reduced to a small compasse, and withall they had great want of victuals, and of all other necessaries, by reason of the long siege, Hannibal was then forced to march into Oretania and Carpetania, where there was some likelihood of a tumult, for that those which he had sent to enroll souldiours, were retained by them of the country, by reason of the great rigour which they vsed. As his absence from the campe gaue some rest vnto the Saguntines, so his coming among those people caused peace, and reduced them to obedience. In the meane time Maherbal, sonne to Himilco, who had the charge to continue the siege, vsed such diligence, as there was no few of Hannibals absence. To conclude, he wrought so well, as at his returne he shewed him large breaches, sufficient to giue a generall assault, which were made on the side of the castle, the which the Carthaginians did win. The miserable Saguntines being thus prest, and out of all hope of succours, which could not come vnto them but from Rome, which was farre from them, Alco one of their citizens cast himselfe from the rampar, and went to Hannibal, without the priuie of the Senat, that he might moue him to some reasonable conditions: but Hannibal offered them their liues onely, and that they should depart the town with one robe onely, and to go and dwell where they should be appointed: whereupon Alco durst no more returne vnto Sagunt, beseeching him to giue him leave to remaine within the campe: then there was a Spanishe souldior named Alorco, who offered himselfe to carrie these conditions vnto the Saguntines, and to persuaide them to accept thereof. But he preuailed as little as the other: for being heard in their Senat, they were so farre from yeelding in that manner, as by a common consent they resolved to bring all their gold, siluer, and other goods into the market place, where they set it on fire, and consumed it: and there were some so desperat, as they cast themselves into the fire, to be consumed with their goods. In the meane time there was a great noise heard from a tower which fell suddainly, hauing bene long battered, the which gaue free entrie vnto the enemies: a band of souldiours then being entred by that breach, they made a signe vnto the campe: whereupon Hannibal being vigilant to embrace all occasions, marched thither with the whole bodie of the armie, and tooke the towne, hauing giuen charge to his souldiours, to kill all that had past the age of fouretene years: a cruell sentence, but he held it necessarie, seeing hee had to deale with such obstinate enemies, who being in fight, neuer yeelded but by death, and being thus vt within their towne, with their wives and children, would rather burne themselves in their houses, than yeeld. And although that many things were spoyled and consumed by the fire, yet the bootie was great. Thus Sagunt fell into Hannibals hands, eight months after the beginning of the siege. And during this siege, his wife Himilce was deliuered of a sonne called Aspar, which doubled his joy. Then did the Romanes resolute to proclaim warre against Carthage, moued partly with the vnworthie calamitie of their friends and allies, and partly with the feare of their owne estate: the which happened 536 years after the foundation of Rome, Pub. Cornelius Scipio and Titus Sempronius Longus being created Consuls.

Hannibal was so farre from any remorse to haue drawne these two Commonweales into armes, as contrariwise, when hee had brought backe his armie to new Carthage, and diuided the spoyle among his souldiours, he began to make preparations to march into Italy, from whence he meant to chase the Romanes, and to driue them (if it were possible) out of the world. A manned the townes, he left the gouernment generall thereof to Asdrubal his brother, and taking his way by the Mediterranean shore to Empurias, he entred into Gaule, and came vnto the Alpes without any opposition of the Gauls, although they were much prest thereunto by the Romanes, leading an armie which consisted of Numidians, Africanes, Spaniards, Rome, Gauls, and other nations, the which he entertained and supplied often with the same nations, as well with the reuenues of the mynes of Spaine, as that which he tooke from the enemy, but most of all by his only authoritie, and the reuerence of his name, so long as he continued the warres in Italy, which was 16 years.

6. Whilest that the Consul P. Scipio attended him at the entrie of Italy, at the foot of the mountains, Cn. Scipio his brother (sent by him into Spaine) parted from the mouth of Rosife, with a good number of gallies and other vessels, well manned with souldiours, and coasting along the Gaulishe shore, he came to Empurias without any encounter: where hauing landed, he gouerned himselfe so discreetly in all his enterprises, and with so great humanitie towards the Spaniards, as in a short time hee reduced to the deuotion of the Romanes those which had bene drawne away either by force or feare, assured himselfe of the old allies, and got new, not onely among the people which lay neere vnto the sea, but also of those which dwelt farre into the country, and even of the mountaineers, although they were very rude and barbarous; wherewith he encreased his armie, and had willingly from them, without any constraint, victuals, and all other necessaries. Hanno appointed Gouernor of the country on this side Ebro, for the Carthaginians, went to field to make head against the Romanes, whilst that Asdrubal, Gouernour generall of the Prouince, made hast to ioine with him with a great armie. But Scipio went speedily to charge Hanno, and did easly defeat him, where he slew 6000 of his souldiours, tooke 2000, forced his campe, and not onely spoyled the baggage of his armie, but also that which Hannibal had appointed for Italy, wherewith Scipios souldiours were made rich. In the meane time Asdrubal arriues, hauing had no certaine intelligence of the defeat of Hanno: whereof being aduertised, he marched towards the sea, where he found many Romane souldiours and mariners stragling after some spoyle, of whom he slew many, giuing them a worthie reward of their negligence; the which happened neere vnto Tarracone: yet hee made no long abode there, but presently repassed the riuier of Ebro. Scipio hauing rested his armie foure dayes, resolved to pursue him, but he would first assure himselfe of Tarracone, the which was not very well furnished. Asdrubal seeing him retire, aduanced againe, and did sollicite the Ilergetes to rebell, who notwithstanding had giuen hostages to the Romanes, making them to spoyle some of their allies countrey; whereupon Scipio went to field, and Asdrubal retired. Scipio meaning to punish these Ilergetes, besieged Athanasia, their chiefe towne, and forced them to redeem themselves with money, and to giue new hostages: then he went to the Aufetanians, allied to the Carthaginians, neere vnto the riuier of Ebro, whom he besieged, and defeated the Laceranes who came to succour them, wherof there remained 12000 vpon the place, and the rest were dispersed, returning disarmed to their houses.

This siege continued 30 dayes in the heart of winter, the snow being almost foure foot deepe, wherewith their engines of batterie were in a manner couered, the which did preserve them from the fire which was cast by the enemy. In the end, Amusite their captaine hauing abandoned them, and being retired to Asdrubal, the towne yeelding it selfe from spoyle for 20 talents, amounting to 12000 French crownes: from whence Scipio led his armie backe to Tarracone.

The second yeare of the second Punicke warre, Asdrubal Generall of the Carthaginians resolved to charge the enemy wheresoeuer he should encounter him, either by sea or land, hauing armed out thirtie gallies which Hannibal had left him, and tenne others which he had; of all which, he gaue the charge to Himilcon, commanding him to sayle along the coast in view of his land armie, with the which he parted from Carthage, keeping still neere the shore: wherof Scipio being aduertised, he resolved also to fight with Asdrubal, if any opportunity were offered. Yet hauing intelligence, that he had bene reinforced with some fresh troups, he resolved not to hazard a battaile by land, but to set vpon them at sea. Hauing to that end embarked the flower of his armie, hee parted from Tarracone with fise and thirtie ships of warre, and came within foure or fise leagues of the mouth of the riuier of Ebro: there he was aduertised by two galliots of Marcellus, that the enemies gallies were at anchor in the the Carthaginians a supplie of foure thousand foot and five hundred horse: as soone as they arrived, he went to field with his armie, approached neer vnto the enemye, began to repayre his shippes, and to make a fleet for the defence of the coast and Islands. Being busie about these things, the rout of the sea captaynes, which had bene defeated the Summer before, troubled him much. These after the battaile hauing bene much blamed by Asdrubal, did neuer afterwards shew themselves neither faithfull to their Generall, nor well affected to the affaires of the Carthaginians: so as by practises there were some townes yielded to the Romanes in the country of the Carpesians, where the Realme of Toledo is at this day; and had taken one by force: so as all the warre was drawne by the Romanes into this country. Wherefore Asdrubal entering the country in hostile manner, affronted a captaine of this nation called Galbus, who lay in campe neere vnto the towne which had bene taken. Hauing sent some souldiours lightly armed to the enemies trenches, to draw them forth to skirmish, and some others against them that were gone to forrage, there was at one instant a great tumult in their campe, and slaughter and flying without it, so as manie faued themselves within their fort: yet in the end they were so well assured, as they not onely defended their rampiers, but also sallied forth, and presented themselves in battaile against the Carthaginians, going resolutely to the charge, leaping and skipping after their accustomed manner, the which struck terror into the enemye, who retired as hee could with credit. Asdrubal hauing recovered a hill flanked with a riuer, he brought his armie thither, thinking it needfull to fortifie himselfe there. So these two armies giuing feare for feare, there were some skirmishes among the souldiours on either side, whereas to speake truth, the Numidian horseman was not equall to the Spaniard, nor the Moores darts able to pierce their aduersaries targuets, who were as nimble and active as they, and had more force and courage. The Spaniards seeing that by running about the Carthaginians campe they could not draw them forth to battaile, and that it was not easie to force, they went to besiege a towne called Afena, whereas Asdrubal coming into that Prouince, had made his store-house for victuals and munition; they tooke it by force, and spoiled all the country about it: but after it there was neither order, obedience, nor conduct among them, as it happeneth often after a good successe. Asdrubal seeing their disorder and negligence, thought good to embrace this occasion: Wherefore hauing aduertised his souldiours thereof, he left his place of strength, and led his armie in good order against these Spaniards, who were dispersed here and there in disorder, and without ensignes. Being discouered by them that were in sentinell, euery one runs to armes, and so went to encounter the enemye disordered, without ensignes and without commandement. Some began the fight, whilst that other arrived in troupes, the greater part being not yet come out of their campe: yet they encountered them with such furie, as they stayed the first charge of the Carthaginians: but finding themselves few in number, faint, and not well vnted, against many in good order, they were soone broken, and forced to seeke their companions; and in the end they were so prest, being on a heape, and nor able to vse their arms, as they were for the most part slaine; some making way by force through their enemies, faued themselves in the mountains and Forrests neere adjoining. Their campe was in this amazement abandoned, and the whole Prouince was in one day reduced vnder the obedience of the Carthaginians.

During these actions, Asdrubal receiued commandement from his superiours at Carthage, That hee should march with all speed with his armie into Italie: the which being knowne in Spaine, all the people in generall began to wauer, and to follow the Romanes parties: whereof Asdrubal did aduertise the Senat, letting them vnderstand what prejudice this bruit did bring vnto the affaires of the Commonweale of Carthage; and that it was apparent, if he parted from thence, before he should passe the riuer of Ebro, all Spaine would fall into the Romanes power: for besides that he neither had men, nor a sufficient captaine to leaue in his place, to guard that Prouince, the Romanes captaynes were such, as they could hardly be resisted with equall numbers: wherefore he aduised them (if they had any care of Spaine) to send a good Commander and a strong Armie in the place of that which he should lead away: and although that all things should succeed as they desired, yet should they euer find some alteration among the people of that country. Asdrubal his letters did somewhat moue the Senate, but for that they did more affect the affaires of Italie, they Concept of military discipline follows a victory.

The Council of Carthage thinking to see Italy, by great Spain.

A they did not alter any thing that had bene decreed touching his departure with his army, but they onely sent Himilon with some bands, and did arme some ships, which they held sufficient to keepe the people of Spaine in awe, as well vpon the sea coasts, as within the country. This captaine hauing past the sea with his forces, layed vp his ships in safetie, and fortified his campe, he tooke some of his best horsemen, and past through friends and enemies countries, vntill he came to Asdrubal, to whom he presented this decree of the Senat: and hauing conferred with him, and vnderstood the course that he was to hold in the warres of Spaine, he returned to his troups, hauing nothing that did assure him more from encounter vpon the way, than his diligence and speed: For before they could haue means to assemble their forces, they had news of his returne. Asdrubal seeing that he must needs go, he exacted great summes of money from all the townes and people that were vnder the Carthaginians iurisdiction, being well aduertised, that he must purchase the passage and fauour of the Gauls with readie money, as Hannibal his brother had done. This done, hee tooke his way towards the riuer of Ebro.

The Romanes captaynes being aduertised of all these things, and knowing of what consequence Asdrubal's passage into Italie was, whereas Hannibal alone did much trouble the Romanes state, they employed all their wits and means to stop him. Wherefore leaving all other affaires, they joynd all their forces in one body, and passing the riuer of Ebro, towards which Asdrubal approached, being doubtful whether they should fight, or by assailing some towne

C or country that was confederat to the Carthaginians, secke onely to stay and diuert him. In the end they made a shew to besiege Ibera, a towne which was rich and mightie in those quarters: But Asdrubal to diuert them, and to succour his allies, marched with his armie towards another towne, which a little before was yielded to the Romanes: wherefore they left the towne, and went directly towards Asdrubal. The armies were some dayes within a league and a halfe one of another, before they came to battell, making light sallies one vpon another. In the end, as if it had bene agreed vpon, they put their armies in battell. The Romanes diuided their troups into three; some of their footmen were placed before, and some behind their ensignes, and the horsemen vpon the wings on either side. Asdrubal set the Spanish footmen in the midst of the battell, the Carthaginians on the right hand, and the Africanes on the left. To the Carthaginians he added the Numidian horsemen that were mercenaries, and the other Africanes in the head of the battell; yet he put no Numidians on the left hand, but such as had bene accustomed to go with two horses together to the warre, and when they had wearied one, they leapt nimbly on the other, which was fresh, being armed in the hottest of the fight: so active and nimble they were, and their horses so gentle and tractable. Being thus in battell, the Generals had equall hopes, for there was no great difference betwixt their forces, either in number, or qualitie of men of warre: but among the souldiours it was not so. The Romanes were perswaded, that the safetie of Rome and Italie, and their returne to their houses, depended vpon this battell; and therefore they were resolute to vanquish or die. But the Spaniards (whereof the most part of the other armie did consist) had

E not that resolution, desiring rather to be beaten in Spaine, than to be drawne into Italie, conquerours: Wherefore at the first charge their battalions in the midst were forced, and turned their backs, the fight was more furious on either hand, for the Romanes were furiously charged on the one hand by the Carthaginians, and on the other by the Africanes, and in a manner compassed in, when as their whole armie (being joynd together in one bodie) easily repulsed them. So fighting in two parts, the Romanes had the aduantage euery where, and were masters of the field. The slaughter was great, and had bene greater, if the Spaniards had not fled so fast in the beginning. The horsemen did not in a manner fight: for when as the Moores and Numidians did see their squadron in the midst wauer, they began to flee, leaving their wings naked, and leading the Elephants away with them. Asdrubal hauing continued

F vntill the end of the fight, retired out of the prease with some few that followed him. The enemies campe, and all their baggage, was spoiled by the Romanes. Through this victory, if there remained any people in Spaine which were not firme and constant to the Romanes, they were now confirmed. On the other side, Asdrubal law himselfe not onely out of hope to lead an armie into Italie, but also in some doubt where he should find a place of assurance in Spaine. These newes being aduertised to Rome by the two Scipios, were verie pleasing; not so much

Asdrubal accompanied by Mago, and Amilcar sonne to Bomilcar, Carthaginian capitaines, were come to besiege the towne of Illiturgis, which had revolted from them to the Romanes party: about the which they had made three camps, through which the Scipios, two brethren, past by force, with great slaughter of their enemies, and put victuals into the towne, whereof they had great need: and having encouraged the inhabitants to carrie themselves valiantly in the defence of their walls, as they had feared them do which came to succour them, they refused to make a furious sallie vpon the enemies fort, in Asdrubals quarter. Which Mago and Amilcar seeing, they ran thither with all their forces, so as that day the Carthaginians had 60000 men in battell without their campe, against 26000 Romanes, or thereabouts; who notwithstanding had the victorie, without any doubt, having slaine more of their enemies than they were themselves, taken about 3000 prisoners, woon about 1000 good horses of service, caried away 59 ensignes, slaine five Elephants in fight, made the enemies to raise their camps, and (which was their chiefe designe) freed the towne of Illiturgis from siege. The Carthaginians to recouer their honour, went to besiege Incibile, another place allied to the Romanes, having filled their bands, and made new supplies in the countrey, who demanded nothing more than warre, so as there were any hope of poyle: for at that time Spaine did abound in youth. There they did rather increafe their shame: for being assailed by the Romanes, they lost 13000 fouldiers more, which were slaine vpon the place, 3000 prisoners, two and fortie ensignes, and nine Elephants. Then in a manner all Spaine did adhere vnto the Romanes, to whom this Summer was verie successfull.

The yeare following, when as Q. Fabius, and M. Claudius Marcellus were Consuls, and the sist of the second Punicke warre, had diuers causes: for Asdrubal and Mago defeated great armies of Spaniards, which were allied to the Romanes, before they had left their garriisons, where they had wintered, to passe the riuier of Ebro: and in a manner all that part of Spaine was recouered by the Carthaginians: but the diligence of P. Scipio, who marched thither with his armie, kept them play, and assured the countrey. Hee came first and camped at a place called Haut-Chateau, or High-Castle, famous by the death of that great Amilcar; the which was strong, and well furnished with come which they had brought thither a litle before: but the countrey round about was full of enemies, and some of the Romanes, which had taried scattered behind from the bodie of the armie, had beene charged by the enemies horse, who slew two thousand, and retired without any losse. This made P. Scipio retire into a countrey of more safetie: who fortified his campe, and entrenched it neere vnto the mount of Victorie, whither Cn. Scipio his brother came with all his forces. And in a manner at the same instant, Asdrubal, sonne to Gisgo the third, a Carthaginian capitaine, presented himselfe with a compleat armie, in view of the Romanes, and planted his campe right against them, having a riuier betwixt them. There P. Scipio hauing taken certaine men at armes with him, parted secretly to discouer the enemy and the countrey: but being himselfe discouered by the enemy, hee was in danger to be defeated, had hee not recouered a litle hill neere adjoining, whereby hee had meanes to defend himselfe, and to make head against them that did environ him, vntill that his brother Cn. Scipio came to venge him. The towne of Castulo which was so great a friend, and so strictly allied vnto the Carthaginians, as Hannibal had taken a wife there, yielded vnto the Romanes. The Carthaginians returned vnto the siege of Illiturgis, in the which there was some garriison of Roman fouldiers, hoping to take it by famine. Cn. Scipio to releue both the garriison and the inhabitants allied to the Romanes, marched that way, past valiantly betwixt two armies, and put a legion of resolute fouldiers into the towne, with great slaughter of the enemy.

The next day was no lesse happy vnto him, in a braue fallie which he made, where there were

Illiturgis relieved and againe by the Romanes.

A slaine in these two encounters twelue thousand Carthaginians, and about ten thousand prisoners, with five and thirtie ensignes, so as Illiturgis was againe freed from siege. The enemy being chased from thence, they went to besiege Bigere, another towne allied to the Romanes; but they retired presently vpon the brute of Scipios approach, and marched towards Munda, where they were also pursued by the Romanes. There they had a sharpe encounter, which continued foure houres; but as the Romanes had the victorie, they founded a retreat, for that Cneus Scipio, Generall of the armie, had bene thrust into the thigh with a Numidian lance: which wound his fouldiers that were fighting about him feared to have been mortall; without which accident it is certaine the Carthaginians campe had been taken that day, and the victorie absolute. For the fouldiers with their Elephants had been repulst vnto their palisadoes and rampars, vpon the which there were nine and thirtie slaine with darts: Yet they say, that in this fight the Romanes slew about twelue thousand of their enemies, and carried away seven and fiftie ensignes. The Carthaginians being defeated, retired to Auringe, where they were pursued and prest by the Romanes, during this amazement; and were againe charged before they had leasure to assure themselves, and to recouer their spirits, Scipio causing himselfe to be carried through the battalions in a litter. Here he had an absolute victorie, but with much lesse slaughter by the halfe, for the enemies were reduced to a smaller number. But as those people were prompt by nature, to renew the warres, and presently to supply their armies, the countrey being fertile of fouldiers, their bands were presently filled by the diligence of Mago, brother to Asdrubal, being sent to make new leues, so as they durst hazard another battell: the euent whereof was like vnto the former, most of the Carthaginian fouldiers coming faintly to fight, as for a partie which had beene often beaten, and in few dayes. They lost in this conflict eight thousand men slaine vpon the place, and almost one thousand prisoners, with eight and fiftie ensignes, and great store of baggage, rings, chaines, and bracelets of gold: two great noblemen of Gaul were also slaine, the one called Marcius, the other Cisfarnus: eight Elephants were taken, and three slaine. Thus the Romanes affaires prospered in Spaine, who in the end were ashamed, that the townes of Sagunt, for the which this war was begun, had continued five yeares in their enemies power. Wherefore they approached neere vnto it, and by fauour of the battels which they had woon, did easily chase away the garriison that was within it: and hauing conquered the place, they called home all the old inhabitants, and restored them to the possession of their goods, sold the inhabitants thereof for slaues, which had beene the motiue of their desolation, and sold the inhabitants thereof for slaues, to them that would giue most.

The Romanes to haue the better meanes, not onely to repress the injuries of the Carthaginians, but also to assaile and annoy them, did stirre vp new enemies against them neere vnto their towne, and drew vnto their alliance Siphax, king of a part of Numidia, who was already somewhat discontented with them: so as they were forced to haue their recourse vnto Gala, another king of the same nation, and to incense him against Siphax. This Gala was father to Massinissa, from whom the Romanes did afterwards draw many good seruices: but at that time he shewed himselfe a bitter enemy to Siphax, and did often defeat him. In the meane time nothing was done worthe of memorie in Spaine, only the Celtiberians which were in pay with the Carthaginians, were drawne away by the Romanes, whom they entertained with the same conditions: and these were the first mercenary fouldiers which the Romanes vsed, to their great prejudice. Moreouer, the two Scipios sent about 300 Spanish gentlemen into Italy, to sollicite them of their nation, which were in Hannibals armie, to leaue his partie, and to ioyne with the Romanes.

After this, there were two yeres spent before there was any memorable act done in Spain, both parties encountering one another rather by counsell and practises, than by open hostilitie. The seventh yeare of this warre, the Roman capitaines assembled their forces, and it was resolved in counsell, That they must not content themselves onely to haue stopped Asdrubals passage into Italy, but they must seeke some meanes to end all the warre in Spaine: presuming they had forces ynow to doe it, hauing this Winter drawne vnto them, and armed 30 thousand Celtiberians. The enemies had three camps, two whereof were commaunded by Asdrubal sonne to Gisgo, & by Mago, being both joyned together. They were distant from the Romanes some five dayes journey: But that which Asdrubal, sonne to Amilcar, the ancient

Coun-

Gouernour of Spaine, led, was neerer, being lodged neere vnto Anitorge. The Generall G of the Roman armie would first giue him a charge, hoping to defeat him easily. One only difficultie troubled them, which was, how they should hinder the other two armies (After the defeat of this Asdrubal) from retiring into some place of aduantage among the mountaines and forests; and by that meanes should draw the warre in length. Having then a conceit to make warre against all Spaine at one instant, they resolved to diuide their forces betwixt them: so as P. Scipio with two third parts of the Roman armie, and the bands of their allies, should goe and affront Asdrubal sonne to Gisgo, and Mago; and that Cneus Scipio should lead the rest of the old legions and the allies against Asdrubal Barcin.

This being concluded, these two armies with their commanders parted at one instant: the Celtiberians marching before, came and encamped neere vnto Anitorge; in view of the enemy, being separated the one from the other by a riuer. There did Cneus Scipio stay with his troupes, and P. Scipio marched on where he was to make warre. But when as Asdrubal saw them diuided, and one farre from the other, being a wise and politique capitaine, considering that the sinewes and strength of the Roman armie consisted of their allies, and in mercinarie fouldiours, and knowing the treacherous and inconstant disposition of the barbarous, euen of the Spaniards in those times, by the experience he had had in that long warre, hee resolved to trie all means possible, to corrupt the Celtiberians, which were vnder the Romans pay, being 30000: the which he did happily effect, by the meanes of some of the same nation which were in his camp; who vnto the same language, and hauing means to haue secret conferences one with another, they concluded with the capitaines of the Celtiberians, that for a good summe of money they should retire with their men, and returne to their houses. It seemed a matter of small moment to them: for they were not prest to turne their armes against the Romans, but only to retire, and not to make warre: besides, most of the fouldiours were glad to rest, and desired to see their kinsfolkes and friends, goods and possessions. Wherefore it was easie for the capitaines who were corrupted, to persuade them to dislodge, being without feare to be staied, or forced by the Romanes, who were but few in number. Let this be an example to all estates that make warre, neuer to fortifie themselves so with mercenaries and strangers, as they may prescribe them a law; but let their greatest strength be of their own nation. These Celtiberians then hauing taken vp their ensignes, and trust vp their baggage, departed suddenly: neither could any intreatie nor prayers preuaile to stay them, pretending that they had warre at home, and that they must goe and defend their owne houses. Cneus Scipio seeing himselfe thus abandoned, and not able to prevent it neither by intreatie, force, nor any good counsell, finding himselfe too weake to hold the field against so great and mightie an armie, hauing also no meanes to ioyne with his brother P. Scipio, he meant to trie if he might retire safely and with his honour, and sie all occasions to be forced to fight. But Asdrubal holding him vanquished, would giue him no rest, but followed him continually at the heeles. The like terrour, but a farre greater daunger, did at the same time presse P. Scipio, being freshly charged by a new and a valiant enemy: it was Masiniussa a young prince, then allied to the Carthaginians; who afterwards was famous, and made mightie by the amitie of the Romanes. P. Scipio at his first arrivall found him in front, with goodly troupes of Numidian horsemen, comming continually day and night to his trenches, keeping his armie in perpetual alarme, so as not any one durst goe farre out, either for forage or for wood, dislodging their sentinels oftentimes, and pursuing them euen within their gards, and to the portes and rampars of their campe, whereas the Romanes were shut vp as if they had bene besieged, and in want of all things, wherewith they were likely to be daily more and more oppressed, if a Spaniard called Indibilis should come and ioyne with the Carthaginians, where he was expected with seuen thousand and five hundred Suesethanians. For so graue and wise a commander as P. Scipio was, he tooke a bad and rash resolution: for hauing left his campe to the gard of a few men, vnder the command of T. Fonteius his lieutenant, hee parted about midnight to goe and encounter Indibilis, and to fight with him: the which he did, and had easily defeated him, if the Moores and Numidian horsemen (who had watched Scipioes departure) had not come and charged the Romanes in flanke, the which caused a great terrour among them, and besides they were charged in the rereward with all the Carthaginian armie, which had followed them. Being thus enuironed of all sides, doubtfull where they should make head, or

A which way they should force through the enemies, and escape that daunger, their General P. Scipio fighting and encouraging the fouldiours, and going to all places where his presence was needfull, was thrust through the right flanke with a lance, so as he fell downe dead from his horse. Then the enemies which had charged that troupe which was about Scipioes person, seeing him on the ground, went running throughout the armie, leaping for joy, and crying out that the enemies General was slaine. This accident gaue the Carthaginians an assured victorie, the Romanes (being destitute of a head) thinking only how they should sie and saue themselves. It was easie for them to make way through the Numidians, who were but lightly armed, but to saue themselves by flying against so many horsemen, and footmen who did run in

B a manner as swift as horses, there was no meanes: so as the slaughter of the Romanes was very great, both in the fight and in the flight, and hardly had any one escaped, if the darkenesse of the night had not fauoured them. The happinesse of so great and important a victorie of the Carthaginians, was no whit impaired by the negligence of their capitaines, but making good vse thereof, presently after the conflict, hauing giuen some little rest vnto their fouldiours, their armie dislodged, and marched with all speed to Asdrubal Barcin: campe: being assured, that all their forces vnited together, they should easily vanquish the other Roman armie which remained, and by that meanes end the warre in Spaine. Being arrived, the joy was great among the capitaines and armies, rejoycing at this late obtained victorie, whereas so great and redoubted a capitaine of the enemies had bene slaine, and all his armie defeated: wherefore being full of hope, they assured themselves to doe as much vnto the others.

C There was yet no newes of this lamentable defeat in Cneus Scipioes armie, but there was seene a sad mournefull silence, as if they had had some secret preface, as it happens often to such as doe diuine of an approaching mischiefe. The General of the armie, besides that he found himselfe weakened, and abandoned by his allies, hearing that Asdrubal armie was so much reinforced, was much perplexed, and could not by any conjecture and reason of warre imagine other, than what had happened: For what reason were it to thinke, that Asdrubal and Mago could passe without fighting, if his brother had bene liuing? Why did he not hinder them? or at the least coast them and follow them, to come and ioyne with his brother, if he could not keep the enemies armies from ioyning? Being in this perplexitie, seeing no other meanes to assure himselfe, but by a retreat, hee parted secretly in the night, vnknewne to the enemy, causing his armie to make a long march: But the day hauing discouered his departure, the Numidian horsemen were presently sent after; who ouertooke the Roman armie toward the evening, and skirmishing, stayed them much, charging them sometimes behind, and sometimes vpon the flanks. Scipio gaue order, that in fighting the armie should still aduance, fearing the enemies battalions of foot, which marched with all speed after their horse. In the end night approached, and yet the Romanes had not much aduanced, being forced to make often stands against the Moores, who did continually annoy them. Wherefore Cneus Scipio retired with all his troupes to a little hill, a place of small aduantage for them that were already wauering; yet the seat was somewhat higher than the fields about it: There he lodgeth, and puts his horsemen and all his baggage in the midst, and his footmen make a circle round about, and so did easily resist the attempts of the Moores. But when as the Generals with their complete armies were ioyned together, hee saw there was no meanes to make it good by fighting, if he did not intrench himselfe after the accustomed manner: Wherefore he began to aduise by what meanes he might make his palisadoes, but he was come into a bare, barren, and drie soyle, where there was neither trees nor bushes, nor any ground fit to make flaggies; neither could they digge into it, nor make it hard for the enemy to approach, for the ascent was easie on all sides: yet to make a kind of rampar, hee caused them to take their packe-saddles and dorsers, and to tye them together, wherewith the fouldiours made as it were a wall of a conuenient height round about them, filling vp the places which wanted, with such baggage as they had.

F The Carthaginians being arrived, put themselves in order to assaile this little hill, but discouering a new kind of rampar, and not accustomed, they were somewhat amazed: but their commanders began to crie; How now fouldiours, why stay you? why doe you not speedily pull vp and scatter this baggage which doth amaze you, and is not fit to stop women nor children? The enemy is ours, wee hold him fast, being hidden behind those cofers and burthens. Thus contemptuously did the captaines speake, yet was it not so easie G to make a breach, nor to passe over them: but in the end they forced them, and the souldiours found passage in diuers places, so as they made a great slaughter of the Romans; yet the greatest part of the vanquished saved themselves by flight, who finding woods and forests, a good number of them, after a long and tedious journey, came vnto P. Scipios campe, commanded by T. Fonteius, the lieutenant. Cn. Scipio was also slaine in this assault at the hill, as some say, in the beginning of the fight: others notwithstanding affirme, That he thought to saue himselfe with some few men, in a tower, which was there adjoining, the which being enuironed by the enemy, and the gates set on fire, they were all taken and slaine. Behold two great captaines, brethren, dead, and their armies defeated, in lesse than a moneth, leauing the Romans affaires in Spaine so troubled, and in such despair, as they might well say, all was lost: But humane things are gouerned by a higher power, who doth not alwaies impart his decrees to our discourses.

9 There was a Roman knight called L. Martius, sonne to Septimius, a young man, a chieue, hardie, and of greater courage than could be expected in a man of his condition; who assured the remainders of the legions, and the faithfull allies of the Roman state, and reuined Spaine from their sorrow and mourning, for the losse of two such great personages, and of so many good men, and from the calamitie and daunger they were then in: and in the end recouered the honour and fame of the Romanes, which was growne contemptible. Hee had with his generous disposition learned good discipline vnder Cn. Scipio. And hauing gathered many of them together which had fled from the defeat, and drawne a good number of souldiours out of the garrisons and vnitied townes, he made a little armie, and came and ioyned with T. Fonteius, P. Scipios lieutenant. This armie being on this side Ebro, in a campe well fortified, it was resolu'd to chuse a head that should command ouer all, and that they should take their voyces therein, as the bands should enter into gard one after another. L. Martius being but a knight, was so gracious, as all in generall gaue him their voyces, and he was chosen Captain General of the Roman armie. After which time hee was verie carefull to fortifie himselfe in places of strength, and to provide store of victuals and munition, finding the souldiours readie to execute whatsoever hee commaunded. But it was not long before there came newes vnto the campe, That Asdrubal the sonne of Gisgo marched towards them, to make an end of the warre, and to free the countrey of those few Romanes which were yet remaining in Spaine. Then the souldiours remembering their old captaines, began to faint at their new captaines commands; so as the centeniers and other officers and bands, yea and L. Martius himselfe had much adoe to reuiue them, reproaching them, that they behaued themselves faintly like women, making fruitlesse lamentations, which was not the meanes to reuenge the deaths of their Generals, nor to recouer their lost honour. The enemies were not far off, and it was time to preach to them; when as suddenly there was scene a strange alteration throughout all the Roman campe: Their mourning was conuerted into furie, euerie man fell to his armes, and they cried out, that they should bring them to the enemy. They fallly forth of their gates, and with great courage receiue the Carthaginians, who came disordered, and in a manner contemning them whom they had already vanquished. This resolution of the Romanes amazed them, wondering at the number and order of these men, who had gathered them together, or what captaines they had remaining after the death of the two Scipioes. But in the end they were forced to flee, and were hotly pursued that day, vntill that Martius thinking the souldiours did abandon themselves too much, caused a retreat to be sounded, and himselfe standing before their ensignes, stayed their rashnesse, which might haue drawne them into some disorder, and so (desiring nothing but reuenge and blood) hee brought them backe to the campe. The Carthaginians being thus roughly repulst from the Roman trenches, seeing they were no more pursued, they presumed it had bene feare, and therefore they retired softly, and without care. Being in their campe they vsed the like negligence in their gards and watches: for notwithstanding they did see the enemy nether, yet they did esteeme them to be but the reliques of two armies which they had beaten and defeated some few dayes before.

Martius being aduertised by good spies, what was done in the enemies campe, hee vnderooke rather a rash than hardy attempt, but the issue was fortunat. Knowing that he had the ar-

A mie of Asdrubal Gisgo now in front, the which was followed by the two others, hee thought it lesse daunger to aduenture to fight with that alone, than to attend and bee beaten by all three together: If he vanquished, he should restore their affaires, which were almost ruined, and if he were beaten, at the least he should haue the honour to bee the assilant. Hauing therefore assembled the captaines, centeniers, and chiefe souldiours, he deliuered vnto them the pitifull estate of their affaires, and how that for the honour and reputation of their countrey, for the loue they bare to the deceased Scipioes, and for the interest of their owne lues, they were to carrie themselves valiantly and courageously against their cruell enemies which pursued them; whose negligence and contempt did inuite them to goe and assaile them, and B did promise them a certaine and easie victorie, especially if they made hast before all their forces were vnitied: the which afterwards they could not withstand, concluding, that there was no other meanes to make warre, than to issue forth the next night, and to goe and force the Carthaginians in their trenches. He found the souldiours well disposed at this motion, wherefore he commaunded them to prepare their armes, and to be readie to depart when he should command. The Carthaginian armie made two lodgings, about a league and a halfe one from the other: betwixt both was a great valley couered with trees. In this forest was an ambush of Roman souldiours layed, with some horsemen, to stop the passage for such as would runne from one campe to the other: the rest of the Roman armie was led with great silence against the enemies, where finding neither gards nor sentinels, nor any thing else to C stop their passage, they entred farre, as if they had bene within their owne campe: then suddenly the trumpets sounded, and making great cries they fell to the execution, killing all they met, without mercie, and setting fire of the enemies lodgings and tents; but about all they seized vpon the ports and issues, that not any one might escape. The amazement, fire, cries, and slaughter, did so trouble the Carthaginians, as they could not beare one another, nor giue any order for any thing. They found themselves among troups of armed men: thinking to flee, they were slaine at the gates, if any leapt ouer the ramparts, they fell into the ambushes, so as the enemies which were in the other lodging, could haue no intelligence of this surpris, but by death, which was presented vnto them at the Romanes coming, who with great celeritie (boiling with furie, and implacable desire of reuenge) came thither, and D there found greater negligence than they had done in the first campe: For these were farther retried from the enemy, and vpon the breake of day many were gone forth for forrage and wood. There were armes at the ports, but no souldiours, some here, some there, some asleepe, and some walking in their gownes in the trenches. The Romans fell vpon these careless people, hauing no resistance made at the ports: they entred within the campe, and in the midst thereof began a bloudie fight, the enemies running from all parts at the first crye and tumult, striving vniuiously to repulse the Romanes. Which conflict was likely to continue long: but when as the Carthaginians discovered their enemies targuets all polluted with blood, they fainted, hauing thereby an assured argument of the defeat of their companions. This feare put them in rout, and to a miserable flight, euerie one sauing himselfe where he found any way open to escape, and abandoning the campe. So in one night E and the day following, there were two campes taken, vnder the conduct of L. Martius. The number of the dead, according vnto some, was seuen and thirtie thousand, and about eight hundred prisoners. The spoyle was verie rich, and among other things, therewas found a great targuer of silver, weighing one hundred thirtie and eight pounds, on the which was grauen the picture of Asdrubal Baris, the which was afterwards set in the temple of the Capitoll, and it was called Martius targuer, remaining for a memorie of the victorie which hee had gotten against the Carthaginians, where it continued vntill the Capitoll was burnt.

This action restored the Romans power and authoritie in Spaine, and was the cause that F sometime was spent without any enterprises of either side, either fearing to hazard anything after so great losses.

10. These diuers and contrarie accidents teach vs how little wee should relye vpon the events of war, and that it is not in the power of man to maintaine himselfe one day: wherefore if modestie be necessarie in humane things, yea in greatest prosperitie, and to beare a respect diligence of Mago, wherefore the fouldiours comming to the assault, were entertained with a shower of darts and arrowes which fell vpon them, more vpon their flanks than in afront: besides the wall towards the firme land, was very high. Notwithstanding the fouldiours animated by their Generals presence, and with a desire to vanquish and spoile, planted their ladders of all sides, and mounted courageously, striving who should get first to the top of the wall. But many of the ladders, being over-laden with the multitude, brake, and they fell into the ditch; besides most of them were too short. They gaue an assault in like manner towards the sea, but with more amazement than danger, and of euerie side there was more brute than effect: so as for this time the Romans were repulst, which gaue courage vnto the enemies, and hope they should be able to keepe the towne; persuading themselves, they were out of scale-doe, and that their armies should haue time ynough to come and succour them. But Scipio, who was resolu'd to take this towne, did not suffer them to continue long in this error: for as soone as he had caused them which had giuen the first assault to retire, being wearie and wounded, he made other fresh fouldiours to aduance against the towne, to renew the assault, taking the ladders from their companions. He had bene aduertised by fishermen of Tarracoe, which were in his campe, and who had waded through the marishes on the West side of the towne, That there was no great store of water along the wall, when the tyde was spent, and that it was easie to goe to the foot of it: and withall had obserued, that on that side the wall was but low, ill rampared and fortified, and without gards, for that they assured themselves of this stil water. Wherefore vpon the ebbe, and a strong Northerly wind, which draue out the water, it was easie to wade through: he embraced this occasion, and sent some troups thither, shewing them the easie access; saying, That the gods did inuite them, and assure their passage, causing the sea to retire, whereby they might take the towne, as it fell out: For finding no man to resist them, whilst that all were busie in other places, where as they feared most, they entred into the towne, and marched directly towards the port where as the combat was hottest, where they were sooner felt than heard; and the enemies were charged both in front and in flanke, before they knew that the towne was taken: so as the number increasing still, one helping another ouer the wall, euerie one fought to saue himselfe, and not any one made any more resistance. Wherefore the gate being broken, and an entrie made for the armie, they entred in battaile into the towne, with their commanders and ensignes, and seized vpon the chiefe places. Those which had past ouer the walls, made a great slaughter of the inhabitants. The Carthaginian fouldiours retired themselves into two forts, the one was to that high peece of ground aboue mentioned, on the East part of the towne, garded by fise hundred fouldiours, and the other was the castle, which Mago had referred. The mount being assailed by a part of the Romane armie, was presently forced: Soone after Mago seeing there was no more hope, hauing made some resistance, yielded the fort also, and all that was within it. Vntill that time the Romanes slew all they met about fouretene yeares of age: but the castle being yielded, they were commaunded to cease from killing: then they began to fall to the spoile, which was verie great, where they had ten thousand prisoners, all men of free condition. Those that were naturall citizens were set free, and the towne restored vnto them, and all that was found belonging vnto them. There were also found about two thousand artificers, whom Scipio adjudged to the publike of the people of Rome, giuing them hope of speedie libertie, if they carried themselves like good men, and did imploy themselves valiantly in the warres. With the rest of the youth which was able and strong, he furnished his galleies: and encreased his armie at sea, with eight galleies taken from the enemy. Besides this multitude, there was found within the fort the Spanish hostages, whom hee treated as honourably as if they had bene allyed to the people of Rome. Thus this wise Generall by his mildnesse and humanitie woun the hearts of the people, with more honor, and much lesse paine and daunger, than if he would haue forced them by armes, the which notwithstanding he could well employ at need. The engines to batter and defend townes and forts, were infinit: there were threecore and foureene ensignes taken: the gold and siluer was carried to the Generall: there were two hundred threecore and sixteen cups of gold, euery one weighing a pound; and in siluer coined eighteen thousand and three hundred pounds weight, with great store of siluer plate. All which things were deliuered by weight to C. Flaminius the treasurer. Besides, there was found 40000 bushels of wheat, and 870000 of barley. There were taken

A taken within the port an hundred and thirteene shippes of burthen, whereof many were fill laden with armes, come, siluer, yron, cloth, stuffe to make ropes, and other things for the vse of shippes: so as in regard of the spoyle, the towne of Carthage was esteemed of least value.

14 The heat and furie of the fouldiours being past, and Scipio in quiet possession of the towne, without any contradiction, the same day leauing the towne in gard to Caius Lelius, with the fouldiours of his galleies and mariners, he brought backe the Armie and Legions to their campe, very much tyred with so many exploits of warre which they had done in one day: for they had fought hand to hand in field, had giuen an assault, and taken the towne with extreme paine and danger, and that being taken, they had been still forced to fight with great disadvantage against them that held the castle: wherefore he suffered them to rest vntill the next day, when as he caused the whole armie both of sea and land to assemble, thanking first of all the gods, who not onely had deliuered into their hands the richest towne of all Spaine, but had gathered together in it as it were a spoyle of all that was precious in Spaine and Africa: so as their enemies were left naked of all things, and they were abundantly furnished with superfluitie. Then did he publicly acknowledge the valour of his fouldiours, commending such as had done their duties, according to euery mans vertue and resolution, where they had repulst the enemies, who had sallied out so furiously against them; and notwithstanding the height of their wals, the dangers of vnkowne passages in the moores, and the munition of their forts and citadels, they had past all, and surmounted all obstacles. Wherefore although he knew that all deserved much, yet it was expedient to haue an especial regard to those that had first mounted vpon the wals, and therefore he commaunded they should reue themselves. There were two fouldiours which pretended this honour to be due vnto them: it was a crowne of gold made with battlements, which the custome and auncient militarie order of the Romanes did giue vnto him that mounted first vpon the enemies walls. One of these was Q. Trebellius, a Centenier of the first Legion; and the other, Sextus Digitiu, a fouldior of the sea armie, who (as it happeneth often) had put the whole armie into faction, either being supported by them of his ranke. C. Lelius maintained them of the fleet, but M. Sempronius Turdianus the Legionaries; which contention had almost bred a mutinie, but Scipio gaue them arbitrators, which were the two abouenamed, and P. Cornelius Caudinus for a third, who should examine the cause, and informe him. Notwithstanding, after they had taken from them these men of respect, who should be iudges in stead of supporters, the disorder grew greater: for although they seemed partiall, yet they did restraîne the violent passions of both parties, rather than maintaine them: which C. Lelius perceiving, leauing the assembly, he went and informed Scipio, that this businesse was handled without modestie, order, or reason, and that they were like to fall to armes: and although they proceeded not so farre, yet was it dishonest and a very bad example, that honour due to vertue should be sought in that manner by corruption and false witnesses: for on the one side the Legionaries, and on the other the mariners, offered to sweare what they would haue them, not knowing the truth, nor considering that in so doing they made themselves guilty of perjurie, and did draw the punishment of that crime not onely vpon their owne heads, but vpon the whole armie, and on the Romane Ensignes and Eagles, violating and contemning in this manner the reuerence of an oath: Hee aduertised him of these things by the aduice of Cornelius and Sempronius, the two other arbitrators. Scipio gaue him thanks, and did much commend him for it: wherefore hauing called the fouldiours together, he let them vnderstand, That he was duly informed, how that Q. Trebellius and Sext. Digitiu were the first that mounted vpon the wals of Carthage, and the one as soone as the other, and therefore in witness of their vertues he did honour either of them with a murrall crowne. And thus he wisely pacified a great sedition among the fouldiours, and did auoid a detestable profanation of all religion; the which was of great consequence among the Romanes, who were no lesse desirous, that the world should be as well conceited of their pietie and iustice, as of their valour. He afterwards rewarded euery one according to his merits, and among others, Lelius Generall of the armie at sea, to whom hee did as great honor as he would haue done vnto himselfe, giuing him a crowne of gold, and thirtie oxen. Hee caused also the hostages of Spaine to be brought before him, which were found in new Carthage, to whom he spake courteously, giuing them good hope, and letting them vnderstand, That they were fallen into the hands of a Nation, which desired more to win the hearts of men, and to tie them vnto them by their good deeds, than to constrain them by feare of force; and had rather haue other nations for their faithfull companions, than to subdue by an odious seruitude. He caused the names of the Townes and Communalties of Spaine to bee giuen him in a List, and enquired of the number of prisoners of either of them, to whom he sent messengers, willing them to come and receiue their owne. If at that time there were any embassadours of any of those places within his campe, hee presently caused theirs to be deliuered vnto him. C. Flaminus Treasurer generall had the charge of the rest, with commandement to entreat them well. Whilst these things were in hand, a Spanish Ladie, who was very old, stept out of the troupe of hostages, and callt her selfe at Scipios feet: shee was wife to Mandonius, brother to Indibilis, Lord of the Illetes: beseeching him to giue especiall charge vnto the gards, to entreat the women well and honestly: To whom Scipio answered, That they should not want any thing: But (sayth she) it is not the feare of any want that maketh me thus careful: for what doth not suffice them that are in our estate? I feare another thing; it is the youth of those that are about me, whom I see in danger to receiue disgrace: as for me, my age doth free me from that misfortune. There were about her the daughters of Indibilis, and manie others of great houles, very faire, and in the flower of their ages, which honoured this Ladie as their mother. Then Scipio with a noble and vertuous courage answered thus: Truly, the discipline which I haue learned among the Romanes, and which I obserue, doth admonish me, that whatsoeuer is held worthe of respect in any part of the world, should not be violated or corrupted by vs: but above all this, your vertue and modestie inciteth mee to be more careful to preserve you, seeing you shew that you haue not any way forgotten that which doth most honour and adorne women. He therefore gaue them in gard vnto one, whose modestie and continencie was well knowne vnto him, commanding him to keepe them with as much honest respect, as if they were the wives and mothers of their owne allies. Then they brought vnto him a young virgin a prisoner, fit to be married, and so exceeding faire, as she drew vnto her the eyes of all that beheld her. Scipio enquired of whence, and what parents she was of? Among other things he vnderstood, That she was promised to a young Nobleman of the Celtiberians, called Allucius: He caused her to be carefully kept; and sent vnto the virgines parents, and to her future husband; that they should come vnto him: who being arrived, he spake vnto this yong man (whom he knew to be exceedingly passioned with loue) vsing a more artificiall speech vnto him than hee did vnto the virgines parents.

I am (sayd hee) young, and so are you, wherefore my desire is, that wee conferre more freely together: Your Spouse being brought before mee by our souldiours, and vnderstanding that you loued her with great affection, I did easily beleue it, seeing her beautie: for if it were lawful for me to seeke the pleasures which youth demands, and that my mind and thoughts were not wholly employed for the affaires of the Commonweale, I would willingly be excused, if I did abandon my selfe to the passions of loue, being so iust and lawful, as of her that should be my wife: wherefore I fauour yours as much as I may. Your Spouse hath bene kept here with mee with such honour and respect, as if shee had bene with her father and mother, and hath bene garded to make a pure and absolute present vnto you, worthe of my qualitie and yours. I demand onely in recompence of this gift, that you will be a friend to the people of Rome; and if you thinke me thereby to be an honest and a good man, such as they of this country haue heretofore knowne my deceased father and uncle to haue bene, know that there are many such in the citie of Rome; and remember, that there is not any nation vpon the earth, whose hatred you and yours should more seeke to auoid, and to seeke their friendship, than ours.

This unexpected fauor, the which could not be comprehended nor equalled by any recompence or thanks, held this Spaniard seized with joy and shame: who taking Scipio by the right hand, prayed all the gods to require the great fauour he had done him, seeing he found himselfe insufficient to make any satisfaction as he desired. Then were the virgins parents called, who seeing their daughter already freed without any ransom, entreated Scipio very earnestly to receiue the gold which they had brought to redeeme her, which was of a good quantitie, saying, they would hold it for a great grace, that he had preserved their daughter vnderfled.

A Scipio being much importuned by them, was content to please them: whereby hee caused these presents to be brought before him, and hauing called for Allucius, hee sayd vnto him: Besides that which you are to receiue of your father in law in dowrie with your wife, take this present from me, commanding him to carrie this gold away with him. Allucius hauing receiued these honours and presents from Scipio, he returned ioyfull and content to his house, filling the whole countrey with his prayse and merits: and in truth it was an act as generous, liberrall, chaste, and religious, as hath bene in the memorie of any age done by a Pagan in his youth and vigour, and who had commandement and soueraigne power in that behalfe ouer the enemy; but it may be it was not without ambition, nor humane considerations.

B There was a bruit throughout all Spaine, That there was a young man come like vnto a god, who surmounted all things, as well by force of armes, as by his courtie and bounty: wherefore Allucius hauing made a leuie of his friends and vassals, came within few dayes vnto Scipio, being accompanied with foureteeen hundred horse, to doe him and the people of Rome seruiue.

C Scipio after hee had stayed C. Lelius with him some dayes, to dispose of the hostages, the spoyle, and all other things with his aduice and counsell, he sent him to Rome with a galeasse, and Mago with him, who was late Gouverneur of new Carthage, and about fifteene Senators prisoners, to bee messengers and assured witnesses of his victorie. During his abode at Carthage, he exercised his souldiours in all exercises fit for the warres, as well by land as sea. The first day he caused the Legions to run armed foure myles together, which makes a league: the next day he made them to scoure their armes before their tents: the third day they fought in forme of bataille with poles and darts blunted: the fourth day they rested, and the fifth they ran againe with their armes. Thus he did employ his souldiours during his abode at Carthage. The mariners did exercise themselves in rowing vp and downe in their galleies, and made feights to trie the swiftnesse of their galleies. These things were done without the wals of the towne, to fashion their minds and bodies to all warlike exercises: but within Carthage there was nothing but preparation to armes, the Generall being careful to see all things himselfe in person. Sometimes he went aboard the galleies, sometimes he ran with the Legionaries, sometimes he went to visit the workmen in the Port and Arsenall, vsing incredible care and diligence. Hauing thus prouided for all things necessarie, repaired the breaches of the towne, and manned it with good souldiours, he went to Tarracone. In the end the deputies of many townes of Spaine came vnto him, where he had assigned an assembly for all the allies of the people of Rome, as well old as new, whither came many deputies on this side Ebro, and some beyond it.

The Captaines and Commanders of the Carthaginians did what they could to conceale the losse of Carthage; and when as they found it was generally knowne, they fought with good words to repaire their losse, saying, it was but a towne lost, surprised by a young man, who perswaded himselfe, that he had thereby woon all: but when he should see three great captaines and three victorious armies approach, he would abate his pride, and remember the miserable end of his house. This they bruted among the people, yet knew they that the losse of Carthage had much weakened their forces.

The 34 day after that Lelius was parted from Carthage, he arrived at Rome with his prisoners, to the great contentment of the people. The next day hee deliuered vnto the Senate what had bene done in Spaine; the towne of new Carthage (the chiefe of the whole countrey) taken in one day, and many townes which were reuolted, returned againe to the Romans, and many others receiued into a new league; the which was verified by the prisoners answers. The Romans about all things feared Afrubals passage: for they had worke ynough to resist Hannibal alone. Lelius was sent backe into Spaine in the same vessell which had brought him.

The yeare following, when as Qu. Fab. Max. for the fifth time, and Qu. Fulv. Placc. for the fourth time were Consuls of Rome. Scipio hauing spent all the Winter to win the hearts of this barbarous nation, some by presents, others in deliuering them their hostages and prisoners, Edesio a famous captaine among the Spaniards came vnto him: His wife and children were with the Romanes, the which was partly the cause of his reuolt: and withall, he found

As they were selling of the Africane prisoners, by the Generals commaund, there was a goodly young stripling, whom the Treasurer (hearing that he was royally defended) sent to Scipio: being demanded by Scipio, What he was, and of whence, and why he followed armes being so young? he answered with teares, That he was a Numidian, and that his name was Masinissa, who being left an Orphan, retired to Gala king of the Numidians, his grandfather by the mothers side, and there had bene bred up, and had followed his uncle Masinissa, who came lately into Spaine to succour the Carthaginians with some bands of horse: That before that time hee had neuer bene in any combat, for that his uncle restrained him, by reason of his tender age: but the day of the last charge he had stolne from him, and hauing found means to recouer horse and armes, he had thrust himselfe into the battaile with the rest, where he had bene ouerthrowne by the defaults of his horse, and was taken by the Romanes. Scipio commaunded, that this Numidian should be kept, vntill hee had finished that which concerned the publicke. Being afterwards retired to his tent, he sent for him againe, and asked him if he would returne to his vncl; who answered with great signes of joy, That he would be very glad. Then Scipio hauing giuen him a gold ring, a rich embrodered robe, a cascocke after the Spanish fashion, with a clasp of gold; and hauing mounted him vpon a good horse, with rich furniture, he sent him away, giuing him certaine knights to conduct him where hee pleased. These things being thus past, as they consulted among the Romanes touching the affaires of the warre, many were of opinion, That he should pursue Asdrubal; yet Scipio was content to place a garrison in the straits and passages of the mountaines, employing all the rest of the Summer to win the Spaniards by gifts and other fauours, receiuing many into the alliance and protection of the people of Rome.

17 In the meane time the two other captaines Mago and Asdrubal sonne to Gisgo came into base Spaine, to joyne with Asdrubal Barcinien, somewhat too late after his defeat, but very fitly to consult of their affaires. They saw the Spaniards were daily practised to reuolt, and that the Carthaginians should not be able to hold any one place in Spaine, if they did not speedily prevent it. Asdrubal of Gisgo relied much vpon the Spaniards which dwelt along the Ocean, and about Gadiz, where the Romanes had not yet bene: but the other two did foresee that the Romanes bountie would corrupt them as well as the rest; assuring themselves, that there was not any Communalitie, nor priuat man in Spaine, which began not to wauer, and would neuer cease to reuolt, if they did not vse one means to prevent it: which was, That Asdrubal Barcinien should gather together all the Spaniards he could, and lead them into Italie, as it had bene formerly concluded: and by this means Spaine should be disarmed of her owne forces, and more easily kept in awe by feare; and as for their armies, they would supply them with other souldiours: and therefore they were of opinion, That Mago should leaue his troupes to Asdrubal Gisgo, and passe speedily into the Islands of Maiorca and Minorca, with store of treasure, to make good leuiues of that nation: In the meane time Asdrubal of Gisgo should retire into the farthest bounds of the Lusitanians, to auoid all occasion of fighting with the enemy: That Masinissa with three thousand horse chosen out of all the bands, should spoyle the enemies country on this side the riuer of Ebro, and succour their friends and faithfull allies. These things being concluded by the Carthaginian captaines, were presently put in execution.

In the eleuenth year of the second Punicke warre, M. Marcellus and T. Quintus Crispinus being created Consuls at Rome, the gouernments of Spaine were confirmed for another year to P. Cor. Scipio and to M. Sillanus. The sea Armie in Spaine being eightie galleys, as well of those which came out of Italie, as were taken at Carthage, were reduced vnto thirtie by a decree of the Senate, commaunding Scipio to send fiftie into Sardinia, as well for the defence of that Island, as of Italie, by reason of the great preparation which was made in Affricke, whereas they said the Carthaginians did arme two hundred fayle, to come vpon the coast of Italie. This year Spaine was somewhat quiet, Asdrubal thinking onely of his voyage into Italie, and to prepare his armie, wherein he vsed exceeding great diligence, vntill he had passed the Pyrenees. Being entred into Gaule with great store of treasure; hee leuiued souldiours of that nation, and assured his passage by the Alpes; the which did much trouble the Romanes: for they had then worke ynough to make head against Hannibal; but the wilde

passeth into Italie.

A dome of C. Nero and M. Linnus, the new Consuls for the year following, freed them of that care: who by an aduenturous, but a necessarie stratageme of warre, whilst they kept Hannibal play in Apulia, defeated and slew Asdrubal, neere vnto Senegaille, with almost all the Spaniards, Gaules, and Ligurians, whereof his army consisted: a defeat which did recompence that of Canes, yet was it not without great effusion of blood on the Romanes side, who lost about 8000 men. Yet this did assure their estate, which vntill that time had bene in great danger; and Hannibal vpon the newes of his brothers death, began to distrust his owne good successe and his countries.

Spaine during Asdrubals preparation, and a while after his passage into Italie, had some rest from warre, but they fell soone againe to armes. At that time Asdrubal, sonne to Gisgo, kept about the Island of Gades, and in the West marches, neere vnto the Ocean. The Romanes commaunded all along the Mediterranean sea, and held all that part of Spaine which lies towards the East. In the place of Asdrubal Barcinien they had sent Hanno from Carthage, with a new armie; who hauing passed the sea, joyned with Mago. These two had leuiued among the Celtiberians (which is in the midst of Spaine) great troupes of souldiours, in a short space. Scipio sent M. Sillanus against this armie with 10000 foot and 500 horse; who making great marches, by difficult and strait passages, which are ordinarie in Spaine, hee approached by the means of certaine Celtiberian guides (who had changed their parties) neere vnto the enemy, before they had any newes of him, being also aduerted by the same Celtiberians, when hee came within two leagues of them, that vpon the way hee should encounter two of their camps; that of Celtiberians, newly leuiued, on the left hand, being some 9000 men; and the other of Carthaginians, on the right hand. As for these, they obserued good discipline, kept their gards, and had their sentinels placed in good order; but the others regarded it not, but were secure and carelesse, like new souldiours: who thinking themselves at home, apprehended nothing that was to be feared. Wherefore Sillanus marched first towards them, causing his troupes to goe on the left hand, as closely as they could, least the Carthaginians in the other lodging should discover him. Then he sent forth some to discover the enemies countenance, and marched speedily after them. He was now within lesse than halfe a league, before the enemy had any notice of his coming; for he went by broken wayes and deepe vallies full of trees, where he fed his armie: there they returned vnto him, whom he had sent forth to discover, who confirmed that which the reuolted Spaniards had deliuered vnto him. Then the Romanes (leauing their baggage vpon the place) put themselves in battaile, and marched against the enemies, whom they found in great amazement, seeing the Roman armie so neere. Mago, who was in the other campe, posted thither vpon the first bruit, to put them in defence. There were some 4000 good souldiours among the Celtiberians, carrying targuets, and 200 horse, the which were set in the front, and the rest to second them were lightly armed; and in this manner they came to fight. They were scarce come without their rampiers, when as the Romanes cast their darts at them, but the Spaniards flooped to auoid them: then rising suddainly againe, they cast theirs against the Romanes, who standing close, and couered with their targuets, defended themselves from any harme; but approaching neerer, they came to the sword. The place where they did fight was of great advantage for the Celtiberians, by reason of the vneuenesse, whose custome was to skirmish with leapes and jumps; contrarie to the Romanes, who fight close, and stand firme: and therefore this vneuen ground did not much trouble them, but that they were sometimes constrained to breake their ranks, by reason of the straits and litle groues, wherewith the country is full, fighting sometimes one to one, and two to two; the which did also hinder the enemies from flying, and exposed them to the slaughter. All those of the foreward which carried targuets, were in a manner slaine, and they continued killing and ouerthrowing those that were lightly armed, and the Carthaginians which were come to their succours, led by another Hanno, who was taken alie: but Mago retired in the beginning of the battaile with about 3000 foot and all the horse, and the tenth day after came vnto Asdrubals campe. The Celtiberian souldiours which remained, got home into their country through the woods and forrests. This victorie was very pleasing vnto Scipio, who did greatly extoll Sillanus his vertue, and was in hope to end the warre, if he did speedily set vpon Asdrubal, who remained in the remotest part of Spaine, in the Betique Prouince, which now is Andalousie. He hauing intelligence, that Scipio marched towards him, dislodged from the place where hee encamped, and retired in great disorder towards the Island of Gades, then thinking, that whilest he had an armie in field, they would not cease to pursue him, he resolved to breake vp his campe, and to put his souldiours into garison, as well for their safetie, as the townes, and he himselfe went into the Island.

Scipio being aduertised, that the enimie had no armie in field, and seeing that he must make warre in diuers parts of the countrey, and besiege one towne after another, a matter of some difficultie, and of more toile than profit, he turned head again: yet for that he would not wholly abandon that part of Spaine to the enemy, he left L. Scipio his brother with an army of 10000 foot and 1000 horse, to trie if he could take Aurige, the chiefe place of the countrey, situated in a fertile soyle, vpon the marches of the Mellefians, the inhabitants whereof were naturall Spaniards. There were certain mynes of siluer found, & it was Asdrubals retreat, from whence he made his courtes into the countrey. L. Scipio being come neere the towne, before he did wholly besiege it, he sent some to parle with the inhabitants, to know their minds, and to persuade them rather to trie the Romans friendship than their armes. Preuailling nothing, he besieged it, and cast a trench about it, with a double pallisado, diuiding his armie into 3 troups, the which should keepe the towne in continuall alarme. The first assault given by one of the three troups was valiantly maintained, and their ladders, with the souldiours which mounted, throwne into the ditch, and the assaillants were often in danger to be drawne vp with hooks of yron, which the besieged cast downe from the wals and towers, so as the Romans were forced to retire. L. Scipio finding that the small number which he had sent to the assault made the partie inequall, hauing therefore caused the first to retire, he sent all the rest of his armie to giue a new assault: the which did so amaze the besieged, being tyred with the first assault, as the inhabitants abandoned the wals; and the garison of Carthaginians thinking that the towne had bin yielded, left their gards where they had bin sent, and put themselves into one body. The inhabitants fearing, that if the enemy forced the towne, they should be all put indifferently to the sword, resolved to prevent this danger by yielding: and hauing opened a gate, they went forth in troups, carrying only their targets, to defend themselves from the Romans darts, and holding vp their right hands naked in sign of peace, they let the Romans vnderstand that they yielded. It is doubtfull whether they did vnderstand their meaning, seeing them come a far off, or whether the Romans did doubt some fraud; but they charged these poore Spaniards, and cut them all in peeces, and by the same port entred the towne with their colours flying, killing all they met without exception, & in the meane time some of their troups forced the other gates, and made way vnto their companions. The horsemen being entred, seized vpon the chiefe places, as they were commaunded, being followed by them which they called Triares, which are footmen, fighting alwaies in the rereward, so second where need required. The rest of the legonaries dispersed themselves throughout the towne, putting all to the sword. In the end the Carthaginians were taken prisoners, and some 300 of the inhabitants: the rest which remained after the furie were pardoned, and their houses and libertie yielded them. There died at the taking of this towne 2000 of the enemies, and some 90 of the Romans. It was a pleasing exploit to them that did execute it, but especially to P. Scipio, who commended Lucius his brother with all the honorable tearmes he could, equalling the taking of Aurige to that of Carthage: and seeing winter approached, & that there was little reason to pursue Asdrubal, & lesse to vndertake the siege of Calis, he retired with his campe on this side Ebro, & sent his souldiours to winter. He sent L. Scipio to Rome, with newes of that which had bin done, and with him he sent Hanno, one of the enemies captains, and many other great prisoners: this done, he retired to Tarracoe.

19 The Romans after this good successe were in hope to chase their enemies out of Spaine: for hauing defeated one of their armies, taken one of their chiefe commanders, the rest of their forces being disbanded, and forced to liue within their forts and garisons, in the farthest parts of the countrey, Scipio thought there was now no cause of any present feare, but that he might dispose of his affaires at leysure: yet he was deceived: for Spaine by reason of their stirring spirits, and the opportunitie of places, was in that respect as fit as any Region in the world (after such defeats) to leuie new armies, and to reuine the warre. Asdrubal then, sonne to Gisgo (who did second the Barcins in wisdom and valour worthie of a great Commander) being assisted by Mago, sonne to Amilcar, did so deale with the Spaniards,

A as he leuied 50000 foot and 4500 horse of that nation, beyond the riuer of Ebro: he mustered them neere vnto the towne of Sylpia, and there did the two Carthaginian captains encampe, being resolved to accept of a battaile if it were offered. Scipio aduertised of this great unexpected preparation, drew his Legions to field, although he held them not sufficient to oppose against so mightie an armie. As for the fauours of Spanish allies, his meaning was to make some shew vnto the enemy: yet would he not fortifie himselfe with so great troups, as he should haue cause to feare his ruine by their trecherie, as had happened vnto his father and vncl: wherefore he sent Syllanus to Colca, who commaunded ouer 28 townes, to demand the succours of horse and foot, which he had promised to enroll during the Winter: and he himselfe

B selfe going from Tarracoe, as he passed by the townes of his allies, tooke vp such souldiours as he thought good, and came to Castulo, whereas Syllanus met him with 3000 foot and 500 horse. From thence he marched beyond Beclia, hauing in his armie, as well of citizens of Rome, as of allies, of foot and horse about 45000 fighting men. As they made their lodging, and did rampier it after the accustomed manner, beheld Mago and Mastimiffa come with all their horsemen, and charge them that were busie at worke; whom they had put to rout, if Scipio had not caused certaine bands of horsemen to gard them, being in battaile behind a little hill, who aduanced against the first that were approached neere the rampiers, forcing them to retire in the beginning without any great difficultie. The fight was long, and somewhat doubtfull against them which came afterwards close and in good order, but when as

C the Roman bands which were dispersed here and there, and that the souldiours which laboured at the rampiers, left their worke and fell to armes (being so commaunded) the wearied refreshed with new supplies, and greater numbers coming full from the campe, then the Numidians and Carthaginians finding the charge hote, retired in the beginning in good order, but being ouerpressed by multitudes, they could no longer make head, but were put to rout, every man sauing himselfe as he could. This encounter did puffed vp the hearts of the one, and abate the courage of the others, yet there were daily skirmishes betwixt the horsemen and them that were lightly armed. In the end Asdrubal put his army into battaile, the which Scipio did also on his part: but either armie continued in that manner neere his fort, vntill the evening: whereupon first the Carthaginians and then the Romans retired into their camps, and thus they continued for certaine dayes together, Asdrubal comming first to field, and making his retreat first, without any attempt one against another. The Romans held the middle part in their battaile, and the Carthaginians did the like in theirs, being mixt with Africans: vpon the wings in either armie were their allies, all Spaniards: before the Carthaginians battaile were their Elephants, which a farre off shewed like castles, and it was giuen out, That the armies should fight in that manner, and that the Romans and Carthaginians (betwixt whom the quarrell was, holding the midst of the battailes) should encounter with like armes and courage. Scipio hearing that this opinion was generally beleueed, changed the order of his battaile: wherefore at night he caused warning to bee giuen secretly throughout the campe, That every one should be ready for the breake of day, that both men and horse should refresh themselves, the horsemen should be armed, and the horses saddled and bridled: And when as day began to appeare, he sent all his horsemen, and the footmen that were lightly armed, against the Corps de gard, which were vpon the approaches of the enemies campe, and then he marched himselfe with the whole armie, hauing against the expectation both of his own souldiours and of the enemy set the Romans vpon either wing, and the troups of their allies in the midst. Asdrubal moued at the noyse which his horsemen made, goes out of his tent, and seeing the tumult which was before the trenches and pallisades of his campe, the small assurance of his souldiours, the enemies colours glistening a far off, and all the fields covered with their troups, he presently sends forth his horsemen against the Roman horse, and he himselfe hauing put his footmen in battell, goes out of his campe, without changing any thing of his former order. The horsemen encounter continued long, without any aduantage: for when as

*The two armies

F any one was forced to giue back (the which was ordinarie on either side) they had a safe retreat to their squadrons of foot: but after that the bodies of both armies were neere one vnto another, Scipio giuing a signe, caused his horse to retire, & opening the ranks of foot, received them within the battell: then he placed them in two squadrons behind the points of it, to reinforce and support his foot; and when he saw it was time to charge, he commanded the battallion in the middest (which were all Spaniards) to march softly: he himselfe leading the right point, had given charge to Syllanus and Martius (who had charge on the other side) that as they should see him advance, they should doe the like, and begin the battaile with the enemy, with the most resolute of their horse and foot, before the two squadrons in the middest should come to joyne. Wherefore stretching forth in this manner both the wings, either of them with three companies of foot and as many horse, and some forlorne hopes lightly armed, went with all speed to affront the enemy, whilst the others followed. Betwixt both wings there was a void place, for that the Spaniards marched more slowly; and they had already begun the charge on either side, when as the chiefe strength of the enemy (which consisted in the Carthaginians and old African fouldiours) was yet a crosse-bow shot off, and durst not turne towards the wings to succour their companions, least they should leaue the battaile naked and open to the enemy, who came against them. The horsemen and Roman fouldiours did wonderfully gall the enemies wings vpon the flankes, the companies of foot which made the point, prest them in front, and sought to cut off the wings from the rest of the battaile, and euen now the partie was not equall in any part: for besides that the points of the Carthaginians army were furnished with horse-boyes and Spaniards newly leued, who had to deale with Romanes and braue Latine fouldiours, the day being far spent, Asdrubal's armie grew weake, for that they had beene surprisid by the alarme in the morning, and were forced to put themselves in battaile without feeding: the which Scipio had done of purpose, and to that end had delayed the fight for many houres, beginning it as beate as he could. It was past noone before the foot companies which were in the wings began to charge, and much later before the battailions in the middest did joyne, so as before that all their forces came to fight, the heat of the Sunne, the toyle being so long on foot, laden with armes, hunger, and thirst, had so tyred the Carthaginians and young Africanes, as they were forced to support themselves vpon their targuets, they were so faint. Besides the Elephants (terrified with the furious combate which was vpon either wing) had run through their middle battaillon. Wherefore the Carthaginians tyred in bodie, and fainting in courage, began to recoyle, but without disorder, euen as if they had retired by their Generals command. But the victorious Romanes charging them with great resolution on all sides, when as they found them to shrink, notwithstanding all the persuasions of Asdrubal to keepe their ranks vnto the next hils, where they had a safe retreat (being not able to withstand the enemies force) they all turned their backs and fled, feare being of more force than shame. Being come vnto the foot of those hils, they would haue stayed their ensignes, and rallied themselves to make head against the Romanes, who had made a stand to put themselves in order to assaile them: but when they saw they were eagerly pursued, they fled into the fortification of their campe, with great amazement, being chased so neere by the Romanes, as they had almost entred pell-mell with them. There fell so great a shower after the heat of the Sunne, as they which pursued, were forced to stand still, and to retire with great toyle vnto their campe: yea, there were some which did superstitiously beleue, That it was not good to proceed any farther that day. Although the night and the rain did inuite the Carthaginians (who were tyred and wounded) to take some rest; yet feare and danger made them to fortifie their campe with all expedition, which they presumed would be assailed by the enemy at the breake of day: and seeing they could not conquer by armes, they rayed their rampiers with stones, gathered out of the neere valleys. Hereupon they did see themselves abandoned by their allies: wherefore they thought it best to be gone, holding slight more safe for them than any force. The beginning of the Spaniards reuolt was by Aranes Lord of the Turditanes, who passed vnto the Romans campe with great troups of his subjects: and soone after two sorts of importance were yielded vnto the Romanes by such as had them in gard. Asdrubal fearing this mischiefe would grow greater, trusted vp his baggage and dislodged. Scipio being aduertised in the morning, that the enemy was gone, sent his horsemen after them, and then marched after with the Legions and the rest of the armie with all speed: who if they had followed them the right way, they had soone overtaken them: but they trusted to their guides, who assured them of another way, which conducted them to the riuer of Betis, where they might cut off their passage. Asdrubal hearing that way was stopped, was once in mind to haue retired towards the Ocean: but

A but his fouldiours (observing no kind of discipline) marched like men that fled, so as they got some ground of the Roman Legions: yet the horsemen and fouldiours which were lightly armed, pursued them still, and did not abandon them; but charging them sometimes in the rear, and sometimes in the flanke, did stay them and force them to fight, vntill the Legions arrived: then was there no more any combat; but a slaughter, as of sheepe, vntill that their Generall (the author of their flight) saved himselfe with about seuen thousand men, most without armes; the rest were in a manner all slaine or taken. The Carthaginians which escaped with their captaine, entrenched themselves suddenly vpon a mount, and there defended themselves easily against the Romanes; who did strive to get vp; yet being in a naked and desolate place, and vnto to endure a siege of few dayes, many disbanded and went to the Romanes campe: the which Asdrubal perceiving, he abandoned his fouldiours, embarked himselfe, and passed into the Iles of Calis. Scipio aduertised of his flight, left Syllanus with tenne thousand foot and a thousand horse to besiege their campe, and he with the rest of the armie returned in 70 daies to Tarracoe, where he should dispose of the affaires of the princes and noblemen of Spaine; and giue rewards according to euery ones merit.

After his departure, Syllanus had secret conference with Mastinissa, who having new designs in his head, passed into Africke with a small traine, that he might draw his people to his owne humor. The cause of his suddaine change did not then appeare, the which he did afterwards iustifie by a long and constant loyalty; wherein hee did persist vntill his death.

C Mago did also passe into the Island of Gades, Asdrubal having sent backe the vessels: so as the armie (being abandoned by the Commanders) was disperised, some saving themselves by flight in the neighbour townes, and some yeelding to the Romanes. In this manner were the Carthaginians chased out of Spaine, about the twelfth year of the second Punick warre, by the conduct and happinesse of Publius Scipio, five yeares after that he had had the charge of the armies and government of Spaine. Within few daies after Syllanus came to Scipio, being at Tarracoe, bringing him newes, that the warre was ended. L. Scipio was sent from thence to Rome, with many prisoners of warre to carrie newes of the absolute victorie obtained of the Carthaginians in Spaine. But Scipio not content to haue effected so great matters in that country, had a greater designe, so great was his mind, and so desirous of glorie. D Wherefore knowing, that there was not any one man to make head against him in Spaine, he embraced all Africke, whither he passed to make factions, and to trouble the Carthaginians Estate: the which succeeded happily, but it may be with greater hazard than was fit for his ranke.

Pub. Cornelius Scipio being returned out of Africke, where he had withdrawne from the alliance of the Carthaginians king Siphax their neighbour, and although hee did now see Spaine quiet in respect of the Africanes; yet he knew, that some townes did containe themselves more for feare than for any loue, as those which had greatly incensed the Romanes during the precedent warres: the first and chiefe, either in greatness or offence, were Castulo and Illiturgis: Those of Castulo had shewed themselves friends during the prosperitie of the Romanes; but after the defeat and death of the two Scipios, they had reuolted to the Carthaginians. The Illiturgians had done worse: for besides their reuolt, they had deliuered such as had saved themselves there after these defeats, to the slaughter. These crimes were wisely dissembled by Scipio, when hee came first into the Prouince, and that matters were yet doubtfull: for if he should then haue punished them, he should haue respected iustice more than profit. All things being now assured and quiet, hee thought it a fit time to punish them. Wherefore having called Lu. Martius to Tarracoe, he sent him to besiege Castulo, with the third part of his forces; and hee himselfe departing from Carthage, led the rest of his armie before Illiturgis, whither he came in five dayes march. The inhabitants doubting, that they would not leaue their trecheries unpunished, had fortified their towne, and furnished themselves with all things necessarie to endure a siege. Scipio let his fouldiours vnderstand, That these Spaniards did rightly feare that which they had merited, exhorting them to goe against them with greater furie than against the Carthaginians themselves. For (sayd he) the quarrell which wee haue had against them of Carthage, was one wickednesse and cruell treason. The time is now come, when wee shall reuenge the murders done unto my companions, and the trecherie which they had prepared for you, if you had fallen into their hands after the defeat: and therefore let us deale so, as neuer any Nation shall hereafter dare to wrong the souldiers or citizens of Rome in any disgrace whatsoever. Having animated his souldiers with these words, hee commaunded ladders should be brought, and distributed to the most assured companies: then diuiding his armie into two, he commaunded, That Lelius his Lieutenant should assaile the towne on the one side, and he would lead the rest into diuers places; the which was executed with great courage and resolution. The townsmen had no need of any capitaine to encourage them in their defence: for euery one knowing his danger, was both a spurre to himselfe and his companion, saying, That it was not the honour of a victorie which they fought for them, but their punishment: That they must make an account to die, but it was more honest and safe to hazard it fighting (whereas euery one giueth as well as taketh, and oftentimes the vanquished riseth, and the victor falleth) rather than to be led bound and manacled (after that wee shall haue seene our towne burnt to ashes) to end our liues with torments, and all ignominie, in the sight of our wiues and children, who shall be made slaues. Wherefore they came resolutely to the walls, not onely such as were able to carrie armes, but old men, women, and children, which made resistance about their forces; they brought stones, and gaue armes to those that did fight. It was not onely a question of libertie which giueth courage to valiant men, but they did apprehend the horror of punishments, and the vild and ignominious death which they should suffer: euery one tooke courage, seeing his companions valour: Wherefore if it was well assailed, it was better defended: so as this Romane armie, which had subdued all Spaine, being often repulld by the inhabitants, did shamefully wauer. Which Scipio perceiving, he feared least his men should faint after so many vaine attempts, and the enemies should grow more hardie, wherefore hee thought it needfull to hazard his owne person, and to bee partaker of the danger: whereupon he commaunded them to make ready their ladders againe, and reproching the souldiers of cowardise, he aduanced to mount himselfe (if he had found them slacke) and came neere vnto the wals, not without great danger: but the souldiers being very carefull of their Generall, began all to crie out, and carried ladders to all parts. Lelius did also presse them on his side: so as then the valour of the defendants was forced to giue place, and they abandoned the rampiers. It happened, that during this tumult, the fort which was held impregnable was surpris'd: for certaine souldiers of Africke reuolted, which were in the Romane armie, seeing that they of the towne were busied to withstand an assault in the most dangerous places, and the Romanes as busie to get an entrie into the towne, they obserued the highest part of the towne, couered with a steepe rocke, which had neither rampier, gard, nor defence. These men being actiue and nimble, began to creepe vp this rocke, with the helpe of certaine pykes of yron, which they did strike into the stones, and made steps of them, the first helping vp their companions which followed; so as in the end they got vp to the top of the rocke, from whence they began to run with horrible cries towards the towne, which was already woon by the Romanes. Then shewed they the fruits of their choler and hatred: none were spared, but all put to the sword, men, and women, of all ages and sexes; yea, and poore infants: no man cared for spoyle, the fire deuoured what might be consumed, and the rest was ruined, for that the Romanes would not leaue the markes of a towne, nor the memorie of any habitation of such enemies.

From thence Scipio led his armie to Castulo. This towne was not onely kept by Spaniards, which were come thither from diuers places, but also by the remainder of the Carthaginians, which were brought thither to garrison after the retreat of their armie. But before that Scipio arrived, they had newes of the taking of Illiturgis, which strucke a great terror among them, and made them almost to despair: and as euery mans guilt was not alike, so euery one fought to provide for his owne safetie. Wherefore they began to distrust one another, and in the end fell to an open diuision, the Spaniards seperating themselves from the Carthaginians: Cordubelus commaunded the Spaniards, who spake openly, That they must yield vnto the Romans: Himilco was chiefe of the Carthaginians, whom Cordubelus deliuered vp with the towne vnto the Romans. By this voluntarie reddition, being also not so culpable as they of Illiturgis, the victorie was vsed with lesse rigor.

A 22. From thence Martius was sent against them of that nation, which plaied the rebels, to subiect them to the Romane yoke: and Scipio returned to new Carthage, to performe the vowes which he had made vnto his gods, and to represent the games of fencing which he had prepared in honour of his deceased father and vncle. These fences which were brought forth, were none of his slaues, nor such as had bene made free, which the master fences were wont to present vnto the people, which sell their blood, and are hired for money: but all those that did fight, came willingly without any fee: for some were sent by the noblemen of the countrey, to shew the valour and dexteritie of the nation; others presented themselves vnto the combat, for the loue they bare vnto their Generall; others thrust forth with glorie, defied, or being challenged, accepted the combat willingly. Some there were, which not able to end their suites by pleading, resolved erie it by the sword, who were of no base condition, but gentlemen of noble houses. Among others Corbis and Orfus, two cousin germes, who contended for the principalltie of the towne of Ibis, would end their controuersie by armes. Corbis was the elder. The father of Orfus had lately ruled in that towne, having succeeded to that seignorie by the death of his brother. Scipio would haue reconciled them by iustice, and knowledge of the cause; but they both answered, That it was not the custome among Carthaginiens, and that they would not haue any gods nor men to be their iudges, but Mars. Corbis was the stronger, and Orfus the more courageous, by reason of his youth, both resolute to die, rather than to submit himselfe vnto his aduersie partie. With this resolution they shewed themselves to the whole armie. The eldest also had more experience in his weapon, and was more cunning, so as he did easily vanquish the foolish presumption of the younger. To these fights of fences were added funeral plaies, according to the manner of the Pagans, with preparation fit for the countrey, and as at the warre.

23 During these shewes, the Romanes lost no time, Scipio's lieutenants being seriously employed about their affaires. Martius hauing past the riuer Betis (called Cice by them of the countrey) tooke two good and rich townes, without striking stroke. There was another towne called Astapa, the which had alwayes held the Carthaginians partie, and made profession to hate the Romanes deadly, yea when there was not any necessitie of warre: but the nature of these men (who had no delight but in theeuing had caused them to spoile the countries of the Romane allies, and to strip their victualers, souldiers, or merchants, if they found them scattered; yea they had layd an ambush for a great troupe of men passing through their countrey, and hauing surpris'd them in a strait, had slaine them. When as the armie came before the towne, the inhabitants prickt with the feeling of their faults, expected no mercie of their enemies, and seeing no meanes to hold against a siege, they tooke a cruell and detestable resolution: for they brought into the middell of their market place all that was good and precious within the towne, and laied it on a heape, vpon the which they set their wiues and children; then they planted great store of fagots and other wood round about it: this being done, they appointed fiftie yong men well armed, for the gard thereof, enjoying them, that whilest the euent of the fight betwixt them and the Romanes was doubtfull, they should helpe maintaine there, and be faithfull gardians of their goods, and of those persons whom they held deere: but if they saw it succeeded ill, and that the towne was in danger to bee lost, they might then be assured, that all they which had fallied out vpon the enemies were slaine in the fight: wherefore they did coniure them by all the celestiall and infernall gods, to remember their libertie, which that day should end by an honest death, or by an infamous seruitude: and therefore they should not leaue any thing that belonged vnto them, wherewith the enemy might glut his crueltie: to which end they had both fire and swords in their mie in his furie might glut his crueltie: to which end they had both fire and swords in their hands; and that therefore such things as were to perish, should be destroyed by the hands of their faithfull friends, rather than be exposed to the come and infolenzie of the enemy. This spoken, they added an execrable curse vpon those that should suffer themselves to be moued with any pitie or tenderesse of heart, and forbore to execute that which they had decreed; then hauing opened the gate, they marched directly to the Romane trenches, with more than a brutish furie. The Romanes had no conceit they should fall thus forth vpon them, wherefore they found the passages vnto the campe but ill garded. Some troupes of horse and foot as they fled, and he with a small number saved himselfe. Whilest this was doing about that riuer, Lelius arrived with his sea armie at Carteia, hauing past the strait, at the entrie whereof this towne is situated in the Ocean. The Romanes thought they should haue meanes to surpris the towne of Gadiz by intelligence, as they had contriued it with some of the inhabitants: but this busines was discouered before the execution the complices were taken, and deliuered by Mago vnto the Pretor Adherbal, to be led to Carthage the great; who put the conspirators into a galeasse, and for that it was heavier and more slower than the gallies, he sent it a little before, & himselfe followed it with eight gallies. This galeasse was already entered into the strait; when as Lelius discouering it out of the port of Carteia, put forth also with a galeasse, being followed by his seuen gallies, and assuring himselfe that the enemies galeasse carried by the current within that strait (being hard to force) could not turne backe, he went to affront Adherbal and his gallies. The Carthaginian seeing himselfe surprisid, was doubtful whether he should lie after his galeasse, or else make head. Whilest he stands in suspense, Lelius commeth vpon him, and it was not in his power to auoid the combat. They were in a strait, whereas nothing could be done after the manner of sea-fights, by the iudgement of capitaines and mariners: for the sea going high in that place, they could not turne their gallies at their pleasures, the which were carried by the waues as well against their own as against the enemies, notwithstanding all their endeours; so that oftentimes they might haue seene a gallie flying turne her spurre suddenly against that which pursued her, by the turning of a waue, and that which chafed her, to lie away. The gallies being in this strife, it happened, that the Roman galeasse (whether by her weight, or the number of her oares) masting the waues better than the rest, forced two Carthaginian gallies, stemming the one, and disarming the other of all her oares of the one side, as the passed by her, and would in like manner haue endamaged the rest, if she had incountred them: but Adherbal with the helpe of his sailes and oares, recovered that coast of Affricke which was nereest. Lelius being victor, returned to Carteia, and informed of all that which had passed at Gadiz, how that their practise was discouered, and that the conspirators were sent to Carthage, he aduertised Marius, that it was labour lost to stay there, being more expedient to returne towards their Generall: which they did both within few daies after, and came to new Carthage. Mago hearing of their departure, and freed from feare, did not only resume new courage, but was also in hope to recover all Spain by the rebellion of the Ilergetes; wherefore he sent presently to Carthage, to acquaint the Senate with the sedition which had lately happened in the Romanes campe, and the rebellion and reuolt of their allies, giuing them charge to make them greater than they were; perswading them, that it was now a fit time to recover the Seigniorie of all Spaine, which they had receiued from their ancestors, and therefore they should send forces to do it. As for Mandonius and Indibilis, who were gone to the field, vpon the brute of Scipios death, thinking to make vse of the Roman soldiours which were mutined, when as they vnderstood the truth of all things, they retired home to their houses without any alteration, attending what should be done vnto the feditious; presuming, that if Scipio pardoned his own soldiours, he might also vse the like clemencie towards them: but when as they vnderstood with what rigor he had punished them, they thought it was a preface for them to attend the like, for that they were guiltie of the same crime: wherefore they gathered their forces together, and caused their confederats to arme, meeting in the territorie of Sadera, where they had camped in the beginning of their reuolt, being some 20000 foot and 2500 horse. Scipio hauing easily pacified the discontentment of his soldiours, paying vnto euery man what was due vnto him, shewing them a good countenance, and vsing good words, to whom before his departure from Carthage, he made a speech in some bitter tearmes against the rebellion of these two noble men.

I goe not (said he) against these men to punish their ingratitude and wickednesse with the like affliction, as when I did chastise the offences of our fellow citizens, for what I did then was very sparingly, as if I should haue torne out part of mine owne bowels; wherefore I was content to correct the error or the offence of 8000, by the punishment of 35 men: but now that I march with you to ruine the Ilergetes, to whom we are not tied neither by birth nor friendship, seeing that league which was betwixt vs had bin wickedly broken and violated by them, I know that all you of mine armie are either Romanes or Latins: besides, there are few of you which haue not bin brought out of Italie hither by my vncke

Cn. Scipio,

A Cn. Scipio, who first brought a Romane armie into Spaine, or by Publius my father, or by me, and that you are all accustomed to the names and conduct of the Scipioes. Wherefore I desire to carrie you backe, that you may be partakers of the triumph, which we haue well deserved. As for this warre whether we go, let vs not call it a war, if we will remember what we haue done in this country. I do more esteem Mago, who hath saved himselfe in an island out of the world as a man may say with a few ships, than of the Ilergetes. He is a Carthaginian capitaine and holds some forme of a garrison where he is, but these are theues, and captaines of theues, which are of no moment in a well governed warre, but only to ouerrun and spoyle their neighbours fields, carrie away their cattell, and set fire of their farmes: whose force and valour consists in flying swiftly, and not in fighting well. If I goe first against them, doe not thinke it is for any danger, or difficultie, or for any feare I haue that the war will be long by their means, but only to the end so wicked a rebellion should not remaine long unpunished, nor to leaue any enemy in armes, if it be possible, in a province conquered with so great happinesse and valour as we haue done.

Then he exhorted them to follow him vnder the conduct of the gods, not to the wars, but to punish wicked men: injoyning them to be readie for the next day. Being parted, he made ten lodgings with his campe, before he came to the riuer of Ebro, which hauing passed the fourth day following, they presented themselves in sight of the enemy. Betwixt both was a large vally, compassed in with mountaines: there Scipio made some troupes of cattell which had beene taken in the enemies country, to be put, to draw them forth to fight, causing them to be kept with some fouldiours which were lightly armed. The Spaniards fall vpon this booty, and the Romane fouldiours goe to rescue it. Hereupon Lelius arrives, being appointed to second these footmen, with some bands of horse, who arrived fity, for the combat was doubtfull. The Spaniards were repulst by these succours with great slaughter, yet they fainted not for all this, but presented themselves the next day in order of battell, vpon the same place: and for that the vallie was not able to containe all their forces, they brought forth some two third parts of their foot, and all their horse. The Romans held the straitnesse of the place to be an advantage for them, for that their fouldiours did fight better close than in an open field, who kept their ranks, and did not run vp and downe like vnto the Spaniards: besides, they saw that they should haue to deale with two third parts of the enemies armie. And Scipio resolved of a stratagem: for seeing that he could not flanke his footmen with his horse, by reason of the straitnesse of the place, and that by the same reason, the enemies horse were also vnprofitable, he commaunded Lelius to lead all his horsemen about the hills, and to seeke some passage to charge the Spanish horsemen vpon the backe, and to draw them from their foot. And to the end the enemy should not discouer what Lelius intended, he presently went against the enemy with his footmen, placing foure companies onely in front, for that he could not do otherwise: so the battell began in two feuerall places, betwixt two battalions of foot, and two of horse, whereas one could not succour another, till in the end the Spanish foot being put to rout, their horsemen being prest before by the legions, and behind by the Roman horse, were all presently slaine, so as of all the horse and foot which fought in the vallie, there escaped not any one. The other third part of the Spanish army, which came not to fight, but had only been spectators in a safe place, on the top of the hills, had all means to flee away; among whom there escaped Mandonius & Indibilis. The campe and all their baggage was taken, with 3000 prisoners: and of the Romans there were slaine about 1200, & about 3000 hurt. There is no doubt, but they had gotten this victorie with lesse blood, if the field had beene larger, and that the Spaniards might haue fled more easily. After this rout, Indibilis refused to lay aside armes, and as the safest way, to submit himselfe to Scipios faith and clemencie, the which hee had tried: and therefore he sent Mandonius his brother vnto him, who did prostrate himselfe at his feet, confessing their fault, which seemed (said he) to be as a fatall disease in that season: hauing not onely run among the Ilergetes and Lacetanes, but also infected the campe and Romane armie: finally, that both he and his brother were comethier, being readie either to yeeld vpon their liues to Scipio (from whom they had receiued them) if it were his pleasure, or in taking them againe from him, to be for euer bound vnto him. It was an auncient custome with the Romanes, not to capitulate, nor to haue any peace with them with whom they had no alliance nor friendship, before they did yeeld into their hands whatsoever they held, were it holy or prophane, giuen hostages, deliuered vp their armes, & receiued garrisons into their townes. Scipio was content to receiue Mandonius present, and Indibilis being absent at that time, with some bitter speeches giuing them to vnderstand, that they had deserued death: but G they receiued their liues by the grace of the people of Rome. Moreover, that hee would not disarme them, which was the assurance they did vially take of rebels, but would they should hold them freely, and to be void from feare: but if they revolted againe, they should know he would not be reuenged of innocent hostages, but vpon such as had offended, and that he would punish those that should present themselves in armes, and not the disarmed: Wherefore they should chuse, whether they would haue the Romanes fauourable vnto them, or incensed against them. Thus was Mandonius sent away, without any other punishment than money, which they commaunded him to furnish to pay the armie. Scipio hauing sent L. Mar- H tius before, to passe the riuer of Ebro, and Syllanus to Tarracone, he staied some time, vntil the Ilergetes had paid their money, and then he followed after Marius (who approached neere vnto the Ocean) with some few men, and no baggage.

25 The treatie begun with Masiniissa had bene delayed for diuers reasons: for this Nu- midian would treat with Scipio himselfe, and make his promises to him. This made Scipio to vnder- take a long voiage. Masiniissa was in the island of Gades, where hauing intelligence by Me- ritus, that Scipio approached, he told the Governour Mago, That the horses and horsemen were spoiled in the island, where they caused a dearth of all things, to the hurt of others: desiring him to giue them leaue to passe into the firme land, to make some courses into the enemies country. Being past, he presently sent three of the chiefe among the Numidians to Scipio, two of which (should remaine for hostages, and the third returne to bring him notice of the day and place where the enteruie should be; where they met with a small companie. Masiniissa first of all thanked Scipio, That he had sent him his nephew, his brothers sonne: then he said vnto him, That he had long desired to see that day, and that hee desired much to doe something that might be acceptable vnto him, and profitable to the Romans: wherein hee would imploy himselfe more willingly than any stranger whatsoever, the effects whereof he could not yet shew in Spain (a country vnknowne vnto him) but in place where he was borne and bred, hoping to succeed his father in the kingdome: and that if the Romanes did send Sci- pio into Africke, he did hope to worke so, as the estate of Carthage should not stand long. Mas- iniissa was welcome vnto Scipio, who heard his words with great content, knowing that what- soeuer had bene valiantly performed in Spain by the horsemen, was done vnder the onely leading of Masiniissa, who shewed by his carriage and countenance, that he was a yong prince of great hope. So hauing plighted their faith one vnto another, they parted, Scipio towards Tarracone, and Masiniissa to Gades: and to the end hee would not seeme to haue passed into the firme land in vaine, he spoyled some of the neighbour country neere the shore, with Scipios consent.

26 Mago being made frustrat of his conceiued hope, to repaire the Carthaginians affairs in Spain, by the Spaniards rebellion, vnder Mandonius and Indibilis, and the sedition of the Romanes souldiours, resolved to goe into Africke, when as being readie to depart, he receiued order from the Senat of Carthage, by the which he was commaunded to passe with all the shipping he had at Calis, into Italie, and to leaue all the souldiours he could in Gaulle, and a L shipping he had at Calis, into Italie, to the end the warre which had bin long the sea coast, and to ioyne with his brother Hannibal, to the end the warre which had bin begun with such animosities, might be continued with the like resolution. For the effecting whereof they brought money from Carthage, and he for his part got all hee could from the Gaditanes, hauing not onely exhausted their common treasure, but vnfurnished their temples of their jewels and other riches, and forced euerie priuat man to bring him all the gold and silver he had. As he passed along the coast of Spain, comming neere vnto new Carthage he landed some souldiours, which foraged the country neere vnto the sea, and gaue an alarme vnto the whole prouince. Then he approached neere vnto the towne, and hauing kept his souldiours aboard the gallies in the day time, at night he put them on shore, towards that part of the wall whereas the Romanes had entred; supposing that Carthage had not been verie well manned with souldiours, and that haply some of the inhabitants might revolt: but the flight of the country-men, and the centinels (which had discovered the armie at sea the day before) had alreadie giuen aduertisement to the town, who imagined that it was not without some designe, that the gallies had cast anchor so neere vnto them. Wherefore the garrison kept themselves in armes, and stood readie at the port next vnto the poole, and towards the

A the sea. The enemies came in troups mixt of souldiours and mariners, vnto the foot of the wall, with more brute than effect: and then the port was set open, whereas the Romanes made a furious sallie vpon them, with great cries, wherewith they were so amazed, as at the first charge they turned their backs in disorder towards the sea, whither they were purified with great laughter: and if their gallies had not bene verie neere to receive them, there had not any one escaped. Hauing gotten aboard, they were not yet assured, but feared that some of the enemies gallies would come out of the port against them: wherefore they drew vp their ladders and bridges speedily, and for that they would loose no time in weighing their anchors, they cut their cables. And it happened, that many thinking to saue themselves by swimming, they were drowned. This armie returned speedily towards the Ocean, from whence they had parted. Day being come, the Romanes found about 800 men slaine, betwixt the towne and the shore, and about two thousand cuirasses. To Mago (who thought to returne vnto Gades) the entrie was refused: wherefore he returned vnto a place neere vnto it, called Cimbis, from whence he sent certaine gentlemen vnto Gades, to know the reason why they shut the gates against him, who was their friend and alie. To whom they answered, That it had bene done by the multitude, who had bene discontented at the spoiles and infolenities which the souldiours committed, when they imbarqued. Then he sought to draw their Suffe- Magi- fruits of the Ga- drance. Magoes trains noni regour de- gainst the Gad- itanes. an nation) to parley with them, and with their chiefe treasurer. When he had them, hee cau- sed them to be scourged with rods, and then to be hung vpon a gibet. Which done, he sayled towards the Ptyiuses (being islands some hundred miles from the firme land, and inhabited at that time by Carthaginians) where both he and his whole armie were well entertained, the which was not onely refreshed with victuals, but furnished with souldiours and armes by those islanders. Mago relying vpon these things, came vnto the Baleares, some fiftie miles from thence, thinking to winter in the greater of them, the which was rich, and full of men, with a large and safe port; for now Autumne drew neere: But he found himselfe deceiued: for the inhabitants of Majorca went in hostile manner against him, no lesse than the Romanes would haue done, and with their slings kept them from landing; so as the Carthaginians were forced to put out to sea, & went to Minorca, which is the other island of the Baleares, as fertile as the other, but not so strong of men. There they landed, and without any great resistance became the masters of the towne and island: where they inrolled two thousand men of that nation, the which they sent to Carthage to winter. When as Mago had left the Ocean, to enter into the strait, the Gaditanes yielded vnto the Romanes.

These were the affaires which passed in Spain, vnder the government of P. Corn. Scipio, who hauing reigned the prouince and the armies vnto L. Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus, returne- Scipio returnes to Rome. ned to Rome with ten gallies: where being arriued, he made known vnto the Senat the great exploits of warre which he had done, the battels woon, the townes taken, and the people and countries subdued vnder the obedience of the Romanes; finally, that in Spain he had left no enemy. These things were deliuered by him with great state, rather to see if they would grant him a triumphant entrie into the citie, than to demand a triumph: For in truth, vnto that day there had not any captain entred in triumph into the citie of Rome, how great fouer his exploits had bene, if it were not with the title of a Roman magistrat. Being entred into Rome, he brought into the publique treasure, of the remainders of the spoyle of Spain, 14352 pounds of silver in masse, and great store of coined money.

He 14 yere of the second Punick war, which, according vnto the most certaine writers, was in the yere 548 of the foundation of Rome, P. Corn. Scipio and P. Licinius Crassus were chosen Consuls. During their magistracie there grew a great war in Spaine; and from that time the Roman affaires were nothing more quiet, notwithstanding they had chafed away the Carthaginians: For the Spaniards, who are naturally enemies to rest, and desirous of libertie, and yet contemning the in combats, the Romanes had laboured in vaine to subdue this countrey, where they employed much time, much policie, and the blood of their best men. Vntill Scipioes departure, & some time after, the Romanes had not tried the nations dwelling in the mountaines, which runne through the middelt of Spaine, nor those which were towards the North: they had not yet extended their conquests farre from the Mediterranean sea, nor gone much beyond the riter of Betis. But afterwards they knew what difference there was among the Spaniards themselves, when as they were mercenaries, and carried armes for anothers quarell, and when they fought for their owne liberties, houses, and families. And as they past farther into the countrey, they found the difference betwixt those who by their frequentation with strangers, had accustomed themselves to gaine, and to hunt after honours and delights: and the others, who bestowed themselves to gaine, and to hunt after honours and delights: and the others, who bestranged from all commerce, had no other ambition, but not to be subject to any other but to their own lawes; nor other couetousnesse, but of a prey conquered by arms, in the day time, and in fight, thrust on by necessity, without any other respect. These last for the most part were of the race of the auncient Gaules and Celtes, which had crept into Spaine, and did hold all that which we call at this day Nauarre, Biscaye, Alaua, the Asturians, Gallicia, Castilia the old, and a great part of Portugall. All these did not know the Romanes, but as men which laboured to take away other mens goods, to chafe them out of their countries, or to subject them as slaues, and to make their profit of them. They were long before they made any alliances with them, louing them better farr off than neere. In the meane time all these people of Spaine (who generally were couragious and hardie) wanted ciuilitie, and the knowledge of justice, neither knew they how to praise and entertaine the lawes of friendship among themselves: the which at length reduced them all into seruitude, they of whom wee haue spoken, being the first which yielded vnto the yoke, who had seene the Carthaginians and Romanes among them, and had conuersed with them for some yeares. cans, Celtes, and other nations, whose vices they had mingled with theirs, they were in the end wholly corrupted, by the promises and persuations of either of these mightie commonweales, either of them seeking to draw aid and commoditie from them against the other, during the warres; whereof they were glorious, proud, and ambitious, and if they were not held in such estimation, as they thought they had deserued, they were discontented.

They were false and treacherous to strangers, enuious among themselves, and alwayes apt to rebell, and to breed quarels: of which vices the Romanes (seeing themselves freed from the Carthaginian warre) could wisely make vse to subject them, who let them know, that they had honoured some of that nation, yet their meaning was alwayes to hold them in the ranke of subjects, and not of companions: the which their foolish Spanish presumption could not discern, vntill they were taught it to their cost: as it happened to Mandonius and Indibilis, princes of the Ilergetes, people of Catelonia, where as Lerida and Huefca are at this day.

unitie offered to effect their desires, and to make themselves kings of the other people of Spaine, which vnto that time had beene subject, sometimes to the Carthaginians, and sometimes to the Romans, and oftentimes to both; they acquainted their subjects, and the Aufetanes their neighbours, with their designe: vaunting, That if they maintained themselves in vnitie, they might easily expell the Romans out of Spaine, as well as they had chased away the Carthaginians: With whom they preuailed so by their persuasions, as in few dayes they had gathered together in the fields of Sedete 30000 foot, and 4000 horse, and there made the bodie of their army. The leaders of the Roman army, were L. Lentulus and L. Manlius, who being aduertised of this reuolt, meaning to prevent this mischief in time, went speedily to field, and passing quietly through the Aufetanes countrey, as friends, they came whereas the enemies were, and encamped within a league of them. There they tried first by messages and embassages, to diuert them from their foolish enterprise, perswading them to lay aside armes: but it was in vaine. Some foragers of the Romanes being charged by the Spanish horse, they were forced to send some troupes of horse to succour them, where there was an encounter that day, but to no effect. The day following, at the Sunne rising, the Spanish armie advanced in battel, within a mile of the Romane campe. The Aufetanes held the middelt, hauing the Illegetes on the right hand, and on the left some other Spaniards of small fame. They had left betwixt the battalion in the middelt and the two wings, a good large space, to giue passage to their horsemen, when it should be time to come to the charge. The Romanes ordered their armie after their accustomed manner, yet imitating the enemies therein, they left a space also to bring in their horsemen. This done, L. Lentulus bethought himselfe, that they should make best vse of those horsemen which should enter with them first into these spaces which were betwixt the squadrons of the enemies foot: Wherefore he commaunded Ser. Cornelius, who had charge of the Romane horsemen, to enter into those spaces of the Spanish armie. In the meane time he hauing the twelfth legion, being prest in the beginning of the battell by the Illegetes, on the left hand, made it good vntill they were seconded by the thirteenth legion, the which he caused to aduance, to succour them in the front of the battell: and hauing thus assured that part, he ran towards L. Manlius, who did his dutie, encouraging the fouldiours, and sending supplies where he saw any need; aduertising him, that the footmen on the left wing behaued themselves well, and that hee had sent Ser. Cornelius with the horsemen, to charge furiously into the enemies troupes: the effect whereof did presently appeare: for Ser. Cornelius being entred with his horse into the middelt of the enemies, he made all their battell of foot to wauer, and withall stopt the passage to the enemies horse, so as they could not come to fight: which made the Spanish horsemen to leaue their horses. The Romane captaines seeing the Spaniards in some disorder, they cried out, encouraged, and intreated the fouldiours to proceed valiantly, and to keepe them from joyning together againe. The enemies began now to forsake the fight, if Indibilis leauing his horse, had not come and presented himselfe in the head of the footmen. There was a long and bloudie fight, the which they maintained, vntill that Indibilis and those that fought about him, were ouerthrowne and slaine one vpon another: then they began to flie of all hands, and the Romans to pursue them, of whom they made a great slaughter, and withall tooke their campe, and all their baggage. There were 13000 slaine vpon the place, and about 8000 prisoners. Of the Romans there died two hundred, or not many more, especially on the left wing. The Spaniards being thus defeated, the rest which escaped retired home into their countrey.

The Spaniards being afterwards called to counsell by Mandonius, they complained much of their losses, and blaming the authors of this warre, they said, That they were of opinion to send embassadors vnto the Romans, to beseech them to take them to mercie, and that they would deliuer them their armes: the which they did, and excused themselves, laying the fault vpon Indibilis, Mandonius, and others, which had solicited them. To whom the Romans answered, That they would take them to mercie, vpon condition they should deliuer vnto them the authors of this rebellion aloue, else they would intreat the Aufetanes, Illegetes, and other their confederats, as enemies.

This answer being returned by their embassadors, Mandonius and the other authors were taken, and sent to the Romanes to receiue the reward of their misdeeds. By this meanes the troubles in Spaine were pacified, whereas they imposed a double tribute for that year, and a con-

A contribution of come for six moneths, with cassocks and cloakes for the fouldiours: besides, the Romanes forced about thirtie seuerall prouinces to giue hostages. These things were done in Spaine, whilst that P. Scipio prepared to goe into Affricke, to diuert the warre which was betwixt the Romanes and Carthaginians in Italie, whither he had sent C. Lelius, Mago on the other side being arriued at Genes in Italie, and vpon the coast of the Ligusticke sea.

3 The Saguntines (for whose sake this second Punicke warre betwixt the Romanes and Carthaginians had beene vnderaken) had sent embassadours to Rome with Scipio, to thanke the Senate for the care they had of their faithfull allies, to protest of the loue and affection the Commonweale of Sagunt had to the people of Rome, and to offer a crowne of gold to Iupiter Capitolinus his Temple, who were honourably entertained, and rewarded by the Senat: who hauing a desire to see Italie, were by a publicke decree conducted and accompanied with a good gard wherefoeuer they would goe.

Some moneths after, Hannibal being out of Italie, the same Saguntines surprised in Spaine certaine Commisaries and Carthaginian captaines, with a good summe of money, whereas they would haue leuiued fouldiours in that countrey, whom they sent to Rome with their money, and presented them to the Senate. The Commisaries and captaines were detained prisoners, but the money was restored to the Saguntines, with thanks by the Senat: the summe was 250 pounds of gold, and 800 of siluer.

C The Spaniards were so entreated vnder the government of L. Lentulus and L. Manlius, as of the goods and reuenues of Spaine both Rome and Italie were often relieued, with come, apparel, armes, and all other prouisions which they drew from thence. In the end, the Romanes hauing forced the Carthaginians to demaund a peace, after the defeat which Scipio had giuen vnto Hannibal in Affricke, and neere vnto Carthage, it was resolved in the Senat at Rome, to call home the old fouldiours which were in Spaine, to leaue only a Legion of Romanes, with fiftene companies of Latines their allies, and to send a new Gouverneur thither. Wherefore L. Corn. Lentulus returned to Rome: where hauing related what he had valiantly and profitably performed, he demaunded leaue to enter the cite in triumph; the which they refused him, being against the presidents of their ancestors: for whosoever had the conduct of an armie, being no Dictator, Consul, nor Praetor, but only holding the place of a Consul or Praetor, did not enter in triumph into the cite: yet for that the exploits done by him were great and worthie, they were content he should enter so in a fort; which was not altogether so stately and pompeous as a triumph; the which in their language they called Onatio. Hee brought into the Treasurie 44000 pound weight of siluer, and 2450 pounds of gold, and of the bootie there was giuen to euery fouldiour 120 Asse, which make about a crowne and a fifth part, besides their ordinarie pay. This was during the Consulship of Ser. Sulpitius Galba and C. Aurelius Cotta: but the year following L. Corn. Lentulus was created Consul, with P. Julius Apulus, or P. Villius Tapulus; and in his place C. Corn. Cethegus was sent into Spaine, who gaue a great defeat vnto the Spaniards in the fields of Sedeta, where there were about 15000

E of the enemies slaine, and 78 ensignes taken. Cethegus and Manlius being afterwards called backe to Rome, the people sent in their place Cn. Corn. Lentulus and L. Stertinus. The Senat graunted to the Gaditanes (besides the conuentions which they had made with L. Martius Septimius) That they should haue no Gouverneur. L. Manlius Acidinus being returned out of Spaine, demaunded of the Senate (for that he had well and verrouously gouerned the affaires) That he might enter into the Senate with the solemnitie called Onatio: but hee was hindered by M. Porcius Ceca, Tribune of the people, who opposed himselfe, for that he had not bene in that government in qualitie of a Magistrat, but as a Vice-gerent, being lesse fauoured therein than Lentulus his companion: wherefore he made no entrie: yet he brought in 1200 pounds of siluer, and some 30 of gold. Soone after C. Corn. Lentulus returned from

F Spaine, bringing also vnto the publicke treasure 1515 pounds of gold, 20000 of siluer, and 3455 deniers of siluer coyned. L. Stertinus being also returned, brought 5000 pounds of siluer out of the farther Spaine, and of the spoiles he caused two arches to be made in the Oxe market before the Temples of Fortune and of the goddesse Matuta; and one in the great Lists, vpon the which he set Images gilt. Ann. Roma 553

Dictators, Consuls, and Praetors were allowed to triumph.

Onatio.

A great defeat
of Spaniards.

The Roman Go- the men, but more against their purfes; by reason whereof the inconstant nature of the Sp- G nards was now very waucring.

C. Corn. Cethegus and Quin. Minutius Rufus being Consuls at Rome, Spaine hauing vntill that time bene but one Consularie Prouince, gouerned by two Pro-consuls, was diuided into two gouernments, and two Pretors sent thither, who had charge to make a diuision of their jurisdictions, whereof the one should be called the hither Spaine, and the other the farther:
but not as before, when as the river of Ebro made the limit, for the hither Spaine passed much beyond it. C. Sempronius Tuditanus was sent into the hither Spaine, and Marc. Heluius into the other, for Pretors. Both of them were intangled with great and doubtfull warres: for against Heluius there did rise Colca and Lucinius, great noblemen of Spaine, who conspired with many good townes, as Cardona, Bardona, and many others vpon the sea coast, which had not yet revolted. As for C. Sempronius Tuditanus, hee was defeated in his gouernment, and so wounded, as he died soone after.

Wherefore L. Furius Purpureo and M. Claud. Marcellus being created Consuls, Qu. Fabius
Buteo and Q. Minutius Thermus were sent Pretors into Spaine, either of them with a legion of Romane souldiours, and foure thousand foot and three hundred horse, Latines, of their allies. Thus the warre reuiued in Spaine the fifth yeare, after the end of the second Punicke warre; and from that time the Romanes had to deale with the Spaniards alone, without any support of the Carthaginians. The danger of this warre was so apprehended by the Senate, that one of the two Consuls, with a Consular armie of two legions, five thousand foot and five hundred horse of their allies, Latines, should goe in person with twentie gal-lies, and such a number of other vessels, as should bee fit to transport his armie. L. Valerius Flaccus and M. Porcius Cato were created Consuls: Spaine was allotted vnto Cato, to whom
P. Manlius was appointed as Pretor in the hither part of Spaine neere vnto Gaule, and Appius Claudius Nero in the further Spaine. To these Pretors were appointed (besides the legion which either of the Gouernours in Spaine then had) two thousand foot and two hundred horse, newly leuiued.

Whilest these things were preparing, Q. Minutius Thermus came to battaile with Budares and Besylides, two commanders of the Spaniards, neere vnto Turbe, where he defeated them, and slew about twelue thousand of their men, tooke Budares prisoner, and put the rest in rout.
These newes did somewhat reuiue the people of Rome, who were miglirly perplexed for these warres of Spaine. M. Porcius Cato being Consill, passed into Spaine the fixt yeare after the peace made betwixt the Romans and the Carthaginians, to reduce that Prouince wholly vnto the obedience of the people of Rome: wherein his seuer carriage did much auaille: for mildnesse is not alwaies fit for all nations, nor for all diseases. He embarked his armie in the river of Genes, whither he had drawne five and twentie ships of warre, whereof there were twentie of the state of Rome, and five of their allies, with a great number of others. They arriued safely at Rosas, then called Rhoda, at the foot of the Pyrenees, where they chafed away a garison of Spaniards which held the castle. From thence he passed to Empurias, and there he landed his souldiours. At that time Empurias was a double towne, diuided with wals, the one inhabited by Grecians issued from Phocæa (from whence also the Marislians came) the other by Spaniards. The Greeke towne was in a manner all in the sea, and was not much about four hundred paces in circuit: the Spaniards habitation was much more, containing about three thousand paces; alwaies liuing in ieaousse one of another, assured onely by their diligent gard, and continuall discipline of warre, as if the enemy had bene at their gates. The Grecians entertained no Spaniard within their wals, neither did they goe out rashly towards the land: the sea was free for all men. Amid these ieaousies they receiued great commodities one from another: for the Spaniards (who were very ignorant of nauigation) had many strange commodities from the Grecians, and did furnish them in exchange with the fruits of their country. This traffique was the cause that the Spaniards towne was open vnto the Grecians, who for their better safeties were allied vnto the Romanes, and maintained themselves with as great loyaltie in their friendship, as the Marislians themselves could doe, although they were not so mightie. The Consill Cato arriuing there, they receiued him with all the honour and bountie they could. He stayed there some time to discover what forces
the

A strange and vniuersal manner
of liuing of the Empurians.

A the enemies might haue, and where they were; and for that hee would not spend the time in idleness, he caused his souldiours to be trained. Cato's arriual was in hauest: wherefore he did forbid the purueyers and Commissaries to make any prouision of come, but sent them backe to Rome, saying, That the warre could maintaine it selfe. Departing from Empurias, he put the enemies countrey to sacke by fire and sword, and filled all with terror.

At the same time M. Heluius meaning to retire out of base Spaine, which he had gouerned, being accompanied with 6000 men, which the Pretor Appius Claudius had giuen him for con-ueying, he was encountered by the way with 20000 Celtiberians, neere vnto the towne of Illi-uoy, (either that which Scipio had destroyed, being repaired, or another of that name) whom he did fight withall, and vanquish, and slew 12000 men: then he tooke Illiturge, where he put all the inhabitants about the age of 14 yeres to the sword: and from thence he came vnto Ca-toes campe: from whence hee afterwards passed to Rome; into the which he made a solemne entrie, with ouation, for that hee had gouerned his prouince happily. Hee brought 14732 pounds of siluer in masse, 17000 Bigats (which is a piece of coyne, stamp with a chariot drawn with two horses) and of the siluer of Osca 120438. Presently after Heluius, Q. Minutius Ther- mus returned to Rome, who had the honour of a triumph, which was the first that was graun-ted, by reason of his victories in the wars of Spaine: he brought also into the Treasurie 34800 pounds of siluer, 38000 Bigats, and 278000 of Osca.

In the mean time the Consill Cato was not farre escaped from Empurias, whereas three C embassadours came vnto him from Bisliges, Lord of the Illegetes; among the which was one of his sons, complaining, That their castles were besieged by the other Spaniards, whom they could not resist, but with aid from the Romanes. That if it pleased him to send them five thousand men, it would be sufficient to force the enemy to retire. The Consill answered, That he was moued with the danger wherein they were: but he had not at that time such forces, as he might with safetie send away so great a number, especially being not farre from the enemy, with whom he expected to fight every day. The embassadours hearing these words, cast themselves at his feet, and embracing his knees, besought him, not to abandon them in their great necessitie, seeing the Romanes were the onely refuge they had in this world: they let him vnderstand, That if they would haue falsified their faith, and conspired with others that were revolted, they might easily haue auoided that danger; but they would not doe it, although they had bene solicited with threats and terrifyings, hoping that the Consill should refuse to aid and defend them, they did protest before God and men, That they should be forced to leaue the Romane partie, least they should fall into the miseries and calamities of them of Sagunt. That day Cato made them no other answer, yet he did not leaue to meditate thereon all night, to find some meanes to free the Illegetes from this danger; and not to diminish his forces: for that would haue stayed him from fighting with the enemy, as he desired, or else in fighting he might be too weake and in danger. In the end he considered, that hypocricie and dissembling in warre haue oftentimes auailed much, and that those which attend succors, being perswaded to haue them speedily, haue often vpon this hope taken courage, and grown so relolute, as they haue preferred themselves: Wherefore the next day he told the embassadours, That he was content for their sakes to incommode himselfe, and that notwithstanding that he had great occasion to employ his souldiours, yet he would send them succors.

Hereupon he commanded they should take the third part of all the companies, and that they should prepare victuals and ships to embarke them the third day. Whereupon he sent away two of these embassadours, to carrie newes to Bisliges and the Illegetes, retaining the third, who was sonne to Bisliges, making him good cheare, and honouring him with presents.
The embassadours before their departure saw the troupes embarked, and being very well fatised, went away, making great bruit of these succors. The Consill thinking that he had made shew ynough, caused the souldiours to land againe, and to returne to the campe. And for that the season began to grow vnfit to make warre, he caused Winter lodgings to be made for the armie, within a myle of Empurias, from whence he sent the souldiours on euery side to spoyle the enemies countrey. Leauing a sufficient garison in the campe, he made them goe forth in the night, that they might goe the farther without discouerie, and more easily surprise the Spaniards. In this manner he did exercise his new souldiours, and surprised many of the enemies, who durst no more goe out of their forts. Cato hauing by this meanes sufficiently G tried the hearts both of his owne men and of the Spaniards, he called the Captaines, Knights, and Centenies together, and said vnto them: That it was now time to set their hands to the work which they had so much desired, to shew their vertue by a battaile, and not by rauaging and spoyleing, as they had hitherto done, and that they must no more busie themselves with the prey of the champion country, but prepare themselves to enioy the riches of townes. The estate of the affaires in Spaine (said he) is reduced to that point, that whereas in the time of our predecessors, when as there was neither captaine nor armie for the Romanes in this region, they did capitulate, That their power and command should extend vnto the riuer of Ebro: and now when there is a Consull, two Pretors, and three Armies, and that the Carthaginians haue bene wholly excluded for these tenne yeares, wee haue not in a manner any thing on this side that riuer. We must then recover it by our armes and valour, and reduce this nation (which hath bene accustomed to begin warre with more rashnesse, than to maintaine it vertuously) vnto the yoke, which they would shake of: wherefore goe and refresh your selues, and be readie to depart this night. About midnight he dislodged, that he might encampe at his plea- sure, before the enimie should haue any intelligence. So as taking a long circuit, he marched beyond the Spaniards armie; and when as day began to breake, he put his men in battaile, and sent three companies of foot vnto the rampier of their campe.

The Spaniards being amazed to see their enemies behind them, ran to armes: then the Consull said vnto his fouldiors: There is now no more hope but in our valour, the which I haue done of purpose; for the enimie lies midway betwixt vs and our lodging: all that is behind vs is the ene- mies; wherefore there is no better safetie than to trust to our owne vertues. He then caused his com- panies which were gone to skirmish, to retire, as if they would haue fled, that he might draw forth the enimie, as hee did: for the Spaniards (thinking that the Romanes had retired for fear) left their campe, and came out armed, filling the place betwixt their trenches and the Romanes armie, and there put themselves confusely and hastily into battaile: but the Con- sull gaue them no leisure, but caused certaine troupes of horsemen to aduance, who came and charged these Barbarians thus disordered: but the Romanes on the right hand were presently repulled, and retreating in haste, had almost put the footmen in rout. The Consull perceiving this, he presently sent two bands of foot, who passing along the enemies right flanke, pre- sented themselves behind, before the battalions of foot came to joyne: the which did so amaze
the enemies, as the partie which before was doubtfull for the Romanes, by reason of the disor- der of their horse, was now almost equall: yet both the horse and foot on the right wing were so troubled, as the Consull could hardly make them stand firme: yea, he was forced to take some by the hands, to turne them against the enimie. Whilest they did fight with their darts a farre off, the encounter was doubtfull: yea, the Romanes wauering on the right wing, could hardly be kept in order. On the left wing and in front the Spaniards were sorely prest, and besides, they feared those companies which came in the reere to charge them: but when they were approached, and so joyned, as no blow fell in vaine, and that there remained no hope *but in their resolutions and valours, being come to the sword, and that Cato had refreshed his* tyred men with new troupes, which charged the enimie like lightening, then were they forced and put to rout, so as they did what they could to saue themselves in their campe. Then Cato* galloping to the second Legion, which he had refused for succours, he caused them to* aduance speedily towards the enemies campe, to force it, but with such order, as if any one aduanced too fast, or went out of his ranke, he beat him into his order with a iausline which he carried, commanding the colonels and captaines to doe the like. Now did the Ro- man armie giue an assault vnto the enemies rampiers & palisadoes, who defended themselves valiantly, repulping their enemies with stones, flaues, and other arms: where a new Legion ar- riuing, the combat was more furious, both parties growing more courageous; the one through hope, the other through despair. The Consull riding about the campe, obserued what part was worst manned, or weakest defended: and finding that the gate on the left hand was but ill furnished with men, he sent some of the foremost ranks of the second Legion thither, and such as carried long flaues, who forced the gate which was at this gate, and entred into the campe. The Spaniards seeing the enemies within their trenches, leaue their armes and en- signes, fflye out of their ports, and cast themselves ouer their rampiers, euery man seeking them that fled, and their baggage was all taken. Some hold, that there died in this battaile A great slaughfortie thousand Spaniards. There are three commendable things noted in Cato in this action: ter of Spaniards.

First, to take all hope of safetie from his fouldiors, but by their armes and vertue, he had led them far from their campe and ships, betwixt the enemies campe and his country: Secondly, that he did send two companies behind the enemies armie, whilest that he charged them in front: and for the third, that he had refused the second Legion behind the rest, and led them in good order to assaile the enemies campe, whilest that all the other troupes were disbanded and busie in fight.

After this great victorie, he gaue his fouldiors no great rest: for being a little refreshed in their campe, he led them to spoyle the enemies countrey; the which they did ouerrun at their pleasures, for that they were all fled. This was the cause which made the Spaniards of Em-puria to yeeld, and many other people thereabouts. There were many inhabitants of other Cities and Communalities fled to Empuria, whom Cato caused to come before him, and courteously entreated them, commanding to giue them meat and drinke, and then he sent them home to their houses. Soone after he marched with his armie towards Tarracone, and in all places where he passed, he met with the embassadors of townes, which yeelded vnto him; so as all Spaine on this side Ebro was reduced vnder the obedience of the people of Rome before he came to Tarracone: and from all places there were presented vnto him, which freely giuen an infinite number of prisoners, Romanes, Latines, and other allies, which had bene taken by diuers accidents. The brute was, That hee would lead his armie into C the furthest part of Spaine, towards the strait, and some sayd, That Turditania, which is the mountaine and places unknowne. Vpon this false bruit, there he would passe vnto the mountaine and places unknowne. Vpon this false bruit, there were seuen strong places in the countrey of the Bargitanes which rebelled, whom hee subdued without any great toyle, or memorable combat: but soone after the Consull being returned to Tarracone, they rebelled againe; so as hee leading his armie thither againe, subdued them: but they escaped not so good cheape as at the first; for hee caused them all to be sold for slaues by the drumme, to the end they should trouble the peace no more.

drew up to rebell.*

*Cato's severity in the Spaniards

In the meane time the Pretor P. Manlius hauing receiued the armie from his predecessor Qu. Minutius, and being joynd with that which Appius Claudius Nero had in the first D four Spaine, all old bands, he marched into the countrey of Turditania (the which is And-alousia) and the countrey adioyning. The Turditanians were esteemed the worst warriors among all the people of Spaine; yet trusting in their multitudes, they came to encounter the Romanes: when the Romane horsemen disordered them at the first charge; then the Legions arriving, they put them wholly to rout. But the war was not thus ended: for the Turditanians did entertaine in pay ten thousand Celtiberians, and continued to make warre with these mercenaries.

The Consull being incensed at the double rebellion of the Bargitanes, vsed his naturall rigor and severity against all the Spaniards which dwelt on this side the riuer of Ebro:
E for he distamed them all, thinking, that if they were armed, they would vpon any occasion fall into rebellion. This was taken so disdainfully by these people, as many grew furiously mad, and slew themselves: A nation in truth fierce and warlike, who esteemed not that life which passed without armes: Whereof the Consull being aduertised, he caused the Senatours of all the townes of that countrey to come vnto him, to whom he sayd:
That what hee had done, was more for their profites, than any interest of the Romanes: For when they were to make warre, you know (said he) it was decided with more misfortune and lesse for the Spaniards, than trouble or paine for the Romanes: wherefore to preserve you hereafter from ruine, I thought there was but one onely meane; which is, to keepe you from rebelling: Let vs then bethinke our selues of the mildest course, and giue me your aduice; because me I will not willingly entertaine any, but what you shall giue. These Senatours demanded time to aduise thereon: and being called againe, they answered not any thing. Whereupon the Consull caused all their townes to be demanteled in one day: and from thence marched with his armie against their neighbours, which were yet in armes, whom he brought to obedience, namely, Segeltica, a towne of great importance, and rich, the which he tooke by sappe. It was a greater difficulty for Cato to subdue these people of Spaine, than it had bene for the first captaines

which came thither for the Romanes, when the Carthaginians did rule there: for at that time if the Spaniards were wearie of the Carthaginians command, they had recourse vnto the Romanes: but Cato making warre against them, they had no other refuge, but from an vsurped libertie they must fall into slaueerie. Finally, he found all this Prouince altered, some hauing taken armes, some being besieged by their neighbours, to force them to take armes; who (if they had not bene prevented in time) would haue also rebelled with the rest. This Consull had such an active spirit, as all things both great and small must passe through his hands, neither did he thinke it sufficient to refuse, discourse, and command that which he held fit to be done, but he himselfe did execute many things; neither was he more strict and seuer to any one in his commandments, than to his owne person. There was not any one to be found in his armie, that did watch, fast, and toyle more than himselfe. Finally, he had no aduantage among those that he commanded, but the honour to command.

The Turditane warre grew more difficult to P. Manlius, by reason of the mercinarie Celtiberians: wherefore the Consull being called thither by letters from the Pretor, he marched with his armie. At his arriual he found, that the Turditanes had their campe diuided from the Celtiberians: being encamped, the Romans had continuall skirmishes and light encounters with the Turditanes, who had alwaies the worst. As for the Celtiberians, he caused them to be solicited by the colonels and captaines of his armie, propounding vnto them the choice of three conditions: If they would turne vnto the Romanes, they should haue double the pay which the Turditanes had promised them: or if they would retire to their houses without taking any partie, they promised them abolition of all which they had done: and for the third, if they desired warre, they should come to field, and present themselves in battaile. The Celtiberians demanded respite to make answer, and then did communicate these propositions in open Councell to the Turditanes; where there was great contention, but no conclusion: so as many daies passed without any assurance of peace or warre: during the which, the Romanes ouerrun the enemies country, and spoyle their townes, as if it had bene in open warre: oftentimes making priuat treaties and accords, they entred, went and came into their forts. The Consull Cato seeing that he could not draw the enemy to battaile, hee first sent some troupes with their ensignes, to spoyle that part of the country where they had not yet bene: then hearing, that the Celtiberians had all their baggage in the towne of Seguntia, he went thither to take it; and yet could hee not draw them out of their campe. In the end hauing mustered and payed his armie, he left all the forces with the Pretor, and returned with seven bands (which made about 3500 men) towards the river of Ebro. With these few men he tooke townes, and forced obedience from the Sedetanes, Ansetanes, and Suesetanes. As for the Lacetanes, (a people dwelling in a sauage country, and out of the way) besides that their rough and barbarous disposition kept them in armes, they had highly offended the Romanes, whilest that the Consull was busie in warre vpon the marches of the Turdules, ouerrunning and spoyleing the lands of their allies: Wherefore the Consull led vnto the siege of their towne not onely the Romane bands, but also the youth of those allies, whom they had wronged. This towne was long, but not very broad. Encamping within foure hundred paces of it; there he placed certaine chosen companies, commanding them not to stirre, vntill he returned vnto them, and then he led the rest of his forces vnto the other side of the towne. There were a great number of Suesetane soldiours among the strangers allies, whom he caused to march against the towne, and to assaile the wall. These being discouered by the Lacetanes, and knowne by their armes and ensignes to be fouldiours of Suesse, whose territorie they had spoyled at their pleasure, and many times defeated their troupes, they sallied out vpon them: but the Suesetanes scarce seeing them approach, crying out and shaking their armes, fled, and the others pursued them. The Consull, who expected no lesse, galloped along the wals vnto the companies which he had left on the other side; and whilest the townsmen pursued the Suesetanes, he seized vpon their towne being vnmanned, and tooke it, before the townsmen were returned from the chase, forcing them to yeld vnto his mercie. Presently after this exploit, he went against a strong towne, called Vergium, which was the receptacle of all the theues in the country, who robbed and spoyled all men which dwelt thereabouts, or passed that way. The Lord of the place came forth presently to meet with the Consull, excusing himselfe, That neither he nor his subjects did wrong any man, but that certain theues being

This towne is may be in that which they now call Suesse.

A being receiued into the towne, they had made themselves masters thereof. The Consull said vnto him, That if it were so, he should returne into the towne, and find some means (when he should giue an assault) to seize vpon the citadell or fort, with them of his faction, whilest the theues were busie to defend the walls. This was cunningly put in practise, and the theues which held the towne were surprised in diuers places, being encountered on the one side by the Romane armie, and on the other side by them of the fort. Thus Cato woon this place, and hauing pardoned them which held the fort, with their kinsfolkes and friends, granting them their liues and goods, he commaunded the Treasurer to sell all the rest of the Vergetanes for slaues, to them that would giue most: and as for the theues and robbers, he caused them all to be hanged.

B By these actions the Consull Cato had reduced the Prouince to more quiemesse, and then he began to dispose of the publicke reuenues for the Romanes in these countries, renting out the mynes of yron and siluer, which made it rich. The year of his Consullship being ended, he returned to Rome, whereas P. Corn. Scipio the second time, and Titus Semp. Longus had bene created Consuls. There he entred in triumph, and brought into the Treasury 25000 pounds of siluer in masse, 123000 Bigats, and 540 of Olca, with 1400 pounds of gold. Besides, there was payed vnto euery footman 370 Asyles, and thrice as much to euery horseman, Cato saying, That euery one must tast of their spoiles.

C There were sent into Spaine for Pretors P. Cor. Scipio, sonne to Cn. cousin to the other, P. Cor. Scipio and Sex. Diginitus (it may be it was he which was honoured with a mural crowne at the taking of new Carthage) into the hither part. As for the armies, that of the Pretors was entertained, and the Consuls cast. One of these Gouernours was more fortunate than the other: for P. Scipio did not onely defend all that which belonged vnto his prouince, but put the Lusitanians (who came to assaile him) to rout. Sex. Diginitus had many great troubles in his gouernment, and many vnfortunate encounters, so as he deliuered not halfe the men which he had receiued at his comming, to his successor: and without doubt all Spaine had risen, if the other Pretor had done no better. P. Corn. sonne to Cn. by his judgement and dexteritie did so terrifie the enemies in the farthest parts of Spaine, as aboute fiftie Townes and Communalities yielded vnto him. After the expiration of his gouernment, D attending his successour, he set vpon certaine Lusitanian theues, who returned with a great bootie, which they had taken from the subjects and allies of the Romanes: and although he were in great perplexitie and danger in this charge, despairing almost of the victorie, for the which (if he did obtaine it) he did vow games to Apollin: yet he woon it, and (being much inferior in number of fouldiours) defeated the Lusitanians; where hee slew twelue thousand vpon the place, tooke five hundred and fortie prisoners, all horsemen, and carried away an hundred thirtie foure Ensignes, hauing lost very few of his men. This encounter was neere vnto the towne of Ilipa, whither the Pretor went with his armie, and brought forth all the bootie that was recovered, suffering euery one to carrie away the goods and cattell which had bene taken from him by the enemy, and causing the rest to be sold, with the which the fouldiours were recompenced. Scipio obtained this victorie in qualitie of Vice-Pretor.

E 9 L. Corn. Merula and Q. Minutius Thermus were created Consuls at Rome, C. Flaminius was chosen Pretor for the hither part of Spaine, and M. Fuluius Nobilior for the further: C. Flaminius should succeed Sex. Diginitus, to repaire the bad success which had happened during his gouernment. He demanded of the Senat, That he might take one of the Legions appointed for the citie, and that mingling with them fuch fouldiours as he should leuie, he might chuse out of the whole number 6500 foot & 300 horse; and that with this Legion thus made, he might vndertake the affaires: for he did not much relye vpon those forces which remained with Sex. Diginitus, the which were in a manner ruined, saying, That the warre growing hote in Spaine, they might not goe vnfrumished; speaking of the good and bad success of that Prouince, as well by himselfe, as by his friends, much to his owne aduantage. The auncient Senatours were not of opinion, That the Senat should make any decrees vpon the reports of priuat men in fauour of magistrats, and that they must not giue credit to that which was spoken touching matters of gouernment, if it were not aduertised by the Gouernours themselves, or embassadours sent to relate the success. Finally, the Senat resolved, That if there where any troubles in Spaine, they should leue men there: yet they write, That C. Flaminius went into Sicile, where he enrolled certaine bands; and that passing from thence into Spaine, he was caft vpon the coast of Africke, where he tooke an oath of fome fouldiours which he found there, being the remainders of the armie of P. Scipio Africanus: and that besides all thefe, he leuied men in Spaine. But whatfoeuer he did, yet he found not the affaires of Spaine fo difficult as they had giuen it out. Being in his gouernment (which extended vnto the Oretanes) he tooke the towne of Ilucia, and hauing lodged his fouldiours to Winter, there were many light skirmishes betwixt him and the Spaniards, whereas he had not alwayes the better, but loft many of his men.

The other Pretor which gouerned the further Spaine did great exploits: for he fought a battaile with the Vaceans, Vecons, and Celtiberians all together, neere vnto Toledo, put them in rout, and defeated them, taking their king Hilernus aliue. The yeare following the gouernment was continued to these two Pretors. Flaminius tooke the towne of Litabrum by force, the which was strong and very rich: he also tooke Corribilo, a nobleman of great fame, prisoner. Fulsius in the further Spaine did fight happily with two armies, tooke the townes of Vefcelia and Holo from the Spaniards, with many castles, some by force, and some by composition: and then passing by the Oretanes country, he seized vpon Nobilia & Cusibis, and came vnto the riuier of Tayo, on the which Toledo stood, a small town, but strong of situation: whilst he did batter it, an armie of the Vecons came to succour it, but he defeated it: then continuing his siege and batterie, he tooke the towne. This done, he returned to Rome, L. Emilius Paulus being chosen to succeed him, when as P. Cor. Scipio, sonne to Cn. and M. Attilius Glaucio were Consuls. He entered into Rome with the solemnitie of Ouation, bringing into the common treasure 130000 Bigats of filuer, 12000 pounds of filuer in masse, and 127 pounds of gold. C. Flaminius was continued in his Pretorship in the higher Spaine.

10 But whereas other Pretors had but six officers which carried rods and axes before them, L. Emilius had twelue, so as his Pretorship was equall with the honor & dignitie of a Consul. To either of these Pretors (besides the armies which were in the country) were appointed a supple of 3000 foot and 300 horse, newly leuied; two third parts of them of their allies, and the other third part of Romane citizens. Paulus did twice defeat the barbarous Spaniards in battaile, and flew 30000, hauing taken his aduantage vpon the passage of a riuier. He brought vnder the obedience of the Romanes 250 places, by their voluntarie yelding, and yet with the honour of all these gallant exploits he returned to Rome, hauing not enriched himselfe one dragma during his gouernment; the which is a rare thing in a man of command. His gouernment being then continued for another yeare, he did somewhat blemish the glorie of his victories, by a notable rout which he had in the Balthanes country, whereas he lost 6000 men vpon the place, the rest of his army recovered their campe with great difficultie, and then was forced with long marches to retye himselfe into places of more safetie: but afterwards attending the coming of L. Bebrius, who should succeed him, he was reuenged of the Lusitanians for his former losse, of whom, he flew 18000, tooke 330, and woon their campe, with their baggage.

L. Bebrius had bene chosen at Rome to succeed him: but as he marched by the riuier of the Liguticke sea, he was set vpon by certaine Ligurians, who flew most part of his men, and himselfe being wounded, hee was forced to saue himselfe in Marceilles, with a small number, and without others, whereas the third day after he died. These newes being sent to Rome by them of Marceilles, the Senat appointed, That P. Brutus in the Pretors place should take the gouernment of the further Spaine, and leaving the armie and prouince of Tuscane to one of his lieutenants, he should speedily depart. In the other part of Spaine, neerer vnto Gaule, L. Plautius Hipfius was appointed in C. Flaminius place, whose gouernment was reasonably quiet.

M. Valerius Messala and C. Luinius Salinator being made Consuls at Rome, the higher part of Spaine was giuen to L. Manlius Acidinus, and to C. Catinius the farther: who continued in the same charge the yeare following: in the which the Lusitanians and Celtiberians troubled the peace, & went armed to field: the which being written to Rome by the Pretors, they did chuse L. Quintus Crispinus, who had that part of Spaine which lies beyond the riuier of Ebro, and C. Calpurnius Piso for the other part. Whilst they prepare, C. Catinius came to fight with the Lusitanians in the territorie of Asta, whom he defeated in battaile, woon their campe, and

A and flew 6000 vpon the place: but as he gaue an assault to the towne of Asta (the which was taken without any great resistance) he was wounded, and died soone after. L. Manlius the other Vice-Pretor had an encounter with the Celtiberians in his gouernment, yet no man knew who had the victorie; onely the Celtiberians dilogged the night following, confessing thereby, that they were vanquished. The Romans being masters of the field, had leysure to burie their dead, and to gather vp their spoyles.

Within few dayes after the Celtiberians hauing augmented their forces, they came and assailed the Romanes neere to Calaguris, which now is Calahorra, but they were beaten, and lost 12000 men vpon the place, 2000 were taken prisoners, and they were chased out of their campe, and lost their baggage. And such was the heat of this victorie, that if they had not bene restrained by the coming of the new Pretors, the Celtiberians had bene wholly subdued. Quintus and Calpurnius, as soone as they were within their prouinces, lodged their armies to Winter. L. Manlius being returned to Rome, made his entrie with the ceremonie called Ouatia, whither he brought 52 crownes of gold, 132 pounds of gold, 16300 pounds of siluer, and declared in open Senate, That besides all that, his Treasurer Qu. Fabius brought 10000 pounds of filuer and 80 pounds of gold, to be put into the common Treasure.

11 The Spring time being come, the two Pretors went to field with their armies, and joynt together in Beturia, marching towards the Carpetanians country, where the enemies were then in field. The beginning of their exploits was not very successfull, but in the end they made reparation of their errors. The fight began betwixt the foragers on either side, neere vnto the townes of Hippo and Toledo; to whose succours there came some from either army, and in the end all their forces came thither: so as the Spaniards seeing themselves in a convenient place for their manner of fighting, the two Romane armies were defeated in this unexpected skirmish, and repulsed with great disorder and amazement, within their expected rampiers, and yet the enemies could not follow their good fortunes. The Pretors fearing to be assaulted, dilogged in the night: and at the break of day the Spaniards presented themselves before the trenches, but seeing no shew of any enemy, they entered into the campe, whereas they made bootie of that which the Romanes could not carrie away with them. This done, they stayed there some dayes, without attempting any thing. The Romans lost in this combat and in the flight about fife thousand men, of their citizens and allies, with whose spoiles the Spaniards armed themselves, and marched towards the banks of Tayo. All the respite the Romane Pretors had, they employed it to fill vp their bands with Spanish fouldiours of their friends and allies, and to assure the rest which had bin beaten. Wherefore when as they did see their forces reasonably well repaired, and their fouldiours hearts reuiued (who demanded nothing more than the enemy, to reuenge the disgrace which they had received) they came and encamped within twelue miles of the riuier of Tayo: when as a good part of the night was spent, they tooke vp their ensignes, and came by the break of day to the riuers side, whereas they put themselves into a square battaile. The enemies were on the other side, encamped on the side of a hill, and the Romans hauing found a foord in two places passed ouer; Quintus on the right hand, and Calpurnius on the left, but the enemy moued not: who being amazed at their suddaine arriuall, spent time in consultation what they should do, when they might haue disordered all the Roman armie, being troubled at the passage of this riuier. In the end all passed, both fouldiours & baggage, the which they laid all together: for they neither had any convenient place, nor any leisure to make any trenches, nor to plant their campe, for that the enemy began to arme, so as they put themselves in order to fight, placing the strength of their armie (which consisted in two Legions) in the middle. The field betwixt both enemies lay open, which did assure them from ambushes and surprises. The Spaniards seeing theye two Legions in two great squadrons, put themselves in battaile on the riuers side where they were, thinking to disorder them before they should be able to joyne with the bodie of their armie; wherefore they went and gaue them a furious charge. The fight in the beginning was fierce, the Spaniard being puffed vp with pride for his former victorie, and the Romans mad with desire to deface the ignominie to haue bene vanquished, contrarie to their custome. The two Legions in the middle fought valiantly, and could not be forced: wherefore the Spaniards resolving to pierce through them by some means, they sent a great troupe in forme of a wedge, to breake this battaillon. The furie of the fight was great, and Calphurnius feared the Legions should not be able to resist: wherefore he sent T. Quintius Varus and L. Iunentius Thalus (two Lieutenants) vnto them to aduertise them, That there was no means to hold Spaine, nor to saue themselves, neither euer to see their houses, nor Italie; no, nor to get vnto the other side of the riuer of Tayo, if they did not vanquish their enemies: and he at the same instant, with the horsemen of the two Legions, went and charged this pointed troupe in flanke, and Quintius came on the other side with a certaine number of horsemen, but with lesse courage than Calphurnius, who fought in the middelt of the preasse: so as by reason of the Pretors presence, and the danger whereinto hee thrust himselfe, the legionarie souldiours and all the rest were greatly encouraged to doe their duties; so as they first put their enemies to rout, and then to flight, towards their campe: whither they were pursued by the horsemen, who entred pell-mell with them that fled; where they were forely preist by them that had bene left to gard the baggage, so as they were forced to leaue their horses, and to make head against them, vntill the fifth Legion arriued, and the other bands, one after another, who freed them from this danger, and put all the Spanish armie to the sword: so as of five and thirtie thousand which were in the beginning of the battaile, there escaped but foure thousand; whereof three thousand recovered a neere mountaine, and a thousand being naked and disarmed, wandered vp and downe the fields. The Romans carried away an hundred thirtie three of the enemies ensignes: they themselves lost in this conflict little about six hundred men, and about an hundred and fiftie Spaniards of their confederats. Five Colonels and some Romane knights (which were slaine there) made the victorie seme lesse fortunat. The Romane armie was lodged in the enemies campe, for that they had no time to rampier their owne. The day following Calphurnius did highly extoll the souldiours valour, and gaue them gifts in testimonie of their vertue: to knights he gaue caparisons, shewing, that by their valour chiefly the battaile had bene woon: many capitaines of the two Legions were also rewarded. These two Gouvernours returned to Rome, A. Terentius Varro and P. Sempronius being chosen in their places, during the Consulship of P. Claudius Pulcher and L. Porcius Licinius. They brought many crownes of gold, and readie money, with gold and silver in masse, whereof the number is vn certaine; and they triumphed for the victories which they had gotten against the Lusitanians and Celtiberians.

Anna, Rome 968

A. Terentius had the hither part of Spaine, and Sempronius the further: they also had prolongation in their charge for the yeare following. Varro had some encounters in this second yeare with the Ausetanes, a people inhabiting in the countrey of Cattelogne, not farre from the riuer of Ebro, and against the Celtiberians, whom he vanquished, and tooke some strong places and townes, which they made their retreat in those marches. As for Sempronius gouernment, it was quiet: for the Lusitanians stood in awe of the Romans fortune, and the Pretor was continually afflicted with a troublesome discaie, which made him vnfit for all publicke gouernment, and in the end killed him in Spaine. P. Manlius did succeed him, who had once bene Pretor in the hither Spaine, when as Cato was Confull, and Quintus Fulvius Flaccus succeeded Varro.

The hither Spaine was in armes, and had need of a capitaine and souldiours to suppress the enemy: but in the other prouince the Romanes had no worse enemies than themselves: for that by reason of Sempronius long infirmite, the souldiours were idle, and in a manner without a head, all were corrupted, insolent, and without any militarie discipline; the which they must chieflie remedie. The Senate therefore decreed, That there should be foure thousand foot and two hundred Roman horse newly leui'd, so be sent into Spaine, with feuen thousand foot and three hundred horse of their allies.

Terentius Varro yielded vp the prouince and the armie to Qu. Fulvius Flaccus, who besieged a towne called Vrbicua, whereas the Celtiberians came to assaile him, making diuers skirmishes to rayse the siege, in the which many Romanes were slaine or hurt. But Fulvius continued firme, and by his perseuerance woon the towne, the enemies (tyred with fighting) being forced to retire. The towne being destitute of succours, was within few dayes taken and sacked. P. Manlius did no other thing in his gouernment, but gather together the dispersed souldiours, so as both he and Fulvius after the taking of Vrbicua lodged the armies to Vinter: Terentius being returned to Rome, entred in pompe, and brought into the trea-

The yeare following these two Pretors were continued in their gouernment, and the warre grew hotter in Fulvius prouince than euer: for the Celtiberians went to field with thirtie five thousand fighting men: against whom, Fulvius fortified himselfe with all the Spaniards he could leue among the Romane confederates: but hee did not equall the enemies in number: yet hee marched into the Carpetanians countrey, and encamped neere vnto Ebura, into the which he put a garrison. The Celtiberians approached soone after, and planted their campe within halfe a league of the Romanes, at the foot of a hill; whereas the Pretor sent to discover them by two companies of their confederats horses, being led by his brother M. Fulvius, commanding him to approach neere vnto the enemies trenches, and to obserue of what compasse they were, and if they came forth to charge them, they should retire without fighting: the which he executed accordingly. Some daies were spent without any action of importance. In the end the Celtiberians resolved to goe forth with all their forces, who presented themselves in battaile, in the plaine which was betwixt the two armies, and there attended the Romanes: yet Fulvius stirred not, but kept his men foure dayes together within his campe, during the which, the Spaniards shewed alwaies the same countenance: then seeing that the Romans lay still, and that there was no means to fight with them, they kept themselves also quiet for a time; onely the horsemen went forth, keeping themselves readie, if the enemy should make shew to assaile them. The forragers on both sides went forth behind their armies without any let. This hauing continued some dayes, the Romane Pretor (thinking that he had made the enemy secure) commanded L. Acilius to march with six thousand Spanish foot of their allies, and some of the horsemen of the left wing, about the hill vpon the enemies backe, and there he should attend vntill he heard the crie of the Legionaries and the rest of the armie, and that then he should come and assaile the enemies campe. Acilius parted in the night, because he would not be discovered. Fulvius at the breake of day caused C. Stribonius Colonel of the Latines, to march towards the Celtiberians trenches, accompanied by the extraordinarie horsemen of the left wing. The enemy seeing him better accompanied than the day before, sallied presently forth with all his horse, being followed by their footmen. Stribonius seeing them come, turned head, as he had bene commanded, and retired towards the Romanes campe. The Celtiberians pursued them speedily both with horse and foot, persuading themselves, the day should not passe, before they were masters of the Romanes campe, being now within five hundred paces. Then Fulvius seeing that hee had drawne them farre ynough from their fort, hee made way for his armie, being readie in their trenches, causing them to fall forth by three feuerall ports at one instant, commanding them to make great shouts and cries, not so much to giue courage to the souldiours, as it was their custome, as to aduertise them that were in ambush behind the hill, attending a signe to assaile the enemies campe. When as they heard the crie, they ran vnto their rampiers according vnto their directions: The Celtiberians had onely left five hundred men to gard it, who made no great resistance, being amazed both at their own small number, and at the multitude of those that came suddainly to assaile them. Acilius hauing woon their campe, hee presently set fire on such places as lay open to the enemy. The flame appearing, did much daunt the Celtiberians, and gaue courage vnto the Romans, being assured thereby, that their campe was taken. Notwithstanding, the Celtiberians seeing themselves destitute of a retreat, fought like desperat men, and did much annoy the Romanes: but in the end being oppressed both with the first troupes and with fresh supplies, and by Acilius, who returned from the taking of the campe, and by the garrison of Ebura, who sallied forth in the heat of the battell, they were vanquished, and great numbers slaine vpon the place, and afterwards wholly defeated, the horsemen pursuing them that fled. They write, That in this battaile there died

23000 Spaniards, and 4800 prisoners taken: the Romanes tooke about 500 horse, and 88 ensignes. Doubtlesse the victorie was great, yet not without blood: for there were slaine about 200 legionarie Romanes, 830 Latines, allies, and 2400 strangers. Which done, the Pretor brought backe his victorious armie into his campe. Acilius was sent vnto the campe which hee had taken, and the next day they gathered vp the enemies spoiles, and the souldiours being publickly assembled, euery one was rewarded according to his merits: then hauing left the wounded men at Ebura, the Legions were led to Contrebia, by the territorie of the Carpetanians. This towne being besieged, they sent to demand succours of the Celtiberians, but the towne was yielded before they came. There had fallen such abundance of raine at this season, as Fulvius was forced to lodge his armie within the towne. The Celtiberians, who could not come by reason of the high waters and the bad way, knew nothing of the yielding of this towne, vntill they were charged by the Romanes which were within it: for seeing no signes of a campe about it, they imagined the enemy had bene gone; so as they approached the towne without order, fearing no danger: from whence the Romanes sallied forth vpon them with great furie, and put them to flight: and although the field was spacious, and the commoditie great to saue themselves, yet there died twelue thousand men, fise thousand were taken prisoners, foure hundred horses of seruice, and sixtie two ensignes gotten. These Celtiberians being disperfed, they aduertised their companions which came vnto them, of their defeat: whereupon they returned, and all this preparation went to smooke. In the further or West part of Spaine, the Pretor Manlius did also fight happily against the Lusitanians. After theise exploits Q. Fulvius sent L. Minutius his Lieutenant to Rome, with two Colonels. T. Metius and L. Terentius Massiliota, to carrie newes. That the Celtiberians had bene wholly vanquished in two great battailes, and that the Senate should not need to make prouision of money or any other thing for the entertainment of their souldiours that yeare, for that (sayd they) the warre was ended. They demanded also, That the Pretor might haue leaue to bring backe the armie, which he and others before him had so happily managed and employed: the which (they sayd) was not only reasonable, but very necessarie, for that euerie one demanded leaue, speaking openly, That if it were not graunted them, they would take it.

*Ann. Roma 173
New Pretors
sent into Spaine*

13 At the first generall assembly A. Posth. Albinus Lusius and C. Calpurnius Piso being made Consuls, they also created new Pretors to send into Spaine: the hither part by Ebro fell to T. Sempronius Gracchus, and L. Posthumus had the West part. T. Sempronius was not much pleased with the request made on Fulvius behalfe, to whom he should succede: whereupon he protested, That if they sent him thither with an armie newly leuied, hee would keep himselfe within his garisons, and not expose vnexperienced souldiours against an enemy so long trained vp in warre. Thereupon the Senate did decree, That they should rayse a Legion of fise thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred Romane horse, and besides it a thousand Romane foot and fiftie horse; and the Latines their allies should be employed to furnish seuen thousand foot and foure hundred horse: and that with this armie Sempronius should goe into Spaine: giuing leaue vnto Q. Fulvius to bring backe the souldiours which had bene sent thither before that Sp. Posthumus and Qu. Martius were Consuls; which was six yeares before: and moreover, when the new leuie were come into the country, it should be also lawfull for him to bring all backe that were about two complete Legions, of tenne thousand foure hundred foot and six hundred horse, Romanes, and twelue thousand foot and six hundred horse of their allies, Latins, of those souldiours with the which Fulvius had gotten two victories against the Celtiberians.

Whilest these new Pretors were expected in Spaine, Qu. Fulvius in qualitie of Vice-Pretor undertooke to goe and assaile the Celtiberians lying a farre off, for that they had not yet reconciled themselves vnto him. This did rather incense the Barbarians than amaze them: wherefore going to armes, they seized vpon the strait or passage called Manlian, by the which they knew the Romane armie must retume. Gracchus had giuen charge to L. Posthumus Albinus, going to his gouernment in the further Spaine, to aduertise Qu. Fulvius, That hee should come and meet him with the armie at Tarracone, where hee would discharge the old bands, distribute the supplies which he had brought, and dispose of the whole armie; appointing a short time vnto Fulvius for the effecting thereof. Vpon which newes he was forced to depart suddainly out of the Celtiberians country: which made the people surmise, that he had some intelligence, that they did secretly arme, and that hee retired for feare: Wherefore they began to gard the passage more straitly and proudly than before. The Romane armie being entered into this passage at the breake of day, they were assailed in two severall places at one instant, Qu. Fulvius giuing order for all things, charged by the Celtiberians in

A things, according to the time and place, and making a brieue exhortation to his souldiours, he assured them. The fight began to grow hot, but not with like advantage: for the legions and the Latines vpon the wings did fight valiantly, but their Spanish souldiours could not resist their country-men, who were better souldiours than they. The Celtiberians seeing they could not vanquish the Romanes, fighting hand to hand with them in a set battell, they had recourse vnto their accustomed fashion, which was, to shape their troupe like a wedge. Being thus ordered, they are more firme and violent, and can hardly be withstood: by this means they had almost disordered the legions. The which the General perceiuing, hee ran presently to the legionary horsemen, asking them, What they did there, and what succour might be expected from them? To whom they answered, That they were ready to obey whatsoever

B should command. Ioynce then (said he) all the horses together of the two legions, and with a full carriere breake through that wedge of men which doth force our Squadron; yea take the bridles from your horses, as our ancestors haue often done with good successe, that you may overthrow them with more violence. Whereunto the horsemen speedily obeyed, and setting spurs to their vnbridled horses, they passed and repassed through this troupe of the enemies, breaking their staves, and making great slaughter of them. When this wedge was broken and disperfed, in the which the Spaniards did wholly relye, they had no other thought but vpon flight. The Latin horsemen moued with the valour of the Romanes, without any further commaundement, fell vpon the enemies already broken, so as there was a great slaughter made in the flight through-
C out all the strait. For this victorie the vice Pretor did vow a temple vnto Fortune, and games vnto Iupiter. There died in this encounter threeteene thousand Celtiberians, about three thousand prisoners, and two hundred threeteene and seuteene ensignes taken, and about one thousand and one hundred horses gotten. The victorious armie did neither intrench nor rampart for that day: But this victorie was not without losse to the Romanes, for there were foure hundred threecore and ten citizens slaine, a thousand and nineteen Latines, and of Spaniards and other strangers, their allies, three thousand. Thus this armie hauing redoubled her fame by this victorie, it arriued at Tarracone, whereas Sempronius the Pretor (who arriued there but two dayes before) went forth to meet him, and did congratulate with Fulvius and the souldiours, their happie exploits for the commonweale. Then did they louingly and great concord, discharge and retaine what they thought fit among the souldiours, according to the decree of the Senat: And for that yeare there was little done in Spaine by the new gouernours, for that they arriued late by reason of the death of one of the Consuls, and the subrogation of another, which staied their expedition. The yeare following they were continued in their gouernments.

Q. Fulvius Flaccus being returned to Rome, when as he stayed without the towne, to haue order for his triumph according to the custome, he was chosen Consull with L. Manlius Acidinus, and then he entred in triumph, with the souldiours which he had brought out of Spaine. He brought into the publike treasure one hundred and twentie foure crownes of gold, 31 pounds of gold, and 173200 deniers of coined money of Olfa, besides he gaue fiftie deniers, being about fise crownes, to euerie footman, twice as much to the centeniers, and thrice as much to the horsemen, as much to the allies and Latines, and to all in generall double pay.

E This yeare the Gouernors in Spaine diuided the warre betwixt them, so as Albinus should goe and assaile the Vaccens by the country of the Lusitanians, and from thence should come into the marches of the Celtiberians. Gracchus should enter into the heart of their country, for that the warre was hottest there. There he first tooke the towne of Munda by force, hauing set vpon it suddenly in the night, and hauing taken hostages, and put in a garrison, he battered some castles, and did forrage and burne the country vntill he came vnto another strong towne called Certima; whereas hauing begun to plant his engines to batter it, deputies came vnto him from the inhabitants, who vied a simple kind of speech vnto him, after the auncient

F manner, without any dissembling, telling him freely, That they would make warre if they had meanes, desiring that they might haue leaue to goe vnto the Celtiberians campe, to demand succours: the which if they could not obtaine, they would then take counsell of their affaires distinctly from the other nations. Gracchus yielded to their demand: and within a few daies after they returned, bringing with them ten other deputies. It was about noone. The first words which they spake vnto the Pretor, were, That they intreated him to commaund some of his

government, and
L. Canuleius
Pretor alone.

L. Canuleius (to whom the government of Spaine was fallen) should chuse judges from among the Senators, to examine the facts; and that the parties should chuse advocates of the same order. Titinius, who had beene Pretor, during the Consulship of A. Manlius and M. Junius in the higher Spaine, was drawne in question: but when as they had pleaded two severall dayes, he was absolved: but P. Furius Philo (who had beene Gouverneur in the same province) and M. Matienus in the further Spaine, being accused of divers crimes, and their causes often pleaded, when as it was againe to be heard, they were excused, being absent, for that being loath to attend the sentence, they had voluntarily retired themselves, the one to Preneste, the other to Tybur: and so the matter was left undecided.

Canuleius desiring to suppress this pursute, to the end that many should not bee molested by the Spaniards, began to give order for the affaires of his government, and to inroll souldiours, to lead them into the province which was appointed for them, and so he parted. The Senat letting passe what had beene formerly done, provided for the future, that the Romane magistrats should set no taxe vpon come, and that they should not force the Spaniards to sell the twentieth part at their pleasures, which was a certaine tribute: and that they should send no more Commissaries into their towne to leuie money.

At the same time there came another kind of embassage to Rome, from them that had bin borne of Romane souldiours and Spanish women, and not married. These were about foure thousand men. The Senat commaunded they should give in their names, and be inrolled by L. Canuleius the Pretor: and that such as he should make free, should be conducted vnto Carcia, vpon the Ocean sea, to dwell there. That the inhabitants of Carcia that would remaine there, should be receiued, and portions of land assigned them: and this colonie should be held for Latines, and be called the Libertines.

It seemes that the Romanes hauing no warres at that time in Spaine, were resolu'd to reduce it to one government, and to send but one Pretor. After Canuleius mention is made of Claudius Marcellus, and then of P. Fontenius: of whose deeds there is no mention in auient wriuers, so as it is to be presumed, this province continued quiet. But in the year 586 of the foundation of Rome, Q. Fabius and M. Junius being Consuls, they did againe create two Pretors, which were Cm. Fulvius on the hither part, & about the riuer of Ebro; and C. Licinius Nerua in the further. After which the Romanes contenting themselves for many yeares, with their conquests in Spaine, they fought as it seemed to make them whom they had subiected, or drawne vnto them, ciuile, and to fashion them by little and little to the manners and inclinations of the Romanes: without seeking the other people which were more barbarous, who also for their parts were glad to be left in peace, being terrified with the Romanes power, whom they would not incense, neither had they any care to seek their friendship, because they hated them, as violaters of the lawes of nature, and oppressors of mans libertie.

15 In the yere 600 of the foundation of Rome, Q. Fulvius and T. Annius being Consuls, the Celtiberians (who had beene vanquished and subdued by T. Gracchus five and twentie yeares before) began againe to stirre, the inhabitants of Sediga, a towne of the Areuaces, hauing (against their capitulations, and the commandement of Gracchus) repaired the walls of their towne, and refused to pay tribute vnto the Romanes: by reason whereof other people being also rebelled in Spain, the Senat resolu'd to send an armie, and a Consul to be the General, so as Q. Fulvius was sent, who was not verie fortunat in the beginning. This yere by a new cōtome the Consuls entred into charge the first of Ianuarie, whereas before they did not begin their magistracie vntill the fifteenth of March: whereunto they were induced by the rebellion of the Spaniards: the which was afterwards continued. Of this beginning followed the warre of Numancia, which lasted twentie yeares. The Senat of Rome hauing first forbidden them of Sediga to raise their walls, and then commaunded them to goe to the war with their Consuls and Pretors, according to the pacification made by Gracchus, they answered, That they had capitulated, not to make any new forts, but not to repaire their old. And as for going to the warre, they were exempt from that charge, by the treatie of Gracchus: the which was true. But the Senat added a glose to these conditions, that is, As long as it shall please vs: the which the Spaniards would not heare of. Wherefore seeing that Quintus Fulvius Nobilior came against them with an armie of thirtie thousand men, they left their towne, which was not yet in defence, sent their wiues and children to their neighbours, and vnder the conduct

A of one Carus, they assembled to the number of 20000 foot, and 5000 horse, and came and camped in a place couered with wood, verie fit to surprisfe their enemies, whom he met withall in the woods, and both gaue and took many wounds. Afterwards in a great encounter Carus had the victorie, hauing slaine 6000 Romans, wherewith being growne insolent and careless, the Consul had means to haue his reuenge, sending his horsemen to charge the Spaniards which were scattered and out of order: who put 6000 to the sword, and more had bin slaine, if night had not seperated them. This made the Celtiberians more circumspect. The same night the people of the countrey assembled at Numance, and being resolu'd to resist the Romanes, they made choice of Ambo and Leuco for their captaines. The Consul Fulvius hauing received

He had placed his Elephants behind the first ranks, that they might not be seene, thinking to terrifie them suddenly, and to defeat them by that means; but it fell out otherwise: for being come to joyne, and the ranks opened, when as the Elephants shewed themselves, they did somewhat terrifie the Spaniards and their horses, which were not accustomed to see such beasts; so as turning their backs they went towards the towne: But one of these Elephants comming neere the walls, being hit on the forehead with a stone, he entred into such a rage, as turning against the Romanes themselves, he trode them vnder his feet; after whose example the rest began to run through the Romane troups, and disordered them: For it is the nature

C of these beasts, when they are terrified, they know neither friend nor foe: wherefore many call them common enemies. The Spaniards which were within Numance, seeing this confusion, sallied out vpon the Romanes, and slew foure thousand men, and tooke three Elephants, and many ensignes; yet they lost two thousand of their men.

The Consul hauing refreshed himselfe somewhat after this rout, he was repulsed againe at the fort of Axenium, the which he assailed, to haue the victuals which the enemy had in it, and in this misfortune the Romanes received a third rout, whereas Blasius a leader of some horse of their allies, was slaine, with many good souldiours. These many losses did moue the inhabitants of Ocelis, or Ocelon, allies to the Romanes, and gardians of the money and victuals of their campe, to revolt, and to follow the Celtiberians partie. So as vanquished

D with so many misfortunes, the Consul Fulvius could take no better course, than to fortifie his campe for to winter: the which hee did with the greatest want that might be, besides haile, snow, raine, and all the rigour of the season, so as many of his souldiours perished for cold.

16 The yere following M. Claudius Marcellus succeeded Fulvius, and brought 8000 foot and 500 horse into Spaine. This man was more politique than his predecessor, to keepe himselfe from the surprisfes of his enemies, leading his armie safely to Ocelis, the which hee tooke in few dayes, and pardoned their offence, paying a fine of thirtie talents, and some hostages, which he demaunded of them. This clemencie of his made the Nerobriges, another nation, to send embassadors vnto him, to demand peace and pardon: to whom he made a pleasing answer, demaunding an hundred horsemen of them; the which they promised. But during this treatie, they sent certaine troups, which fell vpon the Romanes baggage, and spoyled some of it. Hereupon the hundred horsemen, which the Consul had demaunded, arriued, whom he committed to prison, and sold their horses, by reason of their treacherie. Then he led his armie against their towne.

The inhabitants seeing themselves inuironed with ditches and trenches, sent forth a herald attired in a wolues skin (a ceremonie vsed by the Barbarians in such supplications) crauing pardon. To whom hee made answer, That hee would not grant it; if the Areuaces and the other rebels their allies did not sue for it all together. Which being knowne vnto them, they all sent their embassadours to intreat the Consul Marcellus to referre them to the accord made in former time with T. Gracchus, imposing vpon them (according to his clemencie) a tollerable punishment.

There were some people allyed vnto the Romanes, which hauing beene wronged by them, opposed themselves to this demand: wherefore Marcellus sent them all to the Senat of Rome. The Senat made no other answer, hauing heard their debate, but that Marcellus should tell them what they were to do.

Ann. Rome 602

17 In the meane time, in the yeare 602, Spaine fell by lot to the Consul L. Lucullus, and then they began first to inroll souldiours by lot. Lucullus led with him P. Scipio Emilianus (he that made himselfe famous by the cusion of Carthage the great, and of Numantia.) Marcellus hauing aduertised the Celtiberians of the coming of this Consul, and of the warre which was prepared, he aduised them, before they attended any greater extremitie, to yeeld to his discretion, promising them all good vñage, and reasonable conditions; for he desired to end this war before the coming of Lucullus: to the which they did. This Marcellus (as Strabo writes) did build the citie of Corduba, and imposed a tribute of six hundred talents vpon Spaine, continuing his gouernment a good while after that Lucullus was chosen Consul, gouerning as Proconsull.

Lucullus being chosen judge of the occasion of war.

Lucullus finding nothing to doe at his arriual, he laid the foundation of a new warre, being as desirous to make some spoyle (for he was but poore) as to get honour. He entred therefore as an enemy into the Vaccens countrey, who had in no sort offended the Romanes: and hauing passed the riuer of Tayo, he went to besiege Cauca. The inhabitants demanded what he would of them, and why he besieged them. He answered, That they had wronged the Celtiberians, allies to the Romanes, and that he came to reuenge it. Whereupon they retired into their towne, and put themselves in defence. Soone after they fell off suddenly vpon them that went to forrage, and slue a great number. But the Romanes souldiours going forth to succor them, they repulsed the Spaniards, beating them euen vnto their town gates, whereas they smothered one another with the multitude, so as there were about three thousand slaine. Those which remained being amazed with this losse, they sent the next day the most ancient among them, with garlands of oliue branches, desiring Lucullus to receive them as friends, and to set downe the conditions; who imposed an hundred talents of siluer, and hostages, commanding them to send their horsemen to the warre with him: which hauing granted, Lucullus said, That he would haue them receiue a garison into their towne: where vnto they were also willing to obey, so as presently there were two thousand of the best souldiours in the armie sent, with commandement to leise vpon the ports, towers, and strongest places of the towne: which they did. Then Lucullus drew in all the rest of the souldiours, and by the sound of the trumpet, did most cruelly put all the inhabitants to the sword, sparing neither age nor sexe: yet some slipping ouer the walls, and creeping through the prease, escaped, who proclaimed the Romanes treacherie, couerousnesse, and crueltie, throughout all Spaine: whereupon all those that dwelt in the champion countrey, and in places of easie access, retired vnto the mountaines, or into fortified townes; carrying with them what was good and precious: and what they could not carrie they burnt, being loath to leaue any spoyle to so cruell an enemy.

Truth breeds hatred and hate is the seed which they are sown.

Cauca being thus ruined, Lucullus led his armie through a great part of the countrey which was barren and desert, vntill he came to the towne of Interctia, where there were some twentie thousand foot and two thousand Spanish horse, gathered together: of whom Lucullus demanded indifferently, If they would not come to composition with him. But they asked, If he would receive them with the like faith as he had done them of Cauca? reproaching vnto him with opprobrious words, this treacherous and inhumane fact. Wherewith Lucullus being incensed (as commonly all those are which find themselves touched) he spoiled all their countrey, and then besieged them. They knowing there was no reason to come to battell with the Romanes armie, maintained themselves with skirmishes and sudden sallies. During this siege a Spanish cavalier richly armed, and brauely mounted, shewed himselfe often betwixt the armie and the towne, challenging some Romanes to the combat, and seeing that no man durst come forth, he scorned them. But Scipio Emilianus being then verie young, grieved to see the Romanes knights thus dishonoured, and hauing leave from the Consul, he went to encounter him, and vanquished him: the which bred admiration in both parties, considering the inequality of the stature of the combatants; for Scipio was little, and the Spaniard wonderful great and strong. The Romanes conceiued good hope of this victorie: but in the night they were troubled with the cries of certaine horsemen of the towne, which were gone forth before that Lucullus did inuest it, who being the same night returned about the palisades of the Romanes armie, made great cries and shouts, to whom the besieged made answer: so as the Romanes were forced to keepe themselves in armes, not knowing what part to gard: besides,

A sides, they were tyred and growne weake, for that they wanted both bread, wine, oyle, salt and vinegre, liuing only vpon venison, hares, or pouldred flesh, the which bred fluxes, wherof many dyed. Continuing their batterie, they made a great breach, but coming to the assault, (whereas Scipio was one of the formost) and being in a manner masters of the towne, they were sharply repulsed: and in their retreat many through ignorance of the place fell into certaine priuies, where they were swallowed vp. The besieged hauing repaired their breach, seemed resolute; but hunger pressing either partie, they could not long dissemble their necessities: so as Lucullus perswaded the Spaniards to yeeld, with the best words he could, promising he would not deceiue them, so as in the end they gaue him credit, and yielded, vpon condition to send six thousand archers to the warre with him, giuing a certaine number of cattell, and some hostages. Gold nor siluer (the desire whereof had drawne Lucullus into Spaine) there was not any: for the people of that countrey had neuer esteemed it. Matters being thus compounded, the Romanes armie was led against Palantia, a strong and well fortified towne, whither many of the champion countrey, and lesser townes were retired. Most of the colonels and captains were of opinion, That they should not strue in vaine against so mightie a town: but Lucullus, a couetous man, knowing it to be exceeding rich, would neuer leaue it vntill that hunger forced him, the horsemen of the towne (which were verie many) falling out daily vpon the Romans which went to forrage. Being thus pressed, he put his armie into battell, and retired, the Palantines following him in the taile, and pursuing him vnto the riuer of Duero, where they left their pursute, and returned. Lucullus passing on, led his armie to winter in the countrey of the Turditanes. Thus ended the warre against the Vaccens, for the which (although that Lucullus vnderooke it without authoritie or commandement from the Senat and people of Rome) he was neuer called into question.

18 About that time the Lusitanians, and people of the further Spaine, liuing vnder their owne lawes, had made incursions vpon the friends and allies of the people of Rome, hauing a certaine Africane for their capitaine, and chafed Atanlius and Calphurnius, Romanes captains, killing about six thousand of their men, with Terentius Varro, their Questor or Treasurer. Wherewith this Africane growne proud, he went with a companie of Vectons, a neighbor people, to assaile the town of the Blastophenicians, a people who, they said, were brought and left in Spaine by Hannibal. This capitaine being slaine there with a stone, they did presently make choice of one called Casarus to be head of their armie: who gaue battell vnto Mumius which had bene sent from Rome with an armie; but he lost it: yet seeing that Mumius pursued his victorie inconsiderately, he turned head, and repaired his losse, so as he slew nine thousand of the Romanes armie vpon the place, and not onely recovered his owne baggage, but tooke the enemies, and carried away a great number of ensignes, which the Lusitanians dragged vp and downe in scorn of the Romanes. Mumius hauing gathered together five thousand souldiours which remained, and reuiued them as well as he could, he found an opportunitie to charge the enemy going to forrage, and did so well, as he slew a great number, and recovered his ensignes.

E The Lusitanians which dwelt beyond the riuer of Tayo, hauing in like maner proclaimed warre against the Romanes, and tooke the towne of Conistorgis by assault, a great and strong towne, confederat to the Romanes, they being led by a capitaine called Causene: and not content to make a tumult in Spaine, some of them passed the strait at Hercules pillars, and went to spoyle Africke: the rest went to assaile Ocile. But Mumius arriuing with a thousand foot and five hundred horse, slew about fiftene thousand forragers, and made them to leaue the siege of Ocile. Then going against others, who thought to escape with the prey, hee left not one aliuie to carrie newes of their defeat. Hee distributed the bootie which was portable among his souldiours, and the rest (being consecrated to those gods who hee thought did preiude over the warres) he burnt. After all this, he returned to Rome, and triumphed.

F Attilius, or Acilius Balbus, succeeded Mumius, who at his first arriual cut seuen hundred Lusitanians in peeces, and tooke Oxthrace, being the greatest and richest towne they had, striking terror in all the neighbour people, which submitted themselves to his deuotion as far as the Vectons. But when as Acilius had lodged his armie for Winter, they rebelled, and began to annoy them that were friends and confederats to the Romanes: Against whom Ser. Galba sent Pretor to succeed Acilius, meaning to succour them, made a march of 15 leagues, and being come in sight of the enemy, without giuing rest to the souldiours, he led them G to fight, and vanquished happily. But as the Romanes pursued the flying enemy in disorder, and made many stands being wearie, the Lusitanians turning head, slue seven thousand, and forced Galba to die with his horsemen into Carmel, whither many that had escaped were retired: who hauing rallied them together, and leued twentie thousand men of their confederats, he wintered at Cunes. The Consul Lucullus who wintered in Turditania, hearing that the Lusitanians were in armes, he sent the best of his captains against them, and slue foure thousand of them, and afterwards hauing made a new head neere vnto Gades, hee cut fise thousand and fise hundred in peeces. And as Galba on his side pressed these people, they sent embassadors vnto him, seeming desirous to enjoy the accord made before with Attilius. H Galba made shew to pitie them, and to excuse their excesse for that pouertie had made them to breake the treaties, and to steale: saying, That he knew well that the Barbarians of the country was the cause of these inconueniences: but if they had a true intent to be friends, he would diuide them into three troupes, and send them into fertile places to lue in. The Lusitanians being woom with these promises, put themselves into three troupes, and suffered themselves to be led to the places assigned by Galba, who spake vnto the first, as if they were in full peace, injoyning them to leaue their arms; which hauing done, he caused them all to be massacred: and with the like fraud and cruelty he defeated the other two troupes, before they could haue any newes of the slaughter of their companions. Many slipping through the armed troupes, escaped; among the which was Viriatus, who reuenged the trecherie & crueltie I of the Romanes against his country-men. Galba shewing himselfe as treacherous, and it may be more couetous than Lucullus, hauing filled his cofers with the spoyles of Lusitania, wherof he did defraud both his friends and souldiours, returned to Rome, where he was called in question for his abuses: but being the richest man in the citie, he escaped by bribes.

20 The Lusitanians which remained of Lucullus and Galbaes treacheries, assembled together to the number of ten thousand, and did ouerturn the country of Turditania: against whom the Pretor C. Vestilius was sent; who hauing joyned the armie which hee brought from Rome, with the forces he found in Spaine, he went against them which spoiled their friends country, and slew many of them, forcing the rest to retire to the side of a hill, where he besieged them, so as they must either end their dayes by hunger or by the sword: wherefore they resolved to sue for mercie, and to intreat him to appoint them a country to dwell in; the which he willingly granted. But Viriatus being in this besieged companie, who had escaped from Galbaes slaughter, began to speake in this manner. How wretched are we, that hauing so often tried the treacherie of these Romanes, we will againe offer our throats vnto them, and be murdered by them, vnder the sweetnesse of their false promises? Do we not know that they with whom we haue now to deale, are the same who by their notable treacherie haue slaine our brethren and companions? Were it not better to keepe our armes, and selling our liues at a deere rate, let them seele that we are men, than suffering our selues to be disarmed by a foolish credulitie, to bee afterwards slaine like beasts at the slaughter? No, my companions, let vs not commit so grosse an error, as to despair in that sort: let vs rather trie to force vs a passage, and you shall find the difficultie is not so great as you imagine, if you do what I shall aduise you. This souldiour speaking with a great courage, reuiued their spirits, who with one voice cried out vnto him, That in a good houre he should be their captain, and that he should lead them whither he should thinke good. Then he put them all in battell, except some thousand of the best appointed, which he kept with himselfe, and then he commaunded euerie one to siege, appointing their Rendezvous at Tribola. Vestilius was in doubt to pursue them that fled, thinking it the safest course to assaile Viriatus, & his thousand souldiours which were in battell on the side of the hill. But they hauing spent that day and a part of the next, in making a shew that they would fight with the Romanes, easily freed themselves, being well mounted, and knowing the country; and then came to Tribola: and so this Spaniish armie was preserved by the judgement and resolution of Viriatus, who of a shepheard became a huntman, then afterwards a theefe, lastly he was head of an armie, and was in possibility to make himselfe king of Spaine. This action did win him much credit and reputation among the neighbour nations. Vestilius meaning to pursue him, fell into ambushes which he had laied in a certaine passage covered with wood: so as being charged in front by Viriatus his horsemen, and on either side by his footmen, the Roman armie was wholly defeated, and the

A Pretor Vestilius found among the prisoners, who being scorded as a man of no value by him that had taken him, for that he was old and fat, he was instantly slaine. The Romanes which escaped at this rout, gathered head at Tarteffe, being some 6000 men, whom Vestilius, Questor or Treasurer, caused to rest for a time: and hauing made a new leuie of 5000 of their allies, he sent them all to encounter Viriatus, but there returned not one, being all cut in peeces: whereupon the Questor kept himselfe within the wals, attending to be relieved by some other Roman armie. In the meane time Viriatus spoiled the fertile fields of the Carpetanians.

21 Then came C. Plautius for Pretor, bringing ten thousand foot, and thirteene hundred horse from Rome: Whereof Viriatus being aduertised, he made shew to siege, after whom Plautius sent 4000 of his best men, who were suddenly charged by them that fled before them, and were in a manner all slaine. Viriatus passing beyond the river of Tayo, went and fought in a certaine mountaine full of oliues, called Venus mount: whereas Plautius burning with desire of reuenge for their former losses, was vanquished again with great losse, and forced to retire before his time, and winter in his forts, not daring to shew himselfe in field: so as Viriatus did run ouer all the country at his pleasure, and ranfomed the townes which would saue their come, and other fruits which was readie to gather; else he let fire of it.

22 Claudius Virmannus, an other Pretor, being sent against this captain, was also defeated, in creating the disgrace receiued by his predecessors: where he lost all the forces which he had brought. The rods and axes, the coats of armes of Capraines, and other spoiles taken from the Romans, were hung vp by Viriatus in the mountaines, in signe of his victories. And some after 300 Lusitanians hauing encountered 1000 Romanes in a certaine strait, the Romanes lost 320 of their men, and the others but 70: besides, as the Romanes horsemen pursued some Lusitanians on foot which retired, one of the troupe turning head, thrust a Romanes horse through with a pike, and presently struck off the mans head with his sword; wherat the rest being amazed, they staied, and pursued not this Lusitanian, who retired softly mocking them.

23 After C. Virmannus mention is made of C. Nigidius, who was sent Pretor into the further Spaine, and was as vnfortunate as the rest.

24 Q. Fabius Maximus, and L. Hostilius being Consuls, C. Lelius was sent Pretor into Spaine, against Viriatus, who managred the warre with great wildome; but as the daunger increased, and manie people of Spaine moued with the valour and fortune of Viriatus rebelled, the Senat of Rome decreed that one of the Consuls should goe in person to that warre, with a Consular armie: so as Q. Fab. Maximus & Emilius, sonne to Paulus & Emilius (who subdued Perseus king of Macedonie) was sent thither; a Captaine instructed in the seuer discipline of his father: who hauing leued two legions of new souldiours, with some bands of their allies, he led some 15000 foot, and 2000 horse into Spaine. Being arrived at Orfone, a towne in Spaine, he would not expose his new souldiours, which had not been tryed in any encounters, but kept them within their forts, and by little and little trayned them with light skirmishes: but Viriatus carried awaie both spoyle and honor for the first yeare. But Fabius charge being prolonged, and he remaining Proconsull in Spaine, supposing that his armie was now sufficiently trayned, he went to field, and vanquished Viriatus in a set battaile, tooke two townes from him, and pursued him to a place called Becor. After this exploit he led his armie to winter at Cordoue.

26 Viriatus finding himselfe neither so safe nor so strong as he was wont, he solicited the A-reuaces, Belles, and Tithes, a warlike people, and drew them from the Romanes alliance. These did raise a long and dangerous warre, which was called the Numantine; by reason of Numance one of their townes. Viriatus had Quintius, a Roman captaine, against him in an other quarter, by whom he was put to rout, & forced to retire into his fort on mount Venus: yet making roads from thence hee slue 1000 of Quintius souldiours at one time, tooke some engines, and in the end made the enemies armie retire: besides, he chased away the garrison which was in Ituca, and spoiled the Bastrans country: during which disorders Quintius kept himselfe within Cordoue, either for cowardise, or want of judgement, sending a captaine of the towne of Italique in Spaine against the enemy. Q. Metellus the Consull, was sent into Celtiberia, who subdued the Vaccaces with great expedition, and continued his government about a yeare.

27 Q. Fab. Maximus Seruilius, being Conſul, ſucceeded Quintius, and went into Spaine with an armie according to his dignitie, making about 16000 foot and 1600 horſe: he alſo ſent to Micſip king of the Numidians for elephants. As this Conſull conducted a part of his armie to Iuſta, Viriatus came and charged him with 6000 men, making horrible cries, and wearing long locks, after the accuſtomed manner of theſe barbarians in their warres, whom the Romans withſtood with great difficultie: but when as the reſt of their armie was ioyned with them; and that ten elephants were arrived out of Lybia with 300 horſes, the Conſul Seruilius went and prouoked the enemy to fight, vanquiſhed him, and put him to flight: yet he could not ſo well conteyne his men, but they purſued in diſorder and conſuſion, as if ſals out often: ſo as Viriatus watchfull vpon all occaſions, turned head vpon them that purſued, ſlue a great number, and purſued the reſt vnto their campe: the which he attempted to force, and without the vertue of Fannius, father in law to C. Lelius, he had entred, to the totall ruine of the Romane armie. Night approaching, made the enemy retire, leaving the Romanes much troubled and amazed. But afterwards Viriatus, a man without reſt, moleſted them day and night, ſometimes by his ſouldiours lightly armed, ſometimes by his horſemen, untill that he forced the Conſull to diſlodge, and to retyre to Iuſta. Then he tooke the waie of Luſitania, being in ſome extremitie for want of victuals, and his forces decreaſing. The Conſull following him, and not able to ouertake him, made warre againſt the Betarians, dwelling in the countrey which is now called Extrema Dura: and cauſed ſixe townes to be ſackt, for that they had giuen ayde and fauour to Viriatus: then he retires to Cunes, from whence he marched ſoone after againſt Viriatus in Luſitania: and encountering Curius and Apuleius, two captaines of thees vpon the waie, hauing with them 10000 fighting men, the Romane armie was ſomewhat troubled; yet Curius was ſlaine in the fight: after which the Romanes got the aduantage, ſo as Seruilius took Eſcadie, Gemelle, & Oboliola, by force, with other places held by the garrifons of Viriatus, whereof ſome were abandoned to the ſpoyle, others were pardoned: he tooke tenne thouſand priſoners, whereof ſixe hundred were beheaded, the reſt he cauſed to be ſould: and with this good fortune he retyred his armie the ſecond time to winter, and then returned to Rome.

28 Q. Caecilius Metellus hauing prorogation of his charge in the hither Spaine or Celtiberia, in qualitie of Proconſull, he beſieged Trebia, a rich towne of that countrey, the which he tooke by his politike ſtratagem. It happened during this ſiege, that ſixe companies being ſet in gard in a certaine place, were diſlodged by the enemy: Metellus ſhewed himſelfe ſo ſeuere, as he would not receiue them, but commaunded them to returne to the place, vneleſſe they would be vſed as traitors, and as men that had abandoned the armie: the which he did to make them feele the paine of their cowardie, commaunding to cut them in pieces that ſhould ſlie towards the campe. Theſe ſouldiours forced by neceſſitie, ſhewed themſelues valiant, and recovered the place from whence they had bin chaſed. Beſieging Centobrica, the chiefe man within the towne, called Rhetogenes, retyred to the Romane campe, where-with the inhabitants being much incensed, they ſet this fugitiues children vpon the walles, whereas the Romanes engins did batter: the which did fo moue Metellus to pittie, as he left the ſiege, forbearing rather to take the towne, than to kill theſe poore innocent creatures, which act of humanity, did much daunt the Celtiberians, ſo as from that time they were more tractable. Being demanded to what end hee made ſo manie turnings and windings with his armie, he answered, that if he thought his ſhirt knew his conceptions he would burne it. The glorie of his great exploits in Spaine, were blemiſhed by the enuie he bare to Q. Pompeius his enemy, who he vnderſtood ſhould ſucceed him in his charge: to the end hee ſhould find all things difficult, he gaue leaue to all ſouldiours that demanded it, without inquirie of the cauſe: he ſuffered them to ſpoyle the victuals and munition which remained; he commaunded the Candiot archers, to breake their bows and arrows, and did forbid to giue the elephants their ordinary allowance. Hauing thus ſatiſfied his ſpleene, he did fruſtrat himſelfe of his triumph, which hee had deſerued by ſo many glorious deeds, knowing better how to ſurmout his enemies, then his owne choler.

29 Q. Fab. Maximus Rutilianus, or Seruilius according vnto ſome, Proconſull, made warre in the meane time againſt Viriatus: and hauing taken a commander among the theues called Connoba, by his voluntarie yeelding, he pardoned him: but he cauſed all his ſouldiours hands

A hands to be cut off, and afterwards puniſhed as many of the reuolted as he could take, in the like manner. He beſieged the towne of Eriſane, into the which Viriatus found means to enter by night: from whence at the breake of day he ſallied with great furie, with a troupe of their beſt men, and not onely chaſed away ſuch as wrought in the ditches & trenches, but alſo ſome companies which were ſet there to gard them, with great slaughter: yet Viriatus thinking now of the change of humane things, and of the miſeries which doe often follow proſperitie, vſing his good fortune with modeſtie, he began to giue care to conditions of peace, the which he obtained verie fauourable, both from the Proconſull and Senat, whom they called a friend to the people of Rome, and decreed, That ſuch as had followed him, ſhould enjoy the land: they then held: wherefore this dangerous war ſeemed to be ended, but ſoon after it was renewed.

30 Q. Cæpio Conſul being come into the further Spaine, ſucceſſor to the Proconſul Q. Fabius, began to blame the capitulations made with Viriatus, as vnworthy of the honor & greatneſſe of Rome, and had now got leaue of the Senat, to moleſt Viriatus vnder hand, that hee might take ſome ſubieſt to rebell. Then by his importune letters and many meſſages, hee obtained a decree, to proclaim war againſt him: whereupon he went to beſiege Aſta, the which yielded of Toledo ſpoyleing and burning all he left behind him: yet hee was followed and ouertaken by the Conſull, but being a politike captaine, he would not hazard a battell, being but weak in regard of the Romane armie, but gaue leaue to moſt of his ſouldiours to ſlip away by certaine vallies covered with woods; and he himſelfe in the meane time preſented himſelfe vnto the enemy in a ſtrong place, with ſome troups to keepe them occupied, untill he thought his men were retired into a place of ſafetie. Then he ſuddenly vaniſhed by ſecret paſſages, beſt knowne to himſelfe, leauing the Romanes amazed which way he ſhould fly. Cæpio marching towards the Veſtons, and the Calliaques, ſpoiled their fields. At the ſame time did riſe other troups of thees in Luſitania, after the example of Viriatus, againſt whom (according vnto ſome) Brutus was ſent. Viriatus deſiring to come vnto the former accord, foreſeeing that in the end he ſhould not be able to reſiſt the Roman power, ſent Audax, Ditalcon, and Minure, three of his moſt familiar friends, vnto Cæpio, to treat an accord with him: but Cæpio corrupted them with great gifts and promiſes, perſuading them to murder their captaine; the which they did execute in this manner. Viriatus was one that ſlept little, and for that hee would be readie for all accidents, he ſlept moſt commonly armed, giuing free acceſſe in the night to all his friends. Audax and his confederats inbracing this opportunitie, came into his tent, vnder colour of ſpeaking with him concerning ſome great affaires: and finding him aſleepe all armed but the throat, they ſtabd him in that place, and ſlew him. And then without any noiſe (being aſſured they had diſpatched him) they retired to the Conſul Cæpio: who gaue them leaue to enjoy the poſſeſſions which they then held, but as for gifts and recompences which he had promiſed, he ſent them to the Senat. At the breake of day Viriatus ſeruants and the whole armie, wondering that he ſlept ſo long, contrarie to his cuſtome, ſome going in, found him wallowing in his owne bloud; which filled the whole campe with griefe & teares, who beſides their heauineſſe for the vnworthy death of ſo valiant a man, they were in care of their own preſeruations, and for the dangers which did inuirow them. Beſides, they were the more diſcontented, that the traitors were eſcaped. Wherefore taking his bodie, and wrapping it in a rich cloth, they laid it vpon a high pile, and hauing ſacrificed many beaſts, they did celebrate his funerals, after their manner, the ſouldiours both horſe and foot running about the fire, and filling the aire with the name of Viriatus, untill the fire had conſumed all: after which in memorie of his name, they had ſword plaiers which did fight for their liues. Thus Viriatus ended his dayes, being deſired and lamented of all his ſouldiours, for that in war he was the firſt in danger, but when it came to diuide the ſpoyle, he was but equall, & it may be inferior to all theſe: and he had that happineſſe about moſt captaines, that hauing an armie of diuers nations, he led them to the wars for the ſpace of eight yeares, without any mutinie or ſedition among his ſouldiours, who in Viriatus place choſe Tantalus for their captaine, verie contrarie to him in manners and vertue. This fact did purchaſe no leſſe infamie to Cæpio, than to the traitours which did execute it. Tantalus was ſo preſt by him, as he left both armes and armie, vpon compoſition, to whom there were certaine lands appointed; ſo as for a time the Luſitanians contained themſelues in peace.

Pompeius Aulus Consull, in the yeare 612 comming very late in his Prouince, and hauing receiued an armie but in bad equipage from the hands of Q. Metellus, he went to beseech the Numantines; for of all the townes against whom Metellus had made warre, only Numantia and Thermancia continued in armes: Thermancia was strong by nature, situated among the woods and betwixt two riuers, and therefore of hard access: wherefore hee went first to Numantia, in the

which there were eight thousand of the best and most resolute fouldiours that were in all Spaine, as the Romanes found by experience. The Romane armie was in all about thirtie thousand foot and two thousand horse. Being at this siege, the Romane foragers were charged by a suddaine fallie of the besieged, so as many of them were slaine vpon the place. Pompey was then absent; who being aduertised of this rout, hastened to the campe: but the Numantines notwithstanding his diligence retired without losse, and continued daily to skirmish with the fouldiours, and to haue the aduantage: wherewith Pompey being discontented, he left it, and would attempt Thermancia, to see if he could repaire his honour, and get some profit: but he lost seuen hundred of his best men at the first encounter, and they chased a Colonel, which conducted victuals to the campe. Soone after hee had a third rout, with the losse of many horse and foot, and with such an amazement of all the rest of the armie, as they stood all night in armes; and day being come, the Thermantines running vnto their trenches, and pro- uoking the enemy, they fought with equall aduantage all day long, vntill night. Whereup- on Pompey did also dislodge from thence, and marched towards Malia, a little towne held by a garrison of the Numantines; the which was yeilded by the treason of the inhabitants, ha- uing slaine the fouldiours which were set there to gard it: where hauing left some companies, after that he had disarmed the inhabitants, he marched towards Sederane, to defend it from the spoiles of Tangin, capitaine of the theues, whom he defeated and tooke prisoner, with a great number of his fouldiours, but he could neither draw ransom nor seruice from them: for these Barbarian captiues entred into such a rage, as in a manner they all slew themselves, or murdered their masters which had bought them; being vnable to endure seruitude: yea, some were so malicious, as passing the riuers, they made holes in boats, so as they sunke with their burthens. After all this, Pompey would needs returne to Numantia, where he sought to diuert the course of the riuier of Duero, which passed along the towne, that hee might cut off their passage for victuals. The inhabitants and fouldiours within the towne fighting against his designs, repulsed both them that were at worke, and those that garded them, or that came to succour them; and in many skirmishes and fallies they flew many Romane horsemen, with Oppius, a Colonell of a thousand foot: and in another place, at a trench which the Romanes had made, the Numantines falling forth suddainely, slew foure hundred men, with the ouer- seer of the worke.

During these exploits, there arriued certaine Romane Senatours at the campe, with some new bands, to supply the places of the old fouldiours, which desired to be dismissed, hauing serued fix yeares in those warres. Pompey being ashamed of his bad successe, did that which his predecessors had not yet done, continuing his siege before Numantia all the Winter: so as many which were not accustomed to the raine, snow, and cold of that Region, died of collicks and paine in their bellies. Besides, he had another rout, seeking to succour his fouldiours which were gone to forrage, whereas he lost many, as well of the Roman nobilitie, as of priuat fouldiours: so as tyred and wasted with so many losses, he was forced to retire and to lodge his armie, attending him that should come to succede him in the Spring. But fearing to be censured, for that hee had managed that warre so ill, hee resolved to make a kind of composition with them of Numantia: who being much weakened with the miseries which they had endured, and fearing they should be distressed for victuals, liuing in a barren country, they consented to send embassadours to Pompey, who in open shew demanded, That they should yeeld vnto the Romanes discretion; but vnder hand he graunted many of their demands, drawing from them some talents, certaine hostages, and them that were reuolted. There remained yet some part of the composition money to pay, for the which Pompey stayed, when as M. Popilius Lenas a Consull arriued in Spaine to succede him. Then Pompey being freed from the care of the waire, denied that he had accorded any thing vnto the Numantines, notwithstanding standing that many captaines and Romane Senatours did affirme the contrarie: Whereupon G Popilius sent this controuersie to Rome vnto the Senat, whereas the embassadours of Numantia and Pompey did plead: but the Senate was of opinion not to confirme any thing that Pompey had done, and that the warre should continue against the Numantines. Popilius then continuing warre against them, did nothing that was memorable, although his charge were prolonged, but lost his honour, and many good fouldiors.

dum, Rome 615

3 During his time, the Lusitanians hauing rebelled againe, D. Iunius Brutus was sent into the further Spaine. Others say, That he did execute that which followes, vnder the Confull Q. Cæpio, and that he was sent by him as his Lieutenant, by reason of the distance of places betwixt the riuers of Betis, Anas, Tagus, Durius, and Lethes, by which the theues escaped, and made suddaine incursions, not onely molesting them that pursued them, but also putting them out of hope to take them, by reason of the strength of the places. Brutus therefore tooke this course, he would not trouble himselfe in running after these nimble fellows, who knew all the meanes to escape; but went directly to their owne country, that he might in one expedition both punish them, and enrich his fouldiors with their spoyle; assuring himselfe, they would come to defend their holes: wherein he was nothing deceived: for both men and women came running to repulse the Romane armie, fighting with a desperat furie: so as being halfe dead, dismembred, or covered with wounds, they were neuer heard grone: yet many lesse couragious, taking vp as much as they could carrie, fled to the mountains, whom Brutus afterwards (vpon their suite) pardoned. Hauing passed the riuier of Duero, he subdued many people, and tooke hostages, and was the first of all the Romans which led an armie beyond the riuier of Lethes, called Limia, where he assailed the Brecaires, a people of Galicia, who had spoiled the viuallers comming to his campe. This nation was accustomed to lead their wiues to the warre, and both men and women did fight so obstinately, as they were neuer fene to turne their backs, nor call out any cries vnworthie of fouldiors for any wounds which they received. The women that were taken prisoners, slew themselves and their children, rather than to be slaues. Many of their towne and retreats yielded vnto Brutus, but he was constrained to subdue them againe; for finding him somewhat retired, they rebelled againe. The inhabitants of Talabrica in another part of the prouince made trial of the magnanimitie and clemencie of the ancient Romanes: for being often reuolted, and hauing abused the pardon which he had given them, Brutus hauing forced them to yeeld to his discretion, demanded first the fugitiues, and then the prisoners taken in warre. Then he disarmed them, and tooke the chiefe among them for hostages: which done, hee made them all goe out of the towne, with their wiues and children, and hauing caused them to be enuironed by the armed bands, hee spake vnto them, reproching them with their many rebellions and ingratitude; for the which they attended no lesse than the sentence of death: but he ended his speech with reproches and bitter words, and then beyond all hope sent them home to their houses, depriving them onely of their armes, horses, and other equiPAGEage for warre, and of, their common treasure. They write, That he did assigne lands for them that had serued Virriatus in the warre, and that he gaue them the towne of Valencia in Lusitania to dwell in. This yeare C. Marienus being accused at Rome, That he had abandoned the army, whereof he had charge in Spaine, was beaten with rods, and sold for a Sexterce (which in our English money is a penny) by a decree of the people.

As for Popilius, who made warre against the Numantines, or rather they made warre against him, he returned to Rome, at the comming of the Confull C. Hostilius Mancinus, who was also-gether vnfortunat in his enterprises: the which was signified vnto him by presages, before he came out of Italie: for as he tooke shipping at Port Hercules, there was a strange voice heard, saying, Mancinus stay; and as hee tooke port at Genes, there was a great Snake found in his ship, the which escaped. He was beaten euery where by the Numantines, hauing thirtie thousand men in his armie. Being terrified with a bruit, That the Cantabrians and Vacceans came to succour Numantia, he fled in the night into desert places, whereas Nobilior had encamped in former time, and there without any munition or rampier, he was the next morning found and besieged by the enemy, and constrained to capitulate a peace with them vpon like conditions, ingaging his faith to make them be ratified by the Senate. Tib. Gracchus (who was afterwards blaine) being Tribune of the people, then Quæstor in this armie, was the negotiator of

A of this peace: who was so fauoured by the Numantines, as they hauing spoiled the Romanes campe, and among other things carried away the accompts, quitrances, and other papers of Gracchus, they restored them to him againe very willingly. Although this composition were ignominious, yet did it saue the liues of twentie thousand Romane citizens: VVhich being knowne at Rome, M. Emilius Lepidus the other Confull was presently sent into Spaine, and M. Emilius called home to Rome, to giue an account of his action, the Numantine warre remaining for a time suspended. By reason whereof, M. Emilius being impatient to remaine in the Prouince idle (for captaines neuer goe to the warre, but to get honour and profit) whilest that Mancinus proceſſe was in hand, and that hee had received newes, hee began to molest the Vacceans, saying, That they had relieved the Numantines, and vnder that pretext besieged Palantia, their chiefe towne, being strong and rich, calling D. Brutus his father in law to assist him at this worke, who had his charge proroged in qualitie of Proconfull of the further Spaine. The Senate aduertised hereof, sent Cinna and Cæsius embassadours into Spaine, to let him vnderstand, That the Romanes did not hold it conuenient (after so many losses) to attempt a new warre, and presented vnto him the Senates decree, by the which he was forbidden to make warre against the Vacceans. Emilius (who had already begun the siege) answered, That the Senate was not well informed how matters passed in Spaine, nor how that he had joynd his forces with those of Brutus: and that he was well assured, that the Vacceans had relieved the Numantines with victuals, men, and money: that if he should retyre in that fort, it would be a dishonour, and that many of their allies would take occasion thereby to quit the Romanes friendship, and to contemne them. With these reasons (the which the Confull did also write vnto the Senat) Cinna returned. Then did the Confull Emilius Lepidus and Brutus the Proconfull busie themselves to plant many engines to batter the towne, and to furnish their armie with victuals. Flaccus (who was Commisſarie general of the campe) causing great store of corne to be brought, was surprisid by the enemy, and so enclosed, as it was impossible to escape: but he by a singular policie caused it to be bruited among his troupes, That the Confull had taken Palantia, the which did so amaze the enemies, as with a foolish credulitie they quit their prey, and retyred. The siege of Palantia growing tedious, the Romane armie began to suffer so much, as both men and beasts perished for hunger: so as in the end he was forced to leaue the siege, and retyre in the night, in great disorder: for there were many sicke men, who desired them not to abandon them to the enemies sword; which moued all men to pite: and therefore it was a great hinderance vnto the armie, being pursued by the Palantines: who loosing this wished opportunitee, returned, as if some Angell had stood before them, to prevent the totall ruine of the Romane armie: yet Paulus Oroſius writes, That there were six thousand men slaine, and that the rest were put in rout, and saued themselves without armes. M. Emilius Lepidus being called to Rome by reason of these errors, was degraded and condemned in a great fine. Brutus continuing in his charge of Proconfull in the further Spaine, spent much time to order things in his Prouince, and afterwards triumphed at Rome: he was afterwards called Callique or Gallique, E for that he had subdued the people of Galicia.

As for the question betwixt Mancinus and the embassadours of Numantia, it was judged, That the accord made without the authoritie of the Senat should bee void, and they decreed, That Mancinus, who was bound vnto the Numantines, should be delivered vnto them, to dispose of him at their pleasure, after the example of the ancient Romanes, who had for the like offence delivered twentie captaines vnto the Samnites. According vnto which decree, Mancinus was brought into Spaine by P. Furius Philus or Philo, Confull in the yeare 617, and was delivered by him naked and bound vnto the Numantines, who refused him. This Furius in a brauerie made Q. Metellus and Q. Pompeius Consular men, and his enemies, come with him into Spaine, to serue him as his Lieutenants: and this yeare the warre was managed in Spaine with three Consular armies: but P. Furius did nothing that was memorable. After whom, Q. Calphurnius Piso came into the Prouince: who hauing overrun the territorie of Palantia, and taken some little prey, he spent the rest of his time shut vp in Carpetania: and this yeare the Romanes received a rout by them of the towne of Numantia.

6 The people of Rome being wearie of this Numantine warre, which grew daily more difficult, in the year 619 they did chuse P. Corn. Scipio Emilianus, called Africanus, Consul, for that some few years before hee had ruined the mightie citie of Carthage; vnto whom Spaine was giuen without lot: whither he went with some volunaries, and a small number of his friends, being some foure thousand men; for Spaine had too many fouldiors, and wanted onely good captaines. He gaue this troupe in charge to Buteon his nephew, and he himselfe went speedily before. Being arrived in Spaine, he found what he had heard before; That the armie was very ill disciplined: Wherefore holding it a part of great wisdom first of all to reforme the corrupt manners of the fouldiors, as soone as he arrived, he chased out of the campe all merchants, strumpets, tellers of fortune, and the new superstitious sacrificers; to which things the fouldiors were too much giuen: he cut off their caris and baggage, forbidding them to bring any thing into the campe that was not necessarie. He did forbid beds, and he himselfe gaue example vnto others, lying vpon coverings spread vpon girts. Finally, he set such an order among the fouldiours (submitting himselfe vnto the rigour of his owne ordinances, as in a short time they became modest, temperate, and obedient. Then hee began to traine them in warlike exercises, remoouing his campe often, whereas he caused the fouldiours to digge and make rampiers, himselfe being alwaies present, from the day breake to the Sunne set; and commonly he made them to march in a square bataile, punishing any one that went out of his ranke. Hee went about his armie to see if they marched in good order, and if he found any sicke or tyred, he set them on horsebacke, causing others to alight: and he was no lesse just vnto beasts: for if there were any horses overladen, he distributed their superfluous burthens among the footmen. Hee appointed euery man his charge and office, and limited a time for the finishing of their workes, which they might not neglect. When as he found his fouldiours sufficiently inured to labour, and accustomed to obey their commanders, then he came to encampe neere vnto Numantia, whereas he would not lodge his armie in quarters, as others before him had done, but kept it all vnted, that the enemy should get no aduantage of him in the beginning; the which is of great consequence. He had no will to suffer any one to goe forth to skirmish, vntill he was well informed how to make warre with that people, of the opportunities he must seeke, and of their manner of proceeding, their counsels and resolutions; keeping the enemy by that meanes from straying abroad, and maintaining the country, which was behind his armie, assured for his forragers: saying alwayes, That light skirmishes affected vpon brauerie, without necessitie, should be rejected by a wise and expert captaine, who should respect nothing but necessitie, profit, and occasion, and then he should shew himselfe courageous and hardie. When as he saw a conuenient time, hee marched with his armie, and taking a great circuit, he came and encamped in the territorie of the Vacceans, from whence the Numantines had their victuals. There hee wasted the country, burning all that could not serue to feed his armie. Not farre from Palantia is a place called Coplain, where behind a hill the Palantines had lodged a great troupe of men, hauing in the meane time sent out some companies against the Romanes, which went to forrage the country: for whose guard Scipio sent Rutilius Rufus with foure bands of horsemen, who repulsed the enemy, but with such an inconsiderat heat, as they were carried pell-mell vnto the top of the hill, where they discovered the enemies which lay in ambush: Then Rufus commanded his men to make a stand, and to cease their pursuite, for they were to defend themselves: from which danger they were freed by the Consul Scipio, who arrived with the rest of the horsemen: for hearing that the enemy began to flye at the sight of Rufus, hee doubted there was some stratageme. Being aduertised, that there were some ambushes prepared at the passage of the riuer, which was full of mud, he tooke another way, and spared not his fouldiours paines to free them from danger. In this long and drie passage he digged Wells for to ease his fouldiours, being oppressed with the violent heat, but they found the waters bitter. In the end he came into a more fertile country, with the losse onely of some horses and beafts of carriage.

Passing by the territorie of Cauca, whereas Lucullus had made that great slaughter, hee made

A made proclamations, That the Caucians which were absent might returne freely to their lands, and from thence he led his armie to winter in the territorie of the Numantines, whereas Agurthe, grand child to Maximilla, came vnto him, bringing certaine companies of archers and casters with slings, with twelue Elephants. In this place some Romanes forraging and spoiling the neighbour country, were surprised in a Bourg, behind the which the enemies lay hidden in a valley; who were repulsed by *Scipio*s speedie coming to assist them, but he had no will to pursue them. Approching soone after to Numantia, he besieged it with two camps; one of the which was commanded by Q. Fab. Maximus his brother. There the besieged made many sallies, prouoking the Romanes to skirmish: but the Consul laughed at them, saying, it had bene a great indiscretion in him to fight with desperat and mad men, whom he was assured to take in a short time by famine. He vndertooke to cast a ditch and a rampier of a league and a halfe compass about the towne: for the defence of which worke, hauing set gards in conuenient places, he commanded euery man to be carefull in his quarter, and that when as the enemy should offer to charge in one place, that suddainly they should in the day time hang vp a red cloth on a pike, and in the night make a fire, that he and his brother might come to succour them. This worke being finished, without it he drew another ditch, making a wall with piles, of eight foot broad and ten high, the which he flanked with towers a hundred and twentie foot one from another: and for that there was a marish ground on the one side, he caused a caufey to bee rayfed of the height of this wall, which joynted vnto it. The riuer of Duero running through these rampiers, brought great commoditie to the besieged; for that way men went both in and out, and boats entred by fauour of the wind and swiftnesse of the streame: to take away the vse whereof, Scipio built two forts vpon the banks, from the which he cast pieces of timber into the water, from one banke vnto the other, in the which were fastened great pikes of yron, which went very deepe into the water; and these beames were so tied together, as they did turne continually with the force of the streame, so as not any one could passe, either by boat or swimming: for Scipio held it a good course to amaze the enemy, to take from him all meanes to haue intelligence from abroad, and withall to cut off his victuals. For the gard of these fortifications hee appointed thirtie thousand men, being the one halfe of his armie; to succour the which, hee ordained twentie thousand more, reseruing the other tenne thousand for a third supplie: which vpon a signe giuen should come vnto their quarters, without confusion. The Numantines attempted often to force these rampiers, but they found too great resistance, the Consul himselfe going the round day and night, and visiting the whole circuit, being almost two leagues; making his account, that the enemy wanting victuals, armes, and succours, could not long hold out. Matters being in this estate, Rhetogenes, furnamed Carannius, one of the chiefe and most resolute men within the towne, aduentured with fise of his friends, and so many seruants, all well mounted, to come in a darke night vnto the enemies rampiers, where they mounted and slew the enemies sentinels, and with certaine engines which they carried, passed ouer their horses: hauing sent their seruants backe, they dispersed themselves in the country of the Arcuaces, where they besought those people, That as friends, kinsmen, and allies to the Numantines, they would succour them. Many fearing the Romanes, commanded them to depart out of their countries, refusing to heare them: but the young men of Luria, a rich towne, some tenne leagues from Numantia, pitying these poore creatures besieged, did sollicit the people to relieue them: whereof Scipio being aduertised by the auncients of the towne, went thither with some troupes, and within eight houres space shewed himselfe about their walls, commanding, That the chiefe of these feditious young men should bee deliuered vnto him, threatening (if they sayled) to sacke their towne: so as no excuse preuailling, about foure hundred were brought vnto him, whose hands hee caused to bee cut off, and the next day returned to the campe. The Numantines prest with hunger and all other extremities, sent fise of their citizens vnto Scipio, to vnderstand if hee would receiue them vpon any reasonable conditions. Maximus, the chiefe of this embassage, comming before him, began to discourse of the vertues and generous disposition of the Numantines, with high wordes maintaining, That it should not bee imputed vnto them for a crime, if they had so eagefly defended their liberties, their wiues and children, for the which they were now fallen into that calamitie.

wherefore (said he) it is reasonable, & Scipio, that (according to thy singular vertue) thou pardon our brave and valiant race, and that thou proponed unto us such honest conditions, as we may endure them: for it is in thy power to have the towne by this means, or to vie what souldiours (who esteeme their libertie more than their lives) can doe. To whom Scipio made no other answer, but that they must deliuer themselves, their towne, their armes, and all they had, at his discretions, for he was sufficiently aduertised by prisoners, in what estate they were. When this answer was brought vnto the besieged (although they expected no better) they entred into such a rage against these poore deputies, as they cut them in pieces, being jealous that they had made some agreement with the Romanes for their owne particular. Then resolving vpon all extremities, after that their victuals were consumed, having deuoured raw hides, and such like things, in the end they led vpon dead mens flesh: and they fell into such miserie, as the stronger oppressed the weaker, euery man regarding his own particular, being also consumed with pestilent diseases, which grew through the extremities which they endured, and from the corruption and stinke of dead carcases. Wherefore vanquished with all these calamities, in the end they tooke counsell to yeeld, and came and presented themselves to Scipio like hideous suppliants, deformed, filthy, and torne; their haire and beards long, clotted and staring, resembling rather savage beasts than reasonable creatures: whom Scipio commaunded to deliuer vp their armes that day, and the next day they should all yeeld themselves in a certaine place appointed them. To this they demanded a dayes respite, for that many were yet remaining within the towne, being resolved to die rather by the sword or famine, than to yeeld, but vpon honest conditions. So being returned, and having consulted what was to be done, they resolved, after they had once glutted themselves with that small store which remained, they would sallie out vpon the enemy, and die fighting virtuously for their country. But Scipio knowing, that he had to deale with mad men, restrained his souldiours all he could: the which did the more enflame the Numantines, who notwithstanding all that he could doe, issued forth, and forced the Romanes to defend themselves, having great need to bee commaunded by a wife and valiant captain: for they were more than once forced to fight flying: yet in the end the Numantines were repulged, having lost their best men; notwithstanding they retired without disorder: their last remedie was to flye out of the towne with their armes: but that being tope, they shut their gates, and slew one another, by sword, poyson, or fire, and by all other kinds of deaths: so as Scipio entring into the towne, he found all consumed with fire, and not a man living. Others write, That Scipio burnt and rased the towne without the consent of the Senate, and not the Numantines, for the hatred which he did naturally beare to them, which he tooke by force: besides that, by the destruction of such famous townes he made his renowne greater, or else that he held it to be expedient & profitable for the Commonweale: they said also, That but some of them slew themselves, and the rest were sold for slaues, onely fittie were reserved to lead them in triumph.

Thus the taking of Numantia is diuersly written, the which did so long resist the Romans, and gaue them so many routs, hauing in the beginning but eight thousand men, the which in the end were reduced to lesse than foure thousand, which notwithstanding did greatly importune their enemies. The territorie of Numantia was afterwards diuided among the neighbour people; and Scipio (being then Pro-consull) hauing visited the countrey, and done right to all men, punishing the inconstant allies by words or threats, and some by pecuniarie fines, he returned to Rome, where in one year he triumphed of the Numantines, and D. Brutus of the Lusitanians and Gallicians. The Senat deputed ten Senators to go into Spaine, to dispose of the affaires of that Prouince. Thus the troubles were pacified, without any alteration for some yeares.

7 In the yeare 630, Q. Caecilius Metellus and T. Quintius Flaminius being Consuls, the inhabitants of the Islands of the Baleares, which we call Maiorca and Minorca, liuing by pyracie and theeuery by sea, ministred occasion to the Romanes to send the Consull Metellus, eldest sonne to him that was called Macedonius, who after a great slaughter of these theeuers brought them to a more ciuile life; where hauing left some Colonies of Romanes, he triumphed at Rome.

8 C. Marius (he that was afterwards seuen times Consull) about the yeare 640 had the charge of the further Spaine as Pretor, where hee cleansed the whole countrey of theues: which

A which trade those people could not forget, holding it in old time to be very honourable. Q. Seruilius Cæpio was also sent with the like charge, who fought with the Lusitanians, and did triumph. A while after there did arise new tumults among the Celtiberians: for the appeasing whereof Calpurnius Piso was sent, and after him Sergius Galba, Pretors: but for that the Romanes were much troubled with the warres of Italie, as well against the Cimbrians (a nation coming from the borders of the Northerne Ocean) as against the slaues which were in armes againe, and foraged Sicile, they sent certaine Commissioners to pacifie the troubles without armes, if it might be. These Cimbrians being vanquished a little before by the Consull Carbo, had fallen vpon the Gaules and Spaine, from whence they had been repulged, and full Carbo had fallen vpon the Gaules and Spaine, where they defeated the armie of M. Syllanus in the yeare 644 returned againe to inuade Italie, where they defeated the armie of M. Syllanus. B Consull: but the Lusitanians in the yeare 648 (P. Rutilius Rufus and C. Manilius being Consuls) defeated a Romane armie: the Authors speake not of his name that was the Generall, nor of his that was sent to suppress them, in the yeare 652, who subdued them. It may be it was D. Iunius Silanus. And they stayed not long to minister matter of triumph to the Romane captaines, hauing rebelled againe in the yeare 654, against whom L. Corn. Dolabella a Pretor was sent, who vanquished them and triumphed. The Consull T. Didius, at the same time, after that the Cimbrians had been driuen out of Italie, hauing had the government of Spaine about Ebro, slew in battaile 20000 Aureaces and Vaceans, and tooke the towne of Thermise, which was great and strong by situation, commanding the inhabitants for a punishment of their ordinarie rebellion to dwell in the plaine, and not to inwall themselves: after seuen months siege hee also tooke the towne of Colenda, and sold the inhabitants. Other people of the Celtiberians continuing in their theeuery, were by him condemned to die, by the aduice of tenne Commissioners, which were then in Spaine for the people of Rome. Hauing then gathered them together, vnder colour that he would giue them land to manure, he caused them to be enuironed by his souldiours, and cut in pieces: for which deeds he triumphed at his returne to Rome. In the armie of this T. Didius was at that time Q. Sertorius, who was charge of 10000 men, a man of iudgement and valour, whereof he made good proofe, when as vnder this Consull Didius, the Castellonians attempted, with the help of them of Gizeze, to cut his regiment in pieces which wintered in their town, for that during the tumult he rallied them together which escaped the slaughter, with the which he reuenged the death of his souldiours, putting all the conspirators which he found armed to the sword: & hauing attired some of his men with their apparell and armes, he marcht speedily towards Gizeze, where being let in by reason of this disguising, he made a great slaughter of the inhabitants, and sold the rest.

10 The Lusitanians and people of the further Spaine in the yeare 656 drew against them the Consull P. Licinius Crassus, who triumphed in like manner. And in the yeare 659 Fulvius Flaccus being sent against the Celtiberians, who had rebelled, he slew 20000 in battell, and restrained the rest by iustice, euen those which had burnt their owne Senators, opposing themselves against the rebellion which they had intended; raising and demanteling some townes. Spaine by means of these executions remained quiet, vntill the ciuile dissensions betwixt Marius and Sylla, which ministred occasion of new warre.

11 Whilst this Marian sedition continued, M. Crassus hauing seene his father and brother slaine by Cinna and Marius, fled into Spaine, where he had been in time past at the warres with his father, and there had gotten some friends: but finding that euery one stood in feare of Marius, he retired to a country house belonging to Vibius Papias, where he hid himselfe in a caue, causing some to sound Vibius mind, who hearing that Crassus was escaped, he caused him to be secretly fed there eight moneths by a slaue of his, vnto the death of Cinna.

12 After the ciuile warre betwixt Marius and Sylla, the infection of this madnesse past into Spaine, by the means of Q. Sertorius, who hauing held the partie of Cinna and Marius, after the defeats of Carbo, Scipio and Norbanus by Sylla, he retired into Spaine, where he had been vnder the Consull Didius, and there he fortified himselfe against the enterprises of the Dictator Sylla, causing Iulius Salinator to keepe the passages of the Pyrene mountains, with 6000 foot, but it was not long before that Sylla sent C. Annus, who not able to force the enemy in a place of such aduantage, obtained the passage by the death of Salinator, whom Calpurnius Castrinus (that did maligne him) slew in treason. This made Sertorius retyre, who had but three thousand men remaining in new Carthage, from whence he passed into Africke, and and from thence the barbarians chased him: afterwards thinking to returne, he was repulsed from landing in Spaine: wherefore he seized vpon one of the islands of Pyrius, in distance of C. Annus garison: but he was chased from thence also, so as being accompanied with some foits of Cician pirates, he was forced to put out to sea for some daies. In the end he passed the strait, and put to land about the mouth of the river of Betis, where haueing information by some mariners of the fortunat islands, he began to resolute to liue there in rest: whereupon these pirates disliking his designe, abandoned him, and put themselves in pay vnder a Moore, named Ascalius, who contended with an other for the kingdome of the Ma-rufians, whose partie Sertorius maintained. Comming to fight Ascalius was defeated, and after him one of Syllas captaines, called Paccianus, who came to succour him: after which As-calius was besieged in the towne of Tingis, and taken. By this good successe Sertorius augmented his armie with the remainders of the vanquished enemies souldiours, which came to serue vnder him. He did so win the hearts of the Moores, vnto this victorie modestly, as they were afterwards al at his commandment: but as he was in great care what course to take, there came embassadors vnto him from the Lusitanians, intreating him to be their Generall, for that the Romans of Syllas partie made war against them, and therefore they had need of a man of iudgement & experience, which honor they did according to his merits offer vnto him:

 vpon which summons he left Africke, leading with him about 2500 souldiours, which he called Romans, & yet they were for the most part Africans; with the which haueing ioyned 4000 Lusitanians and 7000 horses, he made head against foure great Romane captaines, vnder whom there were about 120000 foot and 6000 horses, and had in a manner all the townes of Spaine at their deuotion.

At the beginning of this war, he defeated Cotta in a sea fight, neere vnto the towne of Mellaria, and put to rout Didius or Fidius, Pretor of Betica, neere vnto the river of Betis, where he slue 10000 of his men: and by the diligence of his Queller Hirtuleius, he also defeated Tho-ranus, lieutenant to the Confull Q. Metellus Pius, to whom that province was assigned in the year 673. Afterwards he had to deale with Metellus himselfe, and did so annoy him being a great and an expert captaine, as Manlius the Proconfull of Gaule was forced to come to his succours, with three legions and 1500 horse: but Manlius being encountered by Hirtuleius Sertorius Queller, was defeated, put to flight, and forced to saue himselfe in a manner alone within Lerida. L. Domitius was more vntowardly, who was slain vpon the place in an other in-counter: all which exploits were done by surpris, and in flying or retiring, the Romane captains not being able to draw Sertorius to fight in a pitch field: whereupon the Senat of Rome, considering that Metellus age (which was somewhat advanced) made him more slow, and therefore not fit to encounter Sertorius, who was in the flower of his age, accompanied with souldiours as light as the wind, inured to labour, hunger, thirst, and all the discomforts of war, were of opinion to send Cn. Pompeius vnto him, as an assistant & companion with like au-thoritie. In the mean time Metellus besieged the towne of the Langobriges, thinking to take it without difficultie, for want of water, knowing there was but one onely well in the whole towne: but Sertorius provided for this inconuenience, for haueing provided a reward to such as L would carrie goats skins filled with water, the Moores and other aduenturous people went in with a great quantitie: so as Metellus (who had victuals but for few daies) was forced to retire, after that Aquinius one of his lieutenants, whom he had sent to forage with 6000 men, had been defeated by Sertorius, who lay continually in ambush.

About that time M. Perenna arrived in Spaine, with a great armie, the which he ioyned to that of Sertorius, not of his owne free will, meaning to make war apart, but by constraint, for that the souldiours haueing a better conceit of Sertorius than of him, would not follow him:
 which made Perenna to enue and hate Sertorius. With these forces in a manner all Spaine beyond Ebro, was conquered by him. When as Pompey was come to Metellus camp, many throug his fame, which was great, began to doubt of Sertorius affaires, and manie townes which were allied vnto him began to wauer; but that which hapned at Lauronne did confirme them: for M Sertorius haueing besieged Lauronne, & Pompey comning thither to raise the siege, when as the armies were neere, & that Pompey expected to giue him battel, he perceived that at one instant Sertorius held both the towne & his armie besieged; for he had lodged 6000 men behind Pom-peys army, watching an oportunitie to compass him in, so as he was forced to be more carefull

A how to saue himselfe, than to deliuer the Lauronitans, whose towne he did see taken & burnt before his face: the which Sertorius did, not vpon any crueltie (for in the whole course of his life he was neuer notted of that excesse, if it were not by constraint) but to let them know (who made so great esteeme of Pompey) that he knew more than he; whom he reamed a yong man, and Syllas discipule; and in this act of Lauronne, he said, That a wife captaine doth alwaies looke more to that which is behind, than before. And to say the truth, Sertorius was one of the politickt captaines of his time, as it appeared in this warre, whereas he maintained himselfe and those he led, alwaies inuincible, being neuer beaten but by his Lieutenants, through whose errors he recieued many prejudiciall losses: the which he repaired afterwards with great honor, as the defeat of Hirtuleius by Metellus, neere vnto the towne of Italica, where he lost twen-tie thousand men.

B After the taking of Lauronne, the armies of either side haueing wintered (the one in Lufita-nia, the other neere vnto the Pyrenes) they began to seeke one another: and it happened, that Pompey haueing encountered Herennius and Perenna neere vnto Valence, he defeated them, and in like sort Hirtuleius, who was slaine at that time: wherewith growne proud, he marched to-seeing that he had the worst, retired himselfe cunningly, suffering himselfe to be besieged in the towne of Calaoire, a strong towne in a mountaine country, where he did more annoy the enemy, than they did him: in the meane time leuying men in the townes of his allies, hee made a furious sally, and dispersed his enemies; so as Metellus went to Winter in Gaule, and Pompey in the territorie of the Vacceans: where haueing besieged Palantia, Sertorius made him to rayse his siege. In this countrey Pompey found himselfe much distressed, so as he was forced to demand money, clothes, and come for his armie, from the Senat, else hee should be forced to bring it backe into Italie: Whereupon the Confull Lucullus gaue order hee should be furnished, fearing, that if he brought his armie backe into Italie, he would fise vnto the people for a Commission to make warre against Mithridates, which charge hee D affected.

During the Consulship of L. Lucullus and M. Cotta, the Proconsuls Metellus and Pompey did all they could against the townes allied to Sertorius; who did so terrifie them, as Metellus despairing euer to vanquish him with all the force of the Romans during his life, made a proclamation by the sound of the trumpet, to giue 100 talents to him that could kill him, amounting to 60000 crownes, and besides, 20000 acres of land, if he were a Romane; if a banished man, restitution to all his goods and honours. The banished Senatours of Rome, which followed Sertorius army, did all malice their Generall, wherunto Perenna (alwaies jealous of his glory) did still incite them: wherefore they began to crosse him vnder hand in many gallant designs, abusing the authoritie which Sertorius had giuen them ouer the Spaniards, proudly, couetou-E fly and cruelly, vnder colour of justice, exacting extraordinary tributes; so as many townes did mutine, and the loue which they did beare vnto Sertorius, was turned into hatred: wherefore Sertorius was forced (for the suppressing of many tumules which did arise) to shew himselfe seuer, against his owne nature, and at the last became cruel: so as in the end he put to death many children of noble houses, whom he held in the towne of Ofca, vnder colour to instruct them in learning, and to teach them the manners of the Romans; the which (to speake truly) were so many hostages; and others he sold, to punish the infidelitie of the Spaniards, which he discouered daily; the which did much blemish the lustre of his vertues. Perenna through his malice drew him to this excesse, and did procure him infinite enemies, as well Romanes as Spaniards, and haueing found many confederats, he conspired with Ausilius Grecinius, Manlius, Antonius, and others, to murder him; the which he put in execution, haueing invited him to supper in his lodging, with the whole troupe of conspirators, where they stabbed him with their daggers. Such an end had this great captaine, by the treason of his owne followers; the which being published, all the people of Spaine felt embassadors vnto Metellus and Pompey, and yielded vnto him. The inhabitants of Ebro attribute the foundation of their towne to Sertorius, where there are certaine inscriptions to bee seene, making mention, that he was buried there. He had many times made offer to Metellus, to lay aside armes, so as he might be called home by a publique decree: for he protested that he made not warre for the Spaniards greameffe, but to maintaine the people of Rome, whom he loued and honoured: so as there is no doubt but he was of a mild and gentle disposition, but that necessitie had forced him to this contumacie and rebellion, and the violent and ambitious pursuite of his fellow citizens. Perpenna thinking to doe some great exploit, made vse of Sertorius forces, but hee was deceived: for it soone appeared, that he was not fit to commaund, being in a short time vanquished, taken, and slaine by Pompey. This traitor to redeeme his life, offered Sertorius papers vnto Pompey, where there were many letters from the Senators of Rome, perswading Sertorius to passe with his armie into Italy: but Pompey tooke these papers, and would not once read them, but burnt them all, and so put Perpenna to death, to the end he should not name any one, nor reueale that which was contained in them; the which might haue rayed a new ciuile warre: which was no act of a young man. Of all the towns in Spaine, Auxima, at this day Olima, and Calagurri, held out for a time against Pompey: but in the end they were taken by force and ruined; Auxima by Pompey, and Calagurri by Africanus: and so this Sertorian warre was ended: the last exploits whereof were about Olca and Ilerda in Catalogna, tenne yeares after the beginning thereof, in the yeare 682: in the which, Metellus and Pompey for their successfull exploits in Spaine triumphed. At that time Pompey was but a Roman knight; and they say, That he afterwards erected his trophies in the Pyrene mountains, where he caused to be written the names of 871 townes in his victories, among the which, he would not put that of Sertorius. This was the beginning of Pampelone, according vnto some. There were found in those dayes, in the vallies of Andorre and of Altauaca, certaine great buckles of yron, folded into the rockes with lead, which were held to be the trophies of Pompey. A yeare after we find mention made of M. Puppis Piso Pretor, who triumphed also for some victories gotten in Spaine.

13 In the yeare 688 L. Aurelius Cotta and Lucius Manlius Torquatus being Consuls, Cn. Piso a young man, audacious, poore, and seditious, suspected to haue conspired with Catiline, was sent into Spaine with charge (vnder pretext to do him honor, but the true cause was to get him out of Rome) where he was slaine, troubling the prouince with exactions, and other exesse: & some say it was plotted by Pompey. Then mention is made of Q. Calpurnius Pretor in the yeare 692: and after him, of Tubero in the further Spaine, who gaue the Prouince to Gaius Iul. Caesar his Quæstor, in qualitie of Pretor, Q. Metellus and L. Africanus being Consuls at Rome, in the yeare 693 of the foundation thereof: whereas in few dayes he subjected vnder the Roman yoke all that was to be subdued in Galicia, Brecaire, and Lusitania: among others, he destroyed Brigantium in Galicia (the which is Bragança, if it be not the Port of Corunga, or the Groine, called in old time Portus Brigantinus:) He dispersed the Herminian mountaineers, inhabiting betwixt the riuers of Duero and Minio, and forced them to retire into the illands of Cincies, which are those of Bayonne of Minio. And if hee shewed himselfe active and valiant in matters of warre, hee woon no lesse honour in administration of justice, and other actions of peace: about all things hee pacified many suites, commenced by vsurers against their debtors; the which he so ordered, as the creditors should haue two third parts of their debtors goods, and the rest they should haue for their maintenance, vntill the debt were payed: and he made many other good ordinances, for the which he was much honoured. After Caesar's returne, he being Consull, there was a complot made betwixt him, Craesus, and Pompey, who diuided the Roman Prouinces betwixt them: whereof Spaine fell to Pompey; the which he gouerned by his Lieutenants: then P. Lentulus was sent thither as Proconsull, and after him Q. Metellus Nepos: in whose time the Gaules of Aquitania made warre against Caesar and the Romanes, employing the captaines and Spanish souldiours which had carried armes vnder Sertorius.

From that time Spaine was gouerned by Pompey, or men of his faction: so as vpon the beginning of the ciuile warre betwixt him and Caesar, L. Africanus, M. Petreius, and M. Varro did gouerne it for him: against whom Caesar marched, after that he had chased Pompey out of Italy; knowing well, that Spaine was a seminarie for souldiours, and if he tooke it not from Pompey, his desires would proue but vaine: being well aduertised, that Pompey had sent Vibullius Rufus thither, to keepe that great prouince at his deuotion, and to oppose him against Caesar in those parts.

A parts. The lieutenants vpon Vibullius commaund put themselves in order, every one in his gouernment. Petreius made a leuie of horsemen in Lusitania: Africanus did the like among the Celtiberians, and that part of the Cantabrians, where he commaunded. They joyined their forces together on this side the riuier of Ebro, making their store-houise for the war at Ilerda, hauing in their armies fise Roman legions, almost 80 companies of Spaniards, and about 5000 horse. Caesar being resolved to fight with them, and to chase them out of Spaine, had sent C. Fabius with three legions to seize vpon the passages of the Pyrene mountains: then he followed with about 6000 Italian foot, which had alwaies serued him in the wars of Gaule, and 3000 horse, and the like number of other souldiours leuied in Aquitania, most of them of the mountaines; of whom he had politickely borrowed all the money they had to pay his armie: where he found, that Fabius and the Pompeians were neere, and often skirmished about the riuier of Sicoris or Sigro, whereas Fabius had made two bridges, by the which he sent his souldiours to forrage, for all neere vnto him was consumed, Petreius and Africanus lying beneath the enimie. It happened, that Fabius meaning to passe two legions ouer one of his bridges, to seconde his forragers, when as the souldiours were past, & the baggage following them, the bridge was so ouercharged with weight, as it brake; so as Fabius armie was diuided, and these two legions ingaged, and cut off by the riuier from the rest of their horse and foot: which the enemies (who lay beneath them) perceiving by the timber and other stuffe which came down with the streame, Africanus did suddainly cause foure legions and all his horse to passe, to charge Fabius two legions, which were led by L. Plancus: who hauing put them into a long forme of battell, least he should be enuironed by these horsemen, he endured the shooke of these foure legions, vntill that C. Fabius came to succour him, and to vngage him: for when he saw the bridge broken, he doubted what the enemies would doe, and therefore had caused all the rest of his army to passe by the other bridge, which was a good league about it. Hereupon Caesar armed with his armie, and marched towards the enemies to draw them to battaile, but he could not: skirmishing for three daies together vnder the towne of Ilerda, with losse on either side, Caesar's armie (which lay then in a country about seuen leagues compass, betwixt the two riuers of Sicoris and Cinga, which were not to be waded through) was most annoyed with raine and tempests that fell, wherewith (the riuers being much risen) the bridges which Fabius had repaired were carried away; so as they could not bring any victuals from their confederat townes, nor out of Gaule nor Italie, neither yet goe to forrage: and if any did stray out farre to seeke victuals, they were compassed in by the waters, and could not returne to the campe. And on the other side, Africanus and Petreius armie liued in abundance: and to encrease Caesar's miseries, great store of victuals, stayed by the riuers which were ouertlowne, being conducted out of Gaule, with a good number of foot and horse, were stopped and dispersed by Africanus, who departed in the night with three legions and all his horsemen to defeat them. But the Gaules defended themselves so valiantly, as most of them escaped in the mountaines, the which Caesar (having found meanes soone after to repaire his bridges) receiued, with their leaders. Many daies were spent in light skirmishes, and to cut off them that went for forrage: in the meane time there were many secret practises; so as Caesar drew vnto him fise townes and nations; Olca, Calagurri, Tarracone, the Lacetanes and Ausetanes: and in the end, the Spaniards which were in Africanus campe began to disband, and to flye to Caesar's campe; yea, whole bands of the Ilurguonians: And after the example of these neere townes, those that were farthest off fled to Caesar for his friendship; who making many ditches and trenches, drew the riuier of Sigro or Sicoris into so many streames, as his horsemen might wade through it. Africanus and Petreius being amazed thereat, resolved to dislodge, and passe the riuier of Ebro, to retire into the Celtiberians cuntry, where they did thinke to get many horsemen, victuals, and other commodities. According to this resolution, they disloded in the night from Ilerda, where they left a good garrilon, and march towards Ebro.

F Caesar hauing passed his horse, followed them in the reere, and in the end he was so importuned by the legions, as he caused them to wade through the riuier whereas the horsemen had passed, and made such speed, as he ouertooke the enemies in the morning, so as the armies were again neere together, yet did they neither fight nor march, spending some time to discouer the cuntry: yet Caesar in the end found meanes to get (but not without a sharpe encounter) certaine straits, whereby he stopped Africanus and Petreius designe for their going to Ebro.

Whilest they consult what they had to doe, and how to prevent Cæsars surprisles, their armie wearie of them, and woon with Cæsars fame and reputation, was easily corrupted by the Cæsarian souldiers: the which Africanus and Petreus sought to hinder; yea, Petreus vning his absolute authoritie, slew many of them that parled. Thinking afterwards to returne towards Ilerda, and to passe the river Scoris, but being hindered by Cesar, they put their armie in bat-taille ready to fight: but Cesar holding them as it were besieged, reduced them to that extremitie, as they demaunded their liues of him, resigning their Legions vp vnto him, and all the Prouince.

17 M. Varro, who was in the further Spaine, hearing the successe of the affaires in Italie, in the beginning, he did hold Pompeys ruine to be most certain: wherefore he spake very honourably of Cesar, and seemed to desire to be a neuter in these quarrels: but when as he vnderstood, that Africanus and Petreus were gone to field with so great an armie, and in what difficulties Cesar was vnder Ilerda for want of victuals, he then changed his mind, and followed Pompeys partie; and filling vp two legions which he had, to the which he joyned about thirtie bands of allies, he began to make prouision of great store of corne to send to Africanus, and in like manner to the Marfilians, whom Cesar caused to be besieged: and assuring himselfe of the citie of Gades, he caused all the gold, siluer, and jewels which were in Hercules Temple, to be transported thither, making Caius Gallionius, a Roman knight, Gouvernor thereof, with fix companies of Spaniards, carrying all the citizens armes into his lodging. Then he began to change his speech of Cesar, and of his exploits, contrarie to that which he had of late vied: wherefore the citizens of Rome being disperfed ouer the Prouince, being amazed, did easily suffer themselves to be taxed in a great summe of money, for the seruice of the Commonweale, not sparing (as it is to be conjectured) the townes which he thought to be affected vnto Cesar. And if there were any one which durst speake against them that followed Pompey, he did confiscate their goods, forcing every one to take an oath to him and to Pompey, and so he prepared himselfe to the warre, making his account to lodge with his two legions in Gades, vpon all euents, and to bring all the corne thither, and to gather together all the shipping of that prouince, the which he knew to be too much affected vnto Cesar. Finally, he perswaded himselfe, That hee might prolong the warre in this island as much as he pleased. Cæsars affaires prest him to returne into Italie, yet holding it necessarie to disarme all those that held Pompeys part in Spain, he sent two legions towards Betica, vnder the command of Q. Cassius, Tribune of the people, after the which he went with some troups of horse, hauing in the meane time order for the calling of a generall assembly at Cordoua: whither deputies came from all the townes, and in a manner all the Romanes that were in those marches, being much inclined to do what Cesar should command them. M. Varro was excluded by the assembly of Cordoua, who set gards in their ports and towers, and they of Carmona chased away the garrison which Varro had placed there, which made him haste the more to bring his two legions to Gades, least he should be preuented: but he was not farre aduanced, before he received letters, by the which he was aduertised, That the Gaditanes hauing agreed with the captaines of the garrison which was within their town, had forced Gallionius to depart, preteffing, That they would keepe the town for Cesar: whereupon one of Varros legions refused to leaue him, taking the way towards Seuille. Wherewith Varro being amazed, and seeing himselfe coopt vp in that countrey, so as he had no meanes to passe into Italie, he resolved to yeeld vnto Cesar, deliuering vp his legion which remained, with all the money and victuals that was in his power. Cesar held an assembly at Cordoua, and thanked the deputies of townes, the citizens of Rome, and all the captaines and others which had shewed themselves fauourable to his cause: hee restored euery man to his goods that had been spoyled, and filled all men with hope by his promises. From Cordoua he passed to Gades, and restored to Hercules Temple the gold and jewels which had bin taken away: and hauing left Q. Cassius with foure legions to gouerne the Prouince, he passed by sea to Tarracone, where the deputies of all that part of Spaine attended him: with whom hauing conferred, and disposed of the affaires, he went by land towards Narbonne, and from thence to Marfeilles, which his lieutenants did besiege. This was in the year 704.

18 At Marfeilles Cesar had news, That he was created Dictator at Rome by M. Lepidus the Pretor: after which time Spaine was gouerned in his name by M. Lepidus and Q. Cassius his lieutenants: But they of Corduba oppressed with the crueltie & couetousnesse of Cassius, forooke

(with

A (with two legions) Cæsars party; whereby the war was reuined in Spain by Pompeys children, after the defeat and death of their father, in the year 708. This Cassius being courteous, and a great exactor, did incense the fouldiours against him; who hurt him, and had like to haue slaid him with their daggers: The authors of this exccesse were L. Lucilius, Annius Scapula, and Minutius Sili: yet he was cured; and as he thought to passe into Africke by Cæsars commandement, almost all his fouldiours abandoned him, and did chuse one Thorus, of the towne of Italica, for their leader. To this Thorus (who made a shew to besiege Cordoua) Marcellus did joyne, but they did misse Mia (which is likely to be Monte-Major at this day): thereupon M. Lepidus came from Rome, where he had proclaimed Cesar Dictator, who kept them from forcing and taking Cassius. Marcellus referred their quarrels to Lepidus: but Cassius being loath to trust him, was content to leaue the prouince, and to giue place to Caius Trebonius. Being imbarqued at Malaca, with all that he had gotten in Spaine, to passe into Italie, his ship was cast by a tempest vpon the coast, where it perished, not farre from the mouth of Ebro.

These two legions were somewhat pacified by C. Trebonius, who succeeded Cassius Longinus, yet they feared to be punished for their rebellion: wherefore they solicited Scipio, who held Africke for the Pompeyan faction, to send Cn. Pompeius, sonne to the great Pompey, into Spaine: who went thitherward: but he staid long at the islands of the Baleares, as well to subdue them, as by reason of sicknesse. The legions hearing afterwards of Scipios defeat in Italie, and that Cesar sent Didius with an armie against them, fearing to bee oppressed before

C Pompeys coming, they did chuse T. Quinctius Scapula, and Q. Apponius for their commanders, chasing C. Trebonius out of the Betique prouince. Hereupon Pompey arriued, whom they acknowledged for their Generall: so as in a short time he reduced the further Spaine vnder his deuotion: with whom there came Atilius Varus and Labinus. Cesar aduerted of these things, being in Italie, he sent Q. Pedius and Q. Fabius Maximus into Spaine: but they were not able to resist Pompeys forces: so as Cesar being solicited by the townes that were allied vnto him (especially by them of Corduba) he went in person into Spaine. Then did Sextus Pompeius, the younger of the brethren, hold Cordoua, the chiefe towne of the gouernment, with a good garrison, and Cn. the elder brother besieged Vlloa, into the which Cesar found opportunity to put some succours, by the meanes of a great wind and raine, and by the dexterity of L. Iunius Pacicus, a Spaniard, to whom he had giuen the charge: which put Cn. Pompeius out of hope to take it: whereupon he dilogged, and led his armie towards Cordoua, whither Sextus his brother, fearing to be forced by Cesar, did sollicite him to approach. Hauing in-countred Cesar vpon the banks of Betis, there were many bloudie skirmishes, with variable successe. Cesar dilogged in the night, and went to besiege Ategua, whither Pompey went, and camped betwixt Ategua and Vcubis, hauing thirteene legions in his armie; yet he made no account but of three, for all the rest were composed of fugitiues, and men of no value. Cesar was much stronger in horse, and Pompey had no will to fight, but was willing to prolong the warre all he could: yet being desirous to force a certaine garrison which Cesar had set to keepe a peece of ground which was commodious for either of them, there was a great skirmish. Cesar committing himselfe to second his men with three legions: so as the Pompeians had the worst, and were repulsed. Wherewith Pompey being amazed, there being new supplies of horse come to Cæsars campe, he dilogged, and retired towards Cordoua, being followed by Cæsars horse, whereof he slew many, being ingaged in one of his legions. Some past from his campe vnto Cesar, among the which were Q. Martius and C. Fundanius. Ategua being sorely battered, and well defended for many dayes, in the end yeelded. So the Pompey vnderstanding, he marched towards Vcubis, where he caused a search to be made for all the inhabitants which fauoured Cesar, cutting off the heads of seuentie foure, and casting many women and children ouer the walls; which made many to flee to Cæsars campe, yea captaines, and heads of bands, and the fouldiours of some legions, with some townes. V wherefore Pompey fearing that by his delays he should loose both his allies, & his armie it selfe, hauing spent some dayes in turning vp and downe, in the end he resolved to giue Cesar battell neere vnto Munda. In both armies, besides Romanes and Italian allies and Spaniards, there were many Moors: for Boechus a Moorish king, had sent two of his sonnes to succour Pompey; and Bo-gud another king of the same nation, was in person in Cæsars armie: yet the battell was fought in a manner by the Romanes alone. On Cæsars side the fouldiours were encouraged by their Generals preference, and did wonderfull deeds of armes. In Pompeys armie, whereas the fugitive legionaries were, despaire to get their pardon made them to fight resolutely. Being come to joyne, the allies of either part turned their backs presently, so as the Romanes must trie it who should have the better, the which was done with great obstinacie on either side; so as there could no groines nor lamentations be heard, of any one that was dying or wounded, but onely striking and killing, one encouraging another, and shewing themselves more prompt with their hands than tongues. The battell was long doubtfull, neither could Cesar or Pompey judge which had the better, who after they had long beheld it in great perplexitie, they came among them to encourage their souldiours, whereof there was no great need. King Bogud was the cause of Cesars victorie, who standing without the battell with his Moores, went vnto the trenches of Pompeys campe, to spoyle it: the which Labienu perceiving, he went out of his ranke to make head against him: but the rest of Pompeys souldiours taking it to be a flight, with the apprehension thereof they were all put to rout; and although they did soone after find their owne errors, yet could they not rally themselves together againe, but some fled to their campe, and some towards the towne of Munde. The slaughter was great on either side, even at the taking of the campe, whereas Cesars men could neuer enter, before they had slaine all those that defended it, with like losse of their own men. Cesar having gotten the victorie with great difficultie and danger, he said vnto his souldiours, That he had often fought for honour, but now he had fought for his life. There died of Pompeys souldiours 30000.

After this rout Cordoua being abandoned by Sex. Pompeius, yielded, in the which Scapula (who had bene author of the souldiours fedition) caused a slave of his to kill him, and to burne his bodie, with all the treasure he had. Seull, Munde, and other places, were some taken by force, with great slaughter of the inhabitants, and some by composition. Many towns in Spaine (flattering Cesar) after these victories, called themselves after his name: Vubis was called Claritas Iulia, Ebor, Libertas Iulia. At this time Cesar did not spare the treasure of Hercules temple in Gades, being greatly distressed for money: He took away many of their lands, & laid new taxes vpon those towns which had rebelled, that he might reward his friends.

Pompey having escaped by flight, he came to Carteia, where he thought to make vfe of the armie at sea, which he had kept readie thereabouts: but he was pursued, and the ships after a great fight falling into the power of Didius, were some of them carried away by him, and the rest burnt; so as Pompey fore wounded in the shoulder and leg, seeking to flee by land, was pursued, overtaken, and slaine, with many of his men, by the horsemen and some companies of foot which were sent after him. For these victories gotten in Spaine, not against strangers, but against citizens of Rome, Cesar, Q. Fabius, and Q. Pedius, did triumph at Rome, to the great griefe of the people. After that these things had been exploited by Cesar, and all civill diffusions quenched, as he thought to enjoy his Dictatorship, suffering kingly honours to be done vnto him, he was slaine by Cassius, Brutus, and other conspirators. Then was the estate of Rome in greater confusion than ever, by the division betwixt Octavius Caesar and M. Antonie, and afterwards by the cruell proscriptions of Octavius, M. Antonie, and Lepidus: which Lepidus had triumphed for Spaine in the yere 707, I know not for what victories. It is certaine that he governed the hither part of Spaine by Cesars gift, but it was by his lieutenants, having neuer done any exploit of warre. Dis saith, That he perswaded Sex. Pompeius to leave Spaine, promising him restitution of his fathers goods. Domitius Calpurnius, C. Norbanus, Flaccus, and Asinius Pollio, were afterwards Gouvernours of Spaine, of whose exploits there is no memorable mention. In the yere 713 Cornel. Balbus, borne at Calis, was Confull at Rome: and in the yere 714, the second division of the empire being made betwixt Octavius Caesar, M. Antonie, and M. Lepidus, after the reconciliation betwixt Octavius and M. Antonie, and the Perusine warre, among other provinces, Spaine fell to Octavius; and from that yere the Spaniards began to account their yeares by the Arke or rule of Cesar, the which was 38 yeares before the coming of our Sauour, the which they did continue vntill the yere 1383 of our saluation, when as this custome was left, as shall be said.

20 In the yere 726 of the foundation of Rome, Augustus being sole Emperour, he undertooke to subdue the Cantabrians, Asturians, and Gallicians, who had alwayes held their libertie, lawes, and auncient customes, to rob and spoyle their neighbours, and would wholly

A wholly subiect them vnder his empire: wherefore he resolved to goe in person into Spaine, where he found those nations assured in their countenances, and full of contempt, relying in the strength of their mountaines, from whence they made many sudden enterprises, verie prejudiciall to the emperours armie, the which camped at Sigisama (the which some thinke was that which at this present they call Veisama, in Guipuscoa or Biscaye, and not Sigisama Iulia) where he made three troupes of his forces. Having spent many dayes there, and nothing advanced his affaires, Augustus fell sicke with care and travell: wherefore having left the charge of the warre to C. Antistius, he caused himselfe to be carried to Tarracona. The Cantabrians assailed both by land and sea towards Gaulle Aquitaine, came to fight with Antistius and Firminus, by whom they were defeated in many encounters, and their townes taken. A great number of Gallicians having fortified themselves on a mountaine, then called Medullius, neere vnto the river of Minio, they were besieged, and so pressed as they must of necessity either fight or yeeld: but having not the courage to defend themselves, and being loath to fall into servitude, they all flew themselves. The Asturians being camped neere vnto the river which gives the name vnto their countrey, thought to surpris the Romane armie, and without doubt had defeated them, if their enterprife had not bene discovered. They were afterwards put to rout by P. Carisius, but not without great slaughter of his men. Hee also tooke Lancia, the chiefe towne of Asturia, being abandoned. So the warre ended, and at the same instant Augustus having dismissed the old souldiours, hee gave them leave to build the towne of Emerita in Lusitania, at this day it is Merida in Portugall. Then also the towne of Salduba was first called Cesar Augusta, in honor of Octavius Augustus, it is now Saragossa, the which he did much enlarge with buildings. Five and twentie yeares before the birth of our Sauour, the way was paved from Cordoua to Astigi vpon the Ocean. It appears by this inscription which is at Cordoua, on a pillar of greene stone, whereon Augustus name is grauen, and the number of twelve miles, which is the distance from Cordoua to the sea.

This Temple of Iannus was by all conjectures built by Augustus at Cordoua, in signe of a perpetuall peace. After Cesars returne Sextus Apuleius Proconsull, shewed some proofes of his valour in Spaine, for the which he triumphed: and afterwards L. Emilius suppressed the Cantabrians, and Asturians, who rebelled againe: After which time Spaine was governed by Pretors and Proconsuls, the which are sometimes called in Latine Præsides, vnto the time of Dioclesian and Maximin. Strabo saith, That in his time, which was during the empires of Augustus and Tiberius, the province of Betica was given vnto the people of Rome, who appointed a Gouvernour or Pretor, having a Lieutenant and a Treasurer; the rest of Spaine remaining at the emperours disposition: who sent two lieutenants, the one in qualitie of Vice-Pretor, the other as Vice-Confull. The Vice-Pretor, with the helpe of a lieutenant or legat, did justice, and had jurisdiction over all Lusitania, from the river of Betis vnto Duero: the other part, being Taracconese, did obey the Vice-Confull, who had a great armie entertained with three lieutenants; the one commaunded the Cantabrians, Asturians, and the countrey of Gallicia; the other governed along the Mediterranean sea; and the third had charge of the inner countries. The Generals place of residence was at Carthage, or Tarracone. The emperours which came after, made first two, and then one Gouvernour of Spaine, and not alwayes of one sort. About the time of Maximinian and Dioclesian, the Gouvernours were called Earles, and their lieutenants Vicars: and when as the Gothes began to erect a kingdome, that small portion which held for the Romanes, along the shore of the province of Carthage, and the mountaines of the Cantabrians and Asturians, were governed by Dukes, whom they called Præfetti.

Octavius Caesar, surnamed Augustus, had held the empire about two and fortie yeares, when our Sauour Iesus Christ the eternall sonne of God, was borne God and man, of the virgine Marie.

The first yere of Christ,
752 of Rome.

Marie, of the tribe of Iuda, in the citie of Beth-leem of Iuda, which was in the yere 757 of the foundation of Rome. The night when as the Lord of peace came vpon the earth, was (as some write) as bright and cleere in Spaine, as the noone day. The computation of times shall hereafter be taken from the birth of our Sauour in the 16 yere of whose life Augustus died. Then Sextilius Henna, a Poet of Cordoua, flourished in Spaine, being now brought wholly to the manners of the Romans.

21 The Spaniards being much affected to Augustus, did obtaine of C. Tiberius Nero, his successour, leave to build a goodly temple in honour of him, in the towne of Tarracone. This emperor kept the Gallicians, Asturians, and Cantabrians vnder, with strong garisons, having beene formerly subdued by Augustus. In his time they of Lisbonne gaue it out, That they had seene and heard Triton in certaine hollow rockes, singing and playing vpon a cornet, as they painted him: And Plinius reports, that vpon the sea shore a Nereide had beene seene covered with scales, yea whereas she carried a humane shape; and that they had heard the grones and complaints she made dying. Vnder Tiberius, Vibius Sereus Proconfull of the further Spaine, accused by his owne sonne, and conuicted, was condemned as a tyrant, and banished into the island Amorgos, one of the Cyclades. Iunius Gallio, brother to Seneca the Senator, was also banished, for that he had propounded in Senat, to honour the old souldiours which had beene dismissed, with higher seats in the Theatre, and at publike shewes; hauing not first spoken thereof vnto the emperor Tiberius. The Spanish flatterers, doing idolatrie vnto princes, would also haue made a temple vnto Tiberius and to his mother, the which was prohibited; Tiberius saying, That he was a man and no god, demanding no other thing of them, but that they would retaine a good and commendable memorie of him after his death.

The six and twentieth yere of our saluation, L. Piso, a great oppressor of the people, was slaine in the hither Spaine, where he was Pretor, by a peasant of Termes, who being taken and tortured, would neuer confesse who had made him to commit this murder. This man slipping out of the officers hands which led him to the racke againe, beat his own head so violently against a stone, as instantly he lost both fence and life. In those times one of the richest men of Spaine, called Sextus Calarius, was accused, to haue accompanied with his owne daughter carnally: for the which he was cast downe headlong from the rocke Tarpeien: but his great wealth was the cause of his death, more than his crime.

Tiberius had reigned seuentene yeares, when as our Sauour Iesus Christ suffered death for the redemption of mankind, hauing finished the three and thirtieth yere of his life.

22 The healthfull doctrine of our redemption by him, was during the empire of Tiberius knowne in Spaine, as some hold: but it is doubtfull who was the Apostle. We read in the Epistles of Saint Paul, that he had a desire to go thither, but it is not certaine that he performed that voyage, although that Epiphanius and others do beleue it. The Spaniards affirme, That Saint James the sonne of Zebedee, came thither to preach the Gospell in the seuen and thirtieth yere, and that he onely conuerted nine persons: Others, as Pope Calixtus, write, That he had many Disciples, but that he had twelve speciall ones, nine whereof hee conuerted in Galicia. Others affirme, That when he preached at Saragosse, hee dedicated to the virgin Marie, the temple which is at this day called Nuestra Señora del pillar: and that hauing left two of his Disciples in Spaine, he returned into Iudea. Wee comprehend by the holy writ, that this holy Apostle liued almost all his life in Ierusalem, and thereabouts: and wee know, that Herodes caused his head to be cut off, in the third yere of the empire of Claudius.

The nine and thirtieth yere of our saluation, as some authors write, Herodes and Herodias (the which incited her incestuous husband, to cut off Saint Iohn Baptists head) retired themselves into Spaine: who (being spoiled of all their goods and dignities, by C. Caligula) dyed there for sorrow. Caligula was slaine by Cherea and other conspirators: But before them Emilius Regula of Cordoua, hauing attempted his death, was preuented and executed. This yere M. Anneus Lucanus the Poet, was borne at Cordoua, whose father was Luc. Anneus Mela, brother to Seneca the Philosopher: his mother was called C. Atilia, daughter to Atilius Lucanus the Orator. This child being but eight moneths old, was carried to Rome.

23 We haue said, That Saint James the sonne of Zebedee was beheaded in Ierusalem by Herods commandement, in the third yere of the emperor Claudius. The Spaniards and other authors write, That his Disciples gathering vp his bodie and head, imbarqued it at Ioppa,

A pa, and carried it into Spaine, for feare of the Iewes; and that they landed at a place called Iria Flauia, now said Padron, where they buried it in a secret place, where since it was discouered, and carried to Compostella. In Claudius time liued Pomponius Aetela, borne at Mellaria, and Taranus Graccula. Anneus Seneca of Cordoua, banished by Claudius, was in fauour of Agrippina (whom the Emperour had newly married) called home againe, made Pretor at Rome, and appointed schoolemaster and gouernor to Nero. This Seneca was a famous Orator and Philosopher, as it appears by his workes, highly honoured for his great memorie, and auditor to Socion the Philosopher: L. Anneus Seneca the tragical Poet was his sonne. Then did also flourish Portius Latro, a Spaniard, an excellent Orator. Vnder the Emperour Claudius there gouerned Spaine, on this side Ebro, Drusillus Rotundus his Libertine, with the title of Dispenfer, and Vmbonius Silio ruled Betica.

In those times, as Buter sayes, S. Saturnin was sent into Spaine, he who was afterwards Bishop of Tolouise, and preached at Pampelone, where in seuen daies he conuerted fortie thousand persons; a great number for that place: among the which was S. Fremin, a citizen of Pampelone.

In the yere 61 of the natiuitie of Christ, Otho (who was Emperour after Galba) was sent by Nero into Lustania: which prouince hee gouerned tenne yeares modestly, and without oppression of the people; the which was strange, considering the disposition of Spaine, the man.

C In the yere 64 Lucan the Poet, a confederat of Pisos conspiracie, caused his veins to be opened, and died in the 28 yere of his age. His father Mela pressing Nero with great importunity, for the restitution of his sonnes goods, was accused as guiltie of the same treason, and forced to haue his veins opened, and so die. Seneca was brought to the same death by his disciple Nero, against the promises which he had so often made and sworne, not to giue care to his accusers, nor to hurt him in any sort: Seeing the blood comelously out of his veins, he hastened his owne death, with poyson taken in a hot bath, the 114 yere of his age, or according vnto some, the 120. Paulina his chaste wife, and a rare president of loue to her husband, caused her veins to bee opened, to follow him: but whether through womanish weakness, or that Nero hindered it, he suffered them to be bound vp. L. Iunius Modestinus Columella liued also in those times, the author of the bookes of Husbandrie, borne in Gades.

In the yere 70, which was the last of the life of Nero, Silius Italicus was Confull at Rome, being borne in Italica, a towne in the prouince of Betica, not farre from Seuille: and at that time Clauius Rufus was in Spaine with some command. The abominable disposition of Nero made the Spaniards and many other nations to rebell against the Romane Empire, a little before his death; for the suppressing of whom, he sent Sergius Galba: but this old man (who had before time gouerned the prouince of Tarraconese eight yeares) hauing discouered, and that Nero had giuen a secret Commission to kill him, he declared himselfe Emperour, and in stead of a iudge, became head and captain of the rebellion; whereunto both the Prouince and the Romane armie did consent: but his Empire lasted not long, nor of his two successors, Otho and Vitellius: for in lesse than two yeares they lost both their liues and the Empire; one defeating another, to make place for Vespasian, who came vnto the imperiall feat in the 75 yere of the Natiuitie of our Sauour Christ, and graunted vnto the Spaniards the priuiledges of the Latines, which were, That they might demand offices, and enjoy some immunities, but not so amply as the citizens of Rome, yet somewhat more than the liberties of other cities of Italie. Otho was the first which joynd Mauritania Tingitania vnto Betica in Spaine, making it of the iurisdiction of Gades. At that time liued Bellile, a Spanish Christian woman. Fabius Quintilian had beene brought vnto the citie of Rome verie young by Sergius Galba: about the 90 yere he erected a schoole at Rome, with a publike pension, and had manie schollers; among the which, they name Iuuenal and the younger Plinie: As for Iuuenal, they doubt whether he were a Spaniard, but Martial without all question was borne, and died at Bilbilis, seated neere vnto the place where as now stands Calataud or Calataub, of the name of Amb a Moore, who built it with the ruines of Bilbilis. Canius a Poet, who liued also in that age, was a Gaditane, and Decian of Emerita.

After Vespasian, his children reigned at Rome. Titus in the year 81, and two years after Domitian, the second course of the Church of God, in whose time lived Eugenius, the first bishop of Toledo, Disciple, as they say, to Denis Arcopagita. This Eugenius was slain at Paris, whither he was come to visit his master. Of the Flavian familie, from whence these emperours were issued, there remained some markes and remembrances in Spaine, by the denomination of many townes, as Flauio Brigo, Flauium Brigantium, Iria Flauia, Flauium Axatantum, Aqua Flauia in Galicia, &c.

A diuision of the government of Spaine,

Domitian did prohibit by a new edict, That they should not plant any more vines in Spaine, fearing least come should faile them. Vnder these Flavian emperours they number eight Romane Colonies, planted in the prouince of Betica: and foure places for iustice, which they termed Colonels, at Gades, Seuille, Aftigis, and Cordoua.

Lusitania had five Romane Colonies, one priuiledged citie called Olisippo, and now Lisbon, and three seats of iustice at Emerita, Pax Augusta, and Scalabis. In the rest of Spaine which was the quiettest gouernment, there were fourteene Romane Colonies, thirteene priuiledged townes, and ieuon courts for iustice. Traian a Spaniard the third persecutor of the church,

Cocceius Nerva came vnto the Empire in the year 97, a prince who seemed to be called by God, to repaire the confusion which Domitian had caused in the world, vnder whom the Christians had some rest. The Spaniards will haue him to be of their nation, but it appears not plainly. But he adopted Vlpium Traian a Spaniard without all doubt, borne in the towne of Italica, who through error caused the third perfection of the Church, whereof being admonished by Plinius Secundus, he moderated his edicts. Mancius a citizen of Rome in this tempest suffered death for the confession of the Christian faith at Ebora in Lusitania, vnder the government of Valerianus. By the liberalitie and bountie of Traian, Spaine was enriched with many goodly buildings, among the which is the bridge of Alcantara, vpon the riuer of Tayo, where at this day are to be seene these inscriptions following.

The bridge of

The aqueduct of Segobia, is also held to be Traians worke, where they may easily observe the stately manner of building of the Romanes. This emperor sent two legions (of fourteene, which were appointed to keepe the prouinces of the empire in awe) into Spaine, to put his edicts in execution, and to rafe all the townes and castles which were situated vpon the mountaines or places of strength: with commaundement to the people, to build in the open country, where the access was easie. Sublancia was ruined by vertue of this decree, and a towne built, which then was called Legio Germanica, or Gemina, according vnto some, but now it is Leon, a royall citie. Adrian, who was emperor after Traian, in the year of our Saviour 118, was also borne in the towne of Italica, in the prouince of Betica, as Eutropius, Orosius, and Ser. Sulpitius doe witnesse. Domitia Paulina his mother, was of Gades. He had some instruction, or good opinion of the Christian religion. Being at Tarracone (where he had called a generall assemblie of all the people of Spaine) he caused (at his owne charge) Augustus temple, which went to ruine, to be repaired. In which towne he was in danger to haue beene slaine by a slaue that was madde, who set vpon him with his sword drawne, as he walked without any feare in a garden. This slaue being taken, when as the emperor vnderstood that he was madde, he layd nothing, but that they must put him into the Physicians hands. Having subdued the Iewes which were rebelled in Palestina, he sent a great number in exile into Spaine, so as from that time this sect was settled there, & had their Synagogues, vntil the raigne of Dom Fernando and D. Isabella, in the time of our forefathers. Spaine was then diuided into six gouernments, two ruled by vice-Consuls appointed by the Senat, which were Betica and Lusitania; and foure by the emperours lieutenants, which were the prouinces of Carthage, Tarracone, Galicia, and Mauritania Tingitana, where the strait is.

After the decease of Adrian, there succeeded in the empire, in the year 139, T. Aurelius Fulvius Antonius Pius, whom the Spaniards hold to be of their nation. As for his successor M. Aurelius, comming to the empire in the year 162, he was without doubt of a Spaniard race; for his predecessors were of the towne of Succubite in Betica. Hee was the first which had a companion in the empire, imparting his authoritie with Lucius Commodus Verus, who was the fourth persecutor in the Christian Church. In the time of M. Aurelius, the Moors invaded Spaine, and did infinit harme: whom notwithstanding hee repulled by his lieutenants, namely by Seuerus, who afterwards was emperor. This prince was wise, vertuous, and courteous: but as he was indowed with all good qualities, so his sonne Commodus, who reigned after him in the year 181, was detestable and vicious. He was the first of the Romane princes, which through couetousnesse sold offices for money. Vespasian had done it before him, but through necessitie, finding the commonweale charged with debts, and the treasure exhausted. Vnder Commodus were slaine in Galicia, Facundus and Primitius, holy Christians fouldiours, vpon the banks of the riuer Cea, by Atticus the gouernor. After him, about the year 194, Rome lost two emperours in lesse than a year, Pertinax and Didius Iulian, so as in the year 195, L. Septimius Seuerus, a great personage, borne in Africke, he who had gouerned Spaine in the time of M. Aurelius, tooke the government of the empire. Vnder him was the first perfection of the Church, especially in Spaine, whereas Cornelius was gouernor, who put Felix a priest, Fortunatus, and Archilochus to death at Valence, for that they had preached the Gospell.

But Maximin being come to the empire, the sixth persecution began of the Christians, in the which Maximus and many other faithfull were slaine, neere vnto Tarracone. After Maximin vnto Decius, the empire of Rome was in great combustion, by reason of the ordinary murders of such as did affect the soueraintie, for the space of fifteen yeres, in the which there perished by a violent death, Maximin Balbinus, Puennus Gordian, and Philip: during which time we find not any thing of Spaine worth the writing, but that about the yere 241, Antherus bishop of Rome did write vnto the bishops of the provinces of Betica and Toledo, admonishing them among other things to be graue and constant, and not to flee from church to church, if necessitie and the publique good did not presse them: whereby it wil appeare by this history, that their successors had small regard vnto this aduertisement, but haue rather sought their priuat commoditie. Many other epistles of holy men are found written to the bishops of Spaine, and to their churches, & among others an epistle decretall of S. Ciprian and other bishops assembled at the Councell of Africk, by the which Basilides and Martialis, Idolaters and infected with many vices, were declared unworthy of all Episcopall dignities: and it seemes that the one was bishop of Legio Gemina, and the other of Emerita. Whilest that Decius gouerned the empire (vnder whom began the 7th persecution of the Church) the first Councell of Spaine was held at Toledo, whereas Xyste a Grecian was present, who soone after was bishop of Rome: yet there is no mention made of this Councell but by Spaniards. The Spanish histories write nothing of this time, nor of Galvus, Valerianus, nor Emilianus, which succeeded him. As for Valerian, who came to the empire in the yere 256, he was verie cruel against the Christians, and his persecution is accounted the eight. Vnder him and Decius, S. Laurence borne at Ofca in Catelogia, was martyred, whom Xyste, who (as we haue said) was come to the Councell of Toledo, had led with him to Rome, passing by Sarragossa, whereas this holy man spent his time in studie. Vnder the same Valerian, by the commandement of Emilian, the gouernor, there were also put to death for the faith of Christ, Fructuosus bishop of Tarracone, with Augurinus and Eulogia, two deacons, of whom Prudentius, a Christian Poet, did write hymnes. Parmentius was also put to death at Cordoua. Valerian author of these wicked persecutions, did soone after receiue a worthy reward for his impietie: for he was taken by Sapor king of Persia, and kept all his life time ignominiously in chains, the which it seemes did moue Galien his son and companion, to leaue the Churches in quiet, although he were the most corrupted prince vpon the earth; whose basenesse caused many tyrants to vsurpe the title of Soueraigne, in diuers provinces of the empire, and encouraged barbarous nations to invade them: for in his time Spaine was full of great troups of Germans, Saxons, and French, vnder the conduct of Anthaire and Lothaire, princes, who ruined Tarracone, and poyled the country, almost for the space of 12 yeres. To the former martyres we will adde Narcissus, who came to Girona to preach the Gospell.

30 After Galien, Claudius was emperor, vpon whom Tetricus vsurped Spaine and Gaule, being the chiefe strength and finewes of the empire. During the raigne of Aurelian (vnder whom was the ninth persecution of the Church) and of Tacitus and Florian, which were from the yere 273, vnto 280, there is no mention made of Spaine. But Probus gaue leaue to the Spaniards and Gaules, to plant vines: for good husbands held it not profitable for the common weale, that the land should be too much imployed to this kind of plant: but Probus was much affected to it, and therefore he caused the mountaines of Almus and Aureus in Hungarie and Myfia, to be planted at his owne charge. In his time the Spaniards did mutine, but Saturinus did pacifie them. One called Bonifus, borne and bred in Spaine, whose father was a Britan, and his mother a Gauloife, a great drinker, caused himselfe to be proclaimed emperor in Germanie, and with one Proculus would haue seized vpon Spaine, Gaule, and other prouin-

A prouinces: but they were defeated by Probus. The short empire of Carus Numerianus and Carinus, make no mention of any thing that belongs to Spaine. Dioclesianus Iouius, who succeeded them in the yere 288, & Maximianus Herculeius, made companion of the same dignity the yere after, haue left (by their great crueltie against the faithfull) an infamous memory of them, in Spain, & throughout all the world. They made an edict in the yere 306, That all the Christians temples should be beaten downe, and all those that confessed Iesus Christ, tormented and massacred. This was the 10th & the cruellest persecution of the Church of God: for during the space of 10 yeres, there was nothing to be seene but burning of temples, running away of poore innocents, murders, and executions of martyres, wherof Spaine (it may be) did furnish as many as any nation in the world, to their great commendation. The names of these constant witnesses of the truth of Christ, I should not be suppressed. In Sarragossa there were 13 at one time, of whom the Christian Poet Prudentius made a goodly hymne. These were Optatus, Successus, Yrhanus, Pubius, Felix, Euentius, Lupercus, Martialis, Iulius, Fronto, Cecilianus, Primitius, Quintilianus, Apodemius, and foure Saturnines. Encratia a noble virgine, daughter to a great nobleman of Lutrania, betrothed to a duke or gouernour of Gaule Narbonoife, did there also end this fugitive life. Dacian was then Gouernour of Spaine, and a diligent minister of these impieties; who residing at Sarragossa, and seeing the constancie of the Christians to surpasse his inhumanitie, he caused a proclamation to be made by the sound of the trumpet, that all those that were Christians should depart the towne, and haue leaue to retire where they pleased. The faithfull being joyfull hereof, went forth in great troups, thanking God for this libertie, thinking they would suffer them to depart: but they were not gone farre from the gates, before they were compassed in by armed fouldiours, and cut in peeces. The multitude of those that were thus villanously murdered, was verie great, and therefore in those dayes the Christians by a certaine humane affection, more than for any religion, made account of the ashes, bones, and all things which did belong vnto those holy martyres, and did reuerence the places where they had frequented, or were buried: not for any superstition, but to incite the liuing to imitate their pietie. This cruell Gouernour hauing committed this horrible massacre, sought also to deprime the faithful seruants (if any remained in the country) of all comfort: Wherefore hauing gathered all their bodies together, and murdered vpon them all the offenders, which were committed for any crimes, he burnt them all together, that the ashes (being thus mingled) should not be gathered vp by the Christians: wherupon the bruit was, That God (meaning to giue a testimonie of the innocencie of his people) made the ashes of the faithful to appeare verie white among the rest, the which, with a small shewer which fell, were gathered together in white heapes: wherof those which haue come after, being moued with another zeale than the Christians of those times, haue made their profit. Lambert serueng a country man, was also beheaded, for that he would not renounce Iesus Christ. The bruit was, That hauing taken his head in his hands, he went two good leagues, vntil he came vnto the place where the bodies of the martyres aboue mentioned lay, and that there he began to sing, Exultabunt sancti in gloria, and that they answered, Et letabuntur in cubilibus suis; and then he fell vpon them: the which I will not call into question, considering the end of myracles. There were many others put to death in Spaine, for the profession of the Gospell, during the gouernment of Dacian, whose names for breuities sake I omit, being not much pertinent to a historie. Dacian, a bloudie instrument of these cruelties, was during these executions slaine with fire from heauen. The like persecutions were in the other prouinces of the empire.

At this time liued Prudentius, borne in the prouince of Cantabria, of the country which is now called Alaba: he was bishop of Tarracone, and not the Poet aboue mentioned. There is a decretall epistle extant of Melchisedech bishop of Rome, who liued in those times, vnto the bishops of Spaine, touching the Primacie of the Romane Sea: but it fauours not of the Latine stile of that age, no more than those of Marcelin, Marcellus, Eusebius, Syluester, Marce, Iulius, Liberius, Damasus, and Syriscus: which must bee read with iudgement. As for the politike Artes of Dioclesian and Maximian, although they were great, and worthe of memorie, yet the histories of Spaine make no mention of them. They receiued into their companie to gouerne the empire, Maximus Galerius, and Constantius Chlorus: the last in a good time tooke vpon him the gouernment of Spaine and Gaule, who dying in England, left the dignitie of Cesar to Constantine his sonne, who leamed the first principles of religion, of a certaine Spaniard, as some write. Galerius adopted Seuerus, and Maximian the young. At the same time Dioclesian and Maximian resigned the imperiall dignitie at Milan: but Maximian repenting himselfe, as he did strive to resume his authoritie at Rome, being rejected by his sonne Maxence and the Pretorian souldiours, he fled towards his son in law Constantine, against whom he practised treason, and was slaine at Marcellus. Dioclesian a strange monster, who caused himselfe to be called, Brother to the Sunne and Moone, and to bee worshipped, lived long a priuie life: but God shewed a testimonie of his wrath vpon him in the end of his dayes; for he died madde, eaten with vermine, and so infected and sinking, as none could endure to come neere him, howling (as Nicophorus writes) like a dog. Galerius likewise himselfe, as cruell as a butcher; for he had bene from his youth. Seuerus was slaine by the faction of Maxence, whom the Pretorians had created Cesar. Maximian the younger died eaten with wormes, having bene vanquished neere vnto Tharfe, by Licinius, whom Constantine had sent against him. Maxence, a cruel tyrant, and therefore hated of the Romans, as he thought to make head against Constantine, was defeated in battel neere vnto Rome, and drowned himself in the riuer of Tiber: all cruell and bloudie princes, enemies to the Church of God, remarkable for such as persecute it. After these, Licinius and Constantine held the empire, the one in the East, the other in the West. But Licinius who had married Constantine's sister, a cruell and barbarous man, an enemy to Christians and all learning, tearing them a plague to the commonweale, hauing no good thing in him, but that he persecuted the courtians, whom he feared, sought to breake the order made betwixt him and Constantine: wherefore after that he had bene suppressed aboue once, and reconciled to his brother in law, by the meanes of his wife Constance, he was slaine by his commandement at Thessalonica; so as Constantine called the Great, remained sole emperor, who gave peace vnto the Churches, much desired, and (if they could haue vsed it to the aduancement thereof) most happy. This prince did great honour vnto the Christians, embraced the true religion, endowed the churches with rents and riches, caused the Gentiles temples to be beaten downe in many places, assembled by his imperiall authoritie the Councell of Nice in Bithinia, in the year 326, or 328, where there met 318 bishops of diuers countries; among the which was Osius bishop of Cordoua, who was also at the Councell of Gangre, celebrated the same year. That of Nice is held the first generall Councell, where the impietie of the Arians was condemned, the which notwithstanding did afterwards infect many nations. That Constantine made a donation of the cite of Rome, of Italie, and of all the Westerne empire, vnto Siluester then bishop of Rome, or that he had declared him head and primar ouer other bishops, and granted vnto him and his successors, other things contained in that which is called Constantine's donation, besides, that Pope Pius the second doth yeast at it, there is no receiuable testimonie therof, nor any probable coniecture: besides, the histories of following emperors, do argue the contrarie, euen they of the West. In the time of this emperor the Northerne nations muaded Spaine, and spoiled that part of the countrey which lies neere the Ocean, from Galicia vnto the strait: whither he led a great army, chased away the enemies, & restored the Spaniards (which were fled into mountaines) vnto their houses, and settled an order in the prouince, as well for that which concerned the temporalltie, as the churches. There was a prouinciall Councell held by his commandement at Illiberis, at the foot of the Pyrenees, some call it Eliberis, a towne in the marches of Grenado: whither came Helena the mother of Constantine, with Constantine his eldest sonne, to whom he had assigned the Gauls and Spaine, for his portion. In this Councell Spaine was diuided into five prouinces; that is, that of Tarracone, Carthage, Betica, Lusitania, and Galicia, in either of the which there was a Metropolitan appointed at Tarracone, new Carthage (to whom Toledo hath since succeeded) at Seuille, at Merida, and at Bracara. Some hold, that this Councell was more ancient than that of Nice, among which Bentley affirms, That Constantine bishop of Cordoua, Osius predecessor, was there present: others say, that it was Osius himselfe, & Quintian bishop of Ebora. Some beleue that the emperor Constantine was not baptized vntill he drew neer his death, being deceived by the error of some, which beleued that the circumstance of places gaue more authority to baptism: for he had a great desire to be baptized in Iordan. Many thought, that in the end of his daies he fel into the heresie of the Arians, for that he had banished Athanasius by the persuation of the Arians, & that his sister Constance

A living with him was an Arrian: but it is most certaine, that before his death he commanded that Athanasius (should be called home againe, and that he did not beleue the confession of faith, nor the exposition made by Arrius, after that he had called him from banishment, but sent it to the Councell of Ierusalem, there to be examined. Of Constantine's deeds in Spaine there are many medaillies found in that countrey, and elsewhere, in our time, that beare witness. After him there reigned in the West Constantine and Constantius, his sonnes, the East remaining to Constantius their brother. To Constantine was assigned Spaine, Gaule, and the islands of Britaine, or that which the Romans held there. But Constantine being a proud and turbulent prince, he would make warre against his brother Constantius, and take Italie from him: in which enterprise he was slaine neere vnto Aquileia, in the 25 year of his age: wherefore all the prouinces of his portion fell vnto Constantius: in whose time the Poet Aurelius Prudentius Clement was borne at Sarragossa, or rather at Calaoorra: Pacian bishop of Barcellona flourished in doctrine and good life.

The peale of Arrius, granted by Constantine the great, had caused greater troubles in the Church than before: for being returned into Alexandria, he had confirmed his doctrine, and drawne many bishops vnto him; yea the emperor Constantius, who held the empire in the East, was infected with this error, and did persecute the faithfull beleueers: so as Athanasius being banished againe by him, and Paul of Constantinople, who retired to Constantius his brother, they wrought so, as by the consent of the two brethren princes, a generall Councell was called at Sardica, a towne in Illiria; whither came two hundred and fiftie bishops, among the which was Osius bishop of Cordoua, who was then verie old, Ammianus of Calculo, Cosius of Sarragossa, Domitian of Augusta (that is to say, Bracar) Florentine of Emerita, and Pretextatus bishop of Barcellona. There the confession of the faith, or Symbole of the Councell of Nice, was confirmed: But at the same time by reason of the bad agreement which was betwixt the two brethren Constantius and Constantine, there was another assemblie of the Eastern bishops at Philipopolis in Thracia, who agreed not with any that held with Athanasius and Paul. And after that there was another held at Syrmium in Hungarie (whither Constantius went in person) and others elsewhere. The Councell of Sardica being ended, Constantius entreated his brother Constantine, to restore Athanasius: the which he did, partly for loue, and partly for feare of warre: But Constantius being dead, Athanasius was forced to saue himselfe by flight, being accused to haue perswaded Constantius to make warre against his brother for his sake: and then the Arrian bishops began to persecute them that made profession of Athanasius his doctrine, more cruelly than the Dioclesians or Maximians. The Councell of Syrmium, contrarie to that of Nice, was held in the year three hundred and threescore, or three hundred fiftie and six, according vnto some, whereas many wicked decrees were made and maintained, especially by Photinus, bishop of that place, who reuined the blasphemies of Samoatenus, denying the two natures in Iesus Christ, borne of the virgine Mary.

This Councell, to suppress all controuersies, would disguise the tearme and manner of speaking, received in the Church; and in stead of saying, That Iesus Christ was consubstantiall with the Father, or of the same essence, they propounded the tearme of Like in essence: Which two words in the Greeke tongue, doe somewhat symbolize, homoiousios, and homoiousios. By this disguising, vnder which the poison lay hidden, the good old man Osius the Spaniard, hauing constantly maintained the truth all his life time, suffered himselfe to be deceived and wooen: whether that his great age had dulled his vnderstanding, or that he did it for feare of the emperor, who examined him vpon that point, and threatened him in the towne of Rimini, where hee had againe assembled many bishops, causing him to commit this error; saying, That both the one and the other said well. But the Orthodoxes did soone after reject that word of homoiousios, as captious and deceitfull. Osius, as Isidore writes, dyed soone after in his impietie, stricken with the hand of God, in his bishopricke: and that being brought to Cordoua, Gregorie bishop of Illiberis, according to the Edict made by Constantius the emperor, against the Christians, to force them to the Arians opinion, he refusing to yeld vnto it, Osius prest Clementine Gouernour of the prouince, to banish him: but he answered, That he could not banish a bishop before he was deposed from his bishopricke, and judged incapable. Whereupon Osius richly attyred like a king, meaning to giue sentence against Gregorie, who lay prostrate vpon the earth, praying vnto God, that he would maintaine the glorie of his G name, and his truth, against all Apostats: the which he demanded earnestly, not to saue his life, the which he was ready to loote a thousand times for the confession of the faith, but to the end the simple should not be abused with the deceits of the Apostat Ofius. Whereupon it happened, that as Ofius was ready to pronounce sentence against Gregorie, he fenne downe to the ground, hauing his mouth and necke drawne on the one side, and fo dyed. The Gouvernor amazed at this strange accident, kneeling downe, asked Gregorie forgiuenesse, confessing his ignorance, and exculing it vpon the commaundement of the emperor his prince. These things are written by Ildorus: but S. Augustine giues a better testimonie of Ofius, writing against Parmenian.

In the year of our redemption 369, there came vnto the bishopricke of Rome, which was not yet soueraigne, Damasus a Spaniard, borne at Vimaranes, a place in Portugall, betwixt Minio and Duero, three leagues from Braga: he succeeded Felix, who was an Arrian, and therefore not numbered in the catalogue of the Bishops of Rome; for that they would make this sea without all blemish. Among his other qualities, they say, he was a good Poet: Saint Ierome was his Secretarie. During the time of Constantines children, Iuuenius, a Spaniard priest, and Poet, liued. Constantinus the emperor was already dead, with Julian and Iouinian his successours, of whom Spaine hath nothing to speake. And then did Valentinian raigne in the West, and Valens in the East. Under Valens the Gothes chased by the Dacians, invaded the Roman empire, whereas at the first they were received in peace: but the couetousnesse and wickednesse of Governours made them take armes, so as there grew a sharp warre, in the which the emperor Valens himselfe was slaine. This nation did erect a kingdome in Spaine, whose race, according to the common opinion, hath continued vnto this day. The emperor Valens was addicted to the Arrian heresie, to Negromancie, and other impieties. We read, that being carefull who should succeed him in the empire, he was deceived by the enemy of mankind, a murdurer from the beginning, who shewed him the letters of E. O. A. and persuaded him, that his name that should hold the empire after him, should begin with them: Whereof the emperor growing jealous, he cauled all the Theodores, Theodoses, Theophiles, and others, whose names were compounded of Theos, to be slaine. But Theodosius, who succeeded him, a Spaniard borne, fell not into his hands. Hee was adopted by Gratian in the year three hundred fourescore and two, or fourescore and three, according to some, and raigned after him in the East, Valentinian the second brother to Gratian holding the Westerne empire. His father was called Theodosius, and his mother Thermantia, and descended from the race of Traian. During his empire, there came out of Italie into Spaine, Paulin the Poet, a great friend to Aufonius, who became a monke, and liued a solitarie life. At the same time Priscilian bishop of Auila, published his heresie, mingled with the impieties of the Manicheans and Gnostiques, the which was condemned in a Councell held at Bourdeaux, some time after. He was a sectarie to one Marke, a Disciple to Basilides, who during the empire of the Antonines had brought this heresie into Spaine, where it was received and fauoured by a great ladie called Agape, and drew to his opinions Helpidius a Rhetorician; so as this mischief lay smothered for a time, vntill that Priscilian did publish it: a man issued from a noble familie in Gallicia, eloquent and subtile. The fourth year of Theodosius empire, which was in the year three hundred fourescore and fix, or fourescore and seuen, there died at Constantinople in Theodosius his court, Athanasius king of the Gothes, who was become a friend and allie to the Romanes. Ildorus affirmes, That the year following the Gothes, being impatient of the Roman yoke, did chuse Alaric for their king. Others hold, that it was 14 yeares after, whereof we will intreat at large in the next booke.

In the year 388 Priscilian hauing bene condemned in the Councell of Bourdeaux, he retired to Treues, to a tyrant called Maximin, some call him Clemens Maximus: who hauing M caused Eudodius his constable to hear him, he cut off his head, and of other his sectaries, among the which was Matronianus a Spaniard, an excellent Poet. Ithacius and Visigatus, Bishops, were accusers, and parties against Priscilian, by reason whereof they were excommunicated and banished. Sigebert saith, That it was taken ill, when as by the accusation of any man a Bishop was put to death. For one hereticke, author of a sect in Spaine, there liued in those times many religious and learned men; as Lucinius, Betius, Abigant, Abundius, Anitus,

A Anitus, Olympus, Audentius, Vigilantius, who although he were a Gaule, yet he did reside at Barcelona; against whom S. Ierome did write very vehemently, for that hee did condemne the superfluous honour done vnto the reliques. Theodosius hauing in the year 387 made his sonne Arcadius, Cæsar; tenne yeares after he aduanced Honorius his other sonne to the same dignitie, who after his decaise were Emperours, Arcadius in the East, and Honorius in the West, by the death of Valentinian the second, and of Eugenius the tyrant: these two princes were borne in Spaine, as the Poet Claudian writes. In their time the Gothes began to disperse themselves ouer the West, where they committed infinit spoiles, vntill in the end they seized themselves in Gaule, Spaine, and lastly in Italie, blemishing the name and maiestie of the Emperours in their rich Prouinces.

For one hereticke, author of a sect in Spaine, there liued in those times many religious and learned men; as Lucinus, Beticus, Abigaus, Abundius, Anitus,

A. Anitus, Olympus, Audentius, Vigilantius, who although he were a Gaule, yet he did reside at Barcelona; against whom S. Ierome did write very vehemently, for that hee did condemne the superfluous honour done vnto the reliques. Theodosius hauing in the year 387 made his sonne Arcadius, Cæsar; tenne years after he aduanced Honorius his other sonne to the same dignitie, who after his decease were Emperours, Arcadius in the East, and Honorius in the West, by the death of Valentinian the second, and of Eugenius the tyrant: these two princes were borne in Spaine, as the Poet Claudian writes. In their time the Gothes began to disperse themselves ouer the West, where they committed infinit spoyles, vntill in the end they seized themselves in Gaule, Spaine, and lastly in Italie, blemishing the name and maiestie of the Emperours in these rich Provinces.

The Gotthes
come out of Asia
into Europe.

BEing to treat of the Gotthes kingdome in Spaine, it is fit to know from what region they are come, and by what accidents they first feated themselves in Spaine, Honorius sonne to Theodosius the Great then reigning in the West.

Gotthes, Gotes, & Gepides, all one nation.

The Gotthes are issued from the Getes, and their first beginning was in Asia: they passed into Europe long before, and did first seize vpon the higher countrey of Thrace and Myfia, which is at this day Bulgaria, Bosnia, Rascia, Seruia, and it may be, a part of Hungarie; and in the end they came to either banke of the river of Danube: and then by degrees peopling all that lyes betwixt that river and the Northerne shore of the Baltike sea, they did in the end hold all that continent, which extends it selfe in manner of an island in the bosome thereof, with all the neighbour islands. They were famous for a long time in Dacia, in those regions which wee now call Valachia, Transyluania, and Moldavia, where they were called Getes and Gepides. In the times of Alexander the Great there were certaine encounters betwixt the Grecians and the Gotthes, not farre from the island of Peuce, aboue Constantinople, at the mouths of Danube, or Ister, as they called it in that place. Syrmius reigned ouer that nation at that time. We read also, That Iysmachus, one of Alexanders successors, was vanquished in battaile, and taken by a king of the Gotthes, whom hee afterwards set freely at libertie, and married his daughter. After which, in tract of time other nations being mingled with them, those which did inhabit the great Peninsule, which the auncients called Scandia and Scandinavia (yet little knowne to them) retained the name of Gotthes and the language; the which, as some affirme, was like vnto that of the Celtes: others hold, That it was the Teuton or Dutch tongue: which languages being corrupted, differ much at this day from those times, when they were in their greatest puritie. From these Northerne regions, which containe at this day the realmes of Suetland and Denmarke, often and vpon diuers occasions there came great troupes of people, who tooke possession againe of the countreies joyning to the Venetique or Baltike sea, and of the islands thereof, chasing away the inhabitants, and aduancing into the maine land, they did repofesse Dacia and Myfia, and ouerun the higher Thrace, vnder Fithmer, sonne to Ganderic, who was the fift king after this returne. In these countreies they planted their bounds vpon the Danube, and there reigned some ages: they did encrease their fame with great victories, and did giue their name to many nations whom they subiected. They invaded the Ro-

A mane Empire in the time of Decius, vnder the conduct of their king Grua, and did vanquish the Romanes in a great battaile, whereas Decius and his sonne were slaine: after which, by many victories they made themselves fearefull to the Romanes, so as the Emperours were often glad to haue them for friends and companions in arms; and by the vertue and valor of their troupes, which they entertained, did often execute great matters.

About the time of Valentinian and Valens, Hermanaric reigned ouer the Gotthes, who vanquished many nations: who notwithstanding yielded to the force of the Hunnes, fathers to the Hungarians, who came at that time out of Asia into Europe, in great numbers, through the fennes of Meotides. Hermanaric being dead, and Vithimir his successeor slaine in battaile, the Gotthes estate was ouerthrowne, and troden vnder foot by the Hunnes: wherefore such as would not liue vnder the Conquerors subjection, retired themselves into diuers other countreies. Athanaric, who had shewed himselfe an enemy to Valens, in supporting Procopius his rebell, would not trust him, and therefore he tooke his course towards the North, and did inhabit with his troupes in the forrests of Sarmatia. But Fritigerne and Alaun being followed with a great number of Gotthes, came vnto the bankes of Danube, vpon the confines of the Empire, where desiring to be admitted to dwell with the other subjects, Valens consented, supposing that they should serue as a rampier against forraigne nations, that would invade the empire on that side.

the East and West Gotthes.

Then there arriued vpon the same marches Vithieric, sonne to Vithimir, with his tutors Alatheus and Safrax, and also Farnabe, conductors of other great troupes. Then did the Romanes begin to distrust these people, into Ostrogoths or East Gotths, and Visigoths or West Gotths: calling those which did remaine vnder the domination of the Hunnes, Ostrogoths; and those Visigoths which had passed the Danube, and dwelt in Hungarie, Myfia, and Thracia: the which distinction was ancient among them, according to their countreies and abodes, and was againe practised in Italie, Gaule, and Spaine, when as this nation had crected kingdomes there; whereof the princes were diuided into two families or factions: that is, the Hunels or Amals, and the Baltes.

Christian religion
among the Gotthes.

The name of Iesus Christ had beene many yeares preached among this nation, before the Emperour Valens time: for we read, That at the Councell of Nice, which was vnder Constantine the Great, among others, there came Theophilus a Bishop of the Gotthes: wherefore they were already Christians and Orthodoxes, although there were some idolatrous princes among them, and by consequence, part of the people: so as when they came vpon the territories of the Empire, Valens reigning in the East, they had Bishops, whereof the most famous was Vulphilas.

The manner how they became Arrians, is reported by Theodorite, in the fourth booke of the Ecclesiasticall Historie, saying, That after the Gotthes had passed the river of Ister or Danube, and that they had made their peace with Valens, Eudoxus who was an Arrian, perswaded Valens, who was also infected with this heresie, to draw the Gotthes to his opinions, for that conformance in religion would make the peace more firme. Wherevith Valens hauing acquainted the princes & heads of the Gothike nation, they made answer, That they could not chage the doctrine of their ancestors. Then Eudoxus addressing himselfe to Vulphilas, whom he knew to be couetous and ambitious, he prevailed so with faire words & money, as he got him to perswade the Gotthes to receiue the Emperors confession of faith: the which he did, saying, That they were but childish contentions, and debates for words, and not for doctrine: for this Vulphilas was in great credit with the Gotths, and they say, that he inuented the Gothike letters, and translated the Bible into that tongue. Thus were these people governed by their Bishops and Prelates: they were a free people and courageous, and withall, tractable and apt to learning and Philosophie, the which they learned, frequenting with more ciuile nations: hardie and valiant, and yet familiar and liberal; apt to arms, tall and of a goodly stature, strong and patient to endure all the discomforts of warre.

Devotion of the Gothike nation.

This new nation being seated in the territories of the Empire, the Emperour was aduised to make his profit of them, and to draw money and other commodities from them for their dwellings, and for the vse of the land, water, and ayre which he graunted them: the which he could well put in practise, especially his gouernors & lieutenants, so as this nation found themselves in a short time oppressed with a harder seruitude vnder the Romane Empire, than their countreymen

treymen were vnder the Hunnes: For the Gothes being distressed for victuals, Lupicin and Maximus Gouvernours of Thrace, invented all the wicked devices they could to make them poore, and to strip them of that they had, making them to eat dogs and other beasts, for every one of which they were forced to give a man to be a slave. Besides Lupicin having caused Fritigerne and Alauin, captains of the Gothes, to come to Martianopolis, to conferre with them vpon the complaints which were made of these inhumanities, hee incensed them with proud and injurious words: so as having cunningly escaped out of his hands, they afterwards declared themselves enemies to the Romane Empire, so as there grew a great and cruell warre betwixt the Gothes and the Romanes, by the which the Emperour and his lieutenants were punished for their couetousnesse and impieties: Lupicin seeking to suppress the spoyle which the Goths made, was defeated, and in the end after many vnfortunat encounters betwixt both parties, the Emperour Valens having lost a battaile, where the best of his men died, he also lost his life, being burnt by the Gothes in a country house, into the which he was retired wounded, after the losse of the battaile: and without the valour and wisdom of Theodosius (whom God raised vp to succeed Valens in the East) the Gothes had rooted out the name of the Romanes in that country. But Theodosius a Spaniard, a wife and vertuous prince, did suppress them, and afterwards made a peace with them: so as after the death of Fritigerne, his successor Althamarie, a friend and well affected to the Romane Empire, died in Theodosius court: after which, the Gothes remained 14 years quietly vnder the Romane Emperours, without any king of their nation, vntill that Alarie, one of their captives, who had served Theodosius in his warres against Eugenius the tyrant, rebelled, and put the Gothes in armes, Arcadius and Honorius, sonnes to Theodosius, sitting in the imperial seat.

3 The Gothes disdain to be any more subject to the Romanes, and meaning to chuse a king of their owne, there grew a sedition and warre among themselves; some desiring Alarie, others Radagase: but Alarie had the foueraigntie. Wherefore Radagase with aboute two hundred thousand of that nation went into Italie, whilst that Alarie oppressed Hungarie; against whom Stilico, who gouerned the Westerne Empire vnder Honorius, opposed himselfe: and finding this armie of Gothes shut vp in the Appennine hills, bordering vpon Tuscane, it was consumed with hunger and pouertie: their leader Radagase was taken and strangled, and those which remained, were sold in great troupes, for slaves, at a small rate. This Radagase was an idolatrer, and would haue planted idolatrie againe in Italie. It was at such a season, when as the Romane Empire was in greatest combustion, especially in the West: for besides the inuasion of the Gothes in Italie, the Frenchmen, a people of Germanie, bordering vpon Gaule, sought to make a breach there, and entred in great troupes vpon the countrey adjoining vpon the riuer of Rhene: against whom, Stilico (who was a Henete or Sclauonian borne) meaning to fortifie himselfe with barbarous nations called into Gaule the Bourguignons, Sueues, Alanes, and Vandales, nations which were chased out of their countries; on the one side by the Hunnes, and on the other by the Gothes: who afterwards raged and spoiled Gaule themselves, and would haue seized thereon; for the which they had many encounters with the Emperours Lieutenants, with variable successe. Great was the vertue and valour then of Constantius Patricius, who gouerned Gaule Narbonoise, the which wee now call by the name of Prouence and Languedoc, by whom the Vandales were repulled, and forced to passe into Spaine; where for a time they did ouerrun the countrey, and being afterwards followed by the Alanes and Sueues, they sought to settle themselves there. Gunderic reigned ouer the Vandales, Hermeric ouer the Sueues, and the Alanes were commaunded by Resplandian or Atee, according vnto some. These diuided Spaine betwixt them: so as the Alanes should make warre in the countrey of Carthagene, and in part of Portugall or Lusitania, as it was then called: part of the Vandales, called Silinges, should conquer Betica, called since Andalusia: and the other Vandales, with the Sueues, should settle in Galicia.

4 After the defeat of Radagase, Alarie marched into Italie with a great armie, and demanded to diuide the Empire with Honorius; to whom by the counsell of Stilico, Honorius granted the possession of Gaule and Spaine, who were also in prey to the French and other nations. Alarie and the Gothes marching towards the Alpes, doubting no surprize, were charged by an armie which Stilico had sent after them, to keepe them from spoyleing Italie, into Italie.

A Italie, vnder the commaund of a Jew called Saul, who had a secret commaundement to see vpon the Gothes armie, when they should be most busied in the straits of the mountaines; the which hee could not put in execution: for the Gothes seeing themselves betrayed, gathered their forces together, and put themselves in battaile as well as they could, defending themselves so valiantly, as the imperiall armie was defeated: wherefore Alarie being victor, and full of a furious desire of reuenge, leauing the way to Gaule, he turned backe, and did miserably spoyle the countries, which were since called Lumbardie, Tuscane, and Romania, putting all to fire and sword, euen to the gates of Rome; the which he tooke after a long siege, and sacked it, pardoning the holy places, and those that were fled into them. From thence hee did ouerrun Italie, euen vnto the furthest bounds: then returning towards Rome, hee died suddenly neere vnto Cosence, and was buried in the riuer of Barlette, turned out of her course for that cause, and afterwards drawne againe into her old bed by the Gothes: who after his death made choice of Ataulphe, his cousin, for their king, being a very wise man. Having brought backe the armie to Rome, he spoiled all that remained of the first sacke: yet he was somewhat pacified by the loue of Placidia Galla, sister to the Emperour Honorius, being prisoner whom by reason of her nobilitie and beaurtie, he married at Forly in Romania. From that time hauing some respect to Honorius, as his allie, he refused to leaue Italie, and take his way into Gaule, according to the first agreement betwixt Honorius and Alarie; where hee created the kingdom of the Visigothes, restrained the French within certaine limits, and helped to chase away the rest of the Vandales, Alanes, and Sueues, beyond the Pyrenees, where he afterwards pursued them.

A little before these accidents, one Constantine, of a simple souldior being growne capitaine of the Legions which were in great Britaine, hauing laine a tyrant who had seized vpon that island vnder the Roman Empire, called Gratian, had passed into Gaule, to vsurpe the imperiall title there, and from thence had sent Gouvernours into Spaine. But two noblemen Spaniards, Didimus and Seuerianus, or Verianus, or Perinianus (for this diuersitie is found in authors) rich and mightie men, opposed themselves: and seeking to preferre the prouince for the lawfull Emperour, they gathered some troupes together, of friends and subjects, and seized vpon the passages of the mountaines, to keepe these gouernours and their companies from D passing. Against these Spaniards, the tyrant sent a sonne of his called Constant, whom hee had drawne out of a Monasterie, and proclaimed him Cesar: who being followed by an armie of Barbarians, which he called Honoriaques, he defeated and slew the two brethren. These Honoriaques being masters of the straits and passages of the Pyrenees by this victorie, and hauing afterwards rebelled with their capitaine Gerontius, they (as some hold) deliuered Spaine to the Vandales, Alanes, and Sueues, after the death of the tyrant Constantine, and of his sonne Constant, whereof the one was taken at Arles, and the other dispatched at Vienna: These nations joyning together to rob and spoyle, Palantia, since called Palenza, was the first towne of Spaine, which fell in prey to these Barbarians, who besieged Toledo in vaine, ransomed Lisbon, and committed infinite spoyle, whilst that E Maximus, another tyrant, being rebelled against the Emperour, fought during these contributions to make himselfe king of Spaine of another side: who being taken by them that did yet reuerence the maiestie of the Romane Empire, he was deprived of his vsurped royalty, yet his life was saued.

Spaine for the space of two yeares was thus miserably oppressed, as well by tyrants as by these cruell nations: so as there remained nothing but the mountaines of the Cantabrians, at this present Biscaye and Nauarre, in the quiet possession of the Romanes, maintained by Constantius Patricius, who was the Emperours Lieutenant on this side the Alpes: which was at such time as the Vandales, Sueues, and Alanes made the diuision of Spaine. Then did Ataulphe passe into Spaine, to dispossesse them, according to the right hee had by an accord made with Honorius his brother in law: but as he was at Barcelona, he was slaine, with six children which hee had had by another wife than Placidia. The time and cause of his death are not reported alike. Iornandes sayth, That he was slaine (hauing reigned three yeares in Spaine and Gaule) being thrust into the flanke by Vernulphe, whom he was accustomed to jest at. Some affirme, That he had been chased, and forced to passe into Spaine by Constantius Patricius Gouvernour of Gaule.

The first Councell of Toledo.

Learned men in Spaine.

The Christian religion during these troubles and foraine inuasions was not neglected among the Spaniards: for in the year 402 (although others write 420) was held at Toledo the first Councell by 29 Bishops, where Patron Bishop of Toledo did preface against the heresie of Priscilian. He had bene Bishop of Auila, and had published an heresie mixt with the errors of the Gnostiques, Manicheans, and ancient Philosphers: among other opinions, he maintained, That the soule of man was a portion of the Diuinitie: he was condemned first at a Councell held at Bourdeaux, and from thence he appealed to Maximus the tyrant, who caused him to be heard at Treues; then he commanded his head to be cut off, with some of his followers. This Councell notwithstanding gaue place to a single life, and decreed, That priests should liue continually vnmarried. This decree was contradicted by Prigilantius, who lived then at Barcelona, who did also write against the abuse of reliques, against whom S. Ierosme was very bitter. Many learned men liued at that time in Spaine, as Lucinius, Abigaus, A. bundius, Auitus, Olympus, Audentius, Turbius, P. Orosius, and others: yet the Church was declined much from her ancient puritie, and then grew in request ceremonies, vowes, meritis, reliques, and miracles; for the clergie was then much infected with couetousnesse and ambition. Then came the Vandales and Gothes, who were all infected with the heresie of Ariian, who did in some sort persecute the good, as we shall heare.

Astaulphe being dead, the Gothes did chuse Sigeric for their king, who reigned but a year, and was slaine by his owne men, in disdain that he was too desirous of peace. He left many children, Giseric, Humeric, Guntermund, Trafamund, and Hilderic: yet Vallia succeeded him, to the end he should breake the peace with the Romanes: but God had otherwise decreed, for he confirmed it more. With him (according vnto some) begins the reigne of the Vice-Gothes in Spaine.

Vallia first King of the Gothes.

Ann. 418.

Vallia a friend to the Romanes, makes warre against the Barbarians in Spaine.

Alanes and Vandales defeated by the Gothes.

In the year of Christ 418 Vallia was chosen king of the Gothes, whereof next vnto Narbonne, Tolouse was the royall seat. In his time the French began to erect a kingdom in Gaule vnder Pharamond. Constantius Patricius, Gouverneur for the Emperour in Gaule and Spaine, was admitted by Honorius to the dignitie of Cesar, which in those dayes was a degree to attaine vnto the Empire, as in our time the dignitie of king of Romanes, during the life of the Emperour of Germanie. This Vallia shewed himselfe a friend and well affected to the Romane Empire. He restored Honorius Placidia his sister, widow to king Astaulphe, whom he had honoured, and kept in his house since the death of her husband. She was afterwards married to Constantius Cesar aboue mentioned, by whom she had Valentinian the third, who was the last Emperour in the West vntill Charlemaigne. Vallia vnderooke by a contract made with Constantius, to chase the barbarous nations of Vandales, Alanes, and Sueues, out of Spaine, to the benefit of the Romane Empire, and his owne: whereupon he entred into Spaine, being called by Constantius to begin this warre, in the year 420, and assailed the Alanes and Vandales, who held Betica and Lusitania, slew their king Atace, and reduced them to that extremitie, as those few which remained went and joined with Gunderic, who reigned ouer the other Vandales in Gallicia: the battaile wherein they were wholly defeated, was giuen neere vnto Emerita, the which is Merida in Portugall. These victories obtained, he meant to passe into Africke, but he was put backe by a storme, and therefore returned into Gaule, where hee purchased vnto the Gothes all the country from Tolouse to the Ocean, bounded in by the Pyrenee mountaines, and the riuer of Garonne.

Sometime after the Alanes, which were retired to Gunderic in Gallicia, shooke off his yoke, being loth to subiect themselves vnto him, and returned into Lusitania, Betica, and the prouince of Carthage, yet not chusing any prince over them: there they obtained certaine lands, and liued tributaries to the Romanes, dispersing themselves as farr as the riuer of Ebro, and to the foot of the Pyrenee mountaines, where some maintaine, that of their name the country of Cattologne was called Cattalania, for that they did inhabit there, being mingled with the Cattes, a nation of Germanie, which had passed with them into Spaine. In Gallicia (which contained at that time part of the realme of Portugall) there grew debate betwixt Gunderic king of the Vandales, and Hermeric king of the Sueues, fo

As they fell to armes, and the Sueues were besieged in the mountaines called Narbascens: where in Spaine between the Vandales and Sueues, but the Vandales left them there, despising that barren country, and came into the prouinces of Betica and Carthage, the which they foraged: then passing into the islands of Majorca and Minorca, they sackt them: returning into Spaine, they tooke and ruined Carthage, and brought backe their armie into Betica, the which was afterwards called Vandalusia, of their name: there they ruined the towne of Seuille, and made the country desolate. Gunderic died at the sacke of Seuille, vpon the threshold of S. Vincents temple, which he had commanded should be spoyle: he was sonne to Godigisique, after whose decease Giseric or Genserich his bastard brother was chosen king of the Vandales.

Vallia entred againe into Spaine, to suppress the spoyles and cruelties of these Vandales, whither there was also sent by the Emperour a captain called Castinus, who should ioyne with Boniface Gouverneur of Africke, and jointly make warre against the Barbarians. But as Castinus had nothing in him but vanitie and foolish presumption, he disdaind Boniface, who was a valiant and wise nobleman; against whom hee did also bandie Estius Gouverneur of Galles, either through emulation and enuie, or for some other cause of hatred: so as when Vallia came with his armie of Gothes to set vpon the Vandales, Boniface, who was retired into his gouernment of Africke, being incensed, sent messengers vnto Genserich, to sollicite him to passe the strait, promising to giue him means to lodge himselfe in Africke with all his men, in despite of the Emperour; the which fell out happily for him, being oppressed with many enemies: wherefore he left Spaine, but not without blood: for in a battaile which was giuen him by the people of Spaine, subjects to the Romanes, and by the Gothes, he slew twentie thousand of his enemies vpon the place at his departure. The Vandales being then passed into Africke with all their families, there remained not any forraigne power to make head in Spaine, but that of the Sueues, with their king Hermeric, who being fallen into a grieuous sicknesse, died about that time, after he had languished long. In the meane time Vallia incensed against the Vandales, prepared to pursue them into Africke, but he was preuented by death, hauing reigned 22 yeares.

2. Theodoric or Roderic.

Theodoric succeeded Vallia, Valentinian the third being Emperour in the West, in the year 440. Hermeric about a little before his death had so pacified the people of Gallicia, as he reigned ouer them, and of two nations he made one, taking his sonne Rechilan for companion, whom he made his heire and successor in the kingdom, and sent him into Betica or Vandalusia against Andenot, a Romane captaine, whom he defeated neere vnto Singil, a riuer vpon that continent, where he was much enriched. Returning, he besieged Merida, tooke it, and enlarged the kingdom of the Sueues, the which had a beginning about the year 437. Theodoric reigning ouer the Gothes, they brake the peace made by Vallia with the Emperour Honorius, & besieged Narbonne, the which was relieved by Licorius, Gouverneur in those parts for the Empire vnder the Generall Estius: but Licorius was defeated soone after by the same Gothes, the which was a great prejudice to the Romanes. By reason of this defeat, the peace was renewed among these potentates.

Rechilan being king of Gallicia after his fathers decease, hee sought also to enlarge his limits: wherefore he first assailed Vandalusia, and the country about new Carthage, the which he made subiect vnto his crowne, and did wholly suppress the name of the Silinges Vandales in Betica. Hee made a certaine composition with the Romanes, to whom he yielded the country of Toledo in Carpetania, and new Carthage, called now Carthage.

Theodoric hauing also made a peace with the Romanes in Gaule, made a designe vpon Spaine; yet being called backe to ioyne with the Romanes against the Hunnes, who were entred in infinit numbers into Gaule vnder Attila: hee was in that memorable battaile, whereas Attila was defeated, in the which there died about an hundred and eightie thousand men vpon the field; and among others, Theodoric king of the Gothes, hauing reigned fouretee yeares, according vnto some. The cause of this warre, which Attila vnderooke; was his bad disposition to ruine the whole world: whereunto he was incited by Genserich, king king of the Vandales, who was trecherous, cruell, and inhumane, having a desire to ruine the Visigothes in Gaule and Spaine, both for that he had bene chafed and pursued by them, as also fearing that Theodorice their king would seeke to reuenge the injurie done vnto his daughter, who being married vnto Humeric, the sonne of Genferic, had bene sent backe by him vnto her father disfigured without a nose, vpon a suspition which Genferic had, that she would haue poysoned him. In this battaile there were five kings: Attila king of the Hunnes, Generall of the warre: Valamir, of the Ostrogothes, who were tributaries to Attila: Theodorice, of the Visigothes in Gaule and Spaine: Ardaric of the Gepides, and Meroue of the French. This was in the yere 453, and was fought in the fields of Maroché, a word corrupted of Maurice, otherwise called Cathalaunians: a battaile as remarkable as hath bin since the deluge, in regard of the great number of men that were in arms, and the strange designs of Attila, a common enemy of all mankind. Besides those that died in the battell, there was an encounter the night before betwixt the Gepides and the French, in the which there were about 90000 men slaine.

Reccilaire died a little before in Merida, being an idolater, and after him his sonne Reccilaire reigned ouer the Sueues in Gallicia, who was baptized, and had received the Christian religion. Hee had also married a daughter of Theodorice, king of Gothes, whereby he grew proud, aspiring to great matters. He iouaded the Valscons country, which is now Nauarre, and spoiled it. From thence he went to see his father in law, and in his returne, with the helpe of the Gothes, he sackt Sarragosse, and all the country which we now call Arragon, the which obeyed the Empire. He spoiled that of Carthage, the which his father by a treatie made with the Romanes had yielded vnto them. This past before the defeat of the Hunnes.

3. Torismund.

An. 453.

10 A Fter that Theodorice had bene slaine in that great battaile, the which was woon by the fauor of God, and to the great glorie of all the countries of Europe, against that cruell tyrant Attila, his sonne Torismund succeeded him ouer the Visigothes, whose seat was at Toulouse. He had many brethren, Theodorice, Frederic, Turic, Rothemer, and Humeric. Ætius lieutenant Generall for the Emperour Valentinian, made him jealous of them, least they should seize vpon the realme in his absence, aduising him to goe speedily to Toulouse, and to cause himselfe to be crowned. This Ætius did, for that he distrusted the Gothes, whom he loued not neere him; yea, he was grieved to see this young prince full of courage after this victory lately gotten against the Hunnes, hauing a desire to pursue the remainder of this defeated army, and to root them out quite; the which Ætius held not profitable for the Romanes: for knowing the nature of the Goths to be proud and active, he feared, that being puffed vp with many victories, they should enter into the territories of the Romanes: wherefore he suffered the remainders of the defeated armie of the Hunnes to slip away, which gaue his enemies subject to disgrace him with the Emperour Valentinian, who afterwards put him to death: whereby (as some saide) he cut off the right arme of his estate; for he was a wise and valiant captain: yet some say, That betwixt Torismund and Attila there were some happie encounters for the Gothes. Torismund I. hauing reigned three yeares, was slaine by his enemies, as he was let bloud, being sicke. They write, That one stole away his armes, which he kept by his bed, yet hauing a penknife in his hand, he slew some of the murderers which came to assault him. It is doubtfull whether they were his brethren, or others by their procurement. Some say, That the murderers name was Ascalene, and that he reigned but a yeare.

Torismund slain by his brethren by procurement.

4. Theodorice the second of that name.

A damnable desire of reuenge.

11 T Theodorice the 2. succeeded his brother Torismund, about the time that Valentinian the 3. was slaine by the friends of Ætius. The Empire of Rome was held by one Maximus, who married Eudoxia by force, being widow to Valentinian that was slaine, thinking by this conjunction to be more respected in the imperial dignitie, which he vsurped; but this woman mad for the wrong she thought was done vnto her, sought to be reuenged of Maximus, to the prejudice of her selfe, of Rome, Italy, & of the whole Empire: for by the means of Boniface she caused Genferic to come out of Africke, who with an army of Vandales, Afrikanes, Moores, & others, entered

A entered Rome, and slew Maximus, sacked and burnt the towne, spoiled all Italie, and led away Eudoxia and her daughters, with many thousands others, prisoners into Africke: yet afterwards he set Eudoxia and her daughters free, except one, whom he kept to marrie to his sonne. This was done by a treatie made with the Emperour Martian, who reigned in the East at Constantinople, who also suffered Theodorice, in recompence of the succours which the Visigothes had giuen the Romanes against Attila, to reigne in Spaine, and to get what hee could from the Sueues.

Theodorice then entered into Spaine in the yere 458, against whom, Reccilaire king of the Sueues opposed himselfe, reigning in Lusitania and Gallicia: there was a battaile fought neere vnto the riuer of Vrbic, twelue miles from Asturica, betwixt Asturica and Leon, in the which the chiefe of the nobilitie of the Sueues were slaine, and Reccilaire was constrained to flee himselfe by flight: meaning to passe into Africke, to Genferic king of the Vandales, hee was put backe by a tempest to Porto, and there taken and deliuered to Theodorice, who caused him to be slaine, although he were his brother in law. Gallicia being come into Theodorice in power by this victorie, he left one of his captains called Acclius of Auerngne, Gouverneur in his name, whilst that he pursued his conquests: but when as Acclius saw that Theodorice had turned his back, he caused himselfe to be proclaimed king, and seized vpon the kingdom, forgetting his faith, and the dutie which he ought vnto his master, who had honoured him so much: wherewith Theodorice being much moued, he returned, and finding him readie to resist him, he fought with him, and slew him vpon the place.

C The Sueues desirous to be reconciled to Theodorice, caused their Bishops to sue for their pardon; the which they not onely obtained, but he also gaue them leave to chuse a king of their owne nation. So the Sueues in the furthest parts of Gallicia made choice of Masdra, the sonne of Masila, for their king; but being of sundrie opinions, another faction proclaimed Franta. Theodorice after all this passed into Lusitania, meaning to sacke Emerita or Merida, but either for the respect he bare to S. Enalite, or for feare (as they say) he did abstaine. From that time hauing diuided his armie into three, he sent one part into Vandulisia, vnder the command of a captain named Cherula or Ceurila: another into Gallicia, led by Sigeric and Nepotian; these did much annoy the disagreeing Sueues: and he himselfe with the other third part returned into Gaule Gothique, which was Languedoc, where in few dayes he tooke Narbonne, by the treason of Count Agrippin or Raunernius, who was Gouverneur thereof: or, according vnto some, hee received it of Gilon, who then reigned in Fraunce, during the time that Childeric was in exile, meaning by this bounty to fortifie himselfe with the Visigothes against the French, who began to be discontented with his exactions and tyrannies. The maiestie of the Romane Empire in the West was then troden vnderfoot, after the death of Valentinian: for in euery prouince the gouernours and captains of armies caused themselves to be proclaimed Emperours, and supported one another: so as Spaine was wholly abandoned to the Visigothes, and the Gaules to them and the French, and to petty tyrants.

E The Sueues being diuided in Gallicia, had chosen (as is said) two kings: one faction would haue Masdra, the other obeyed Franta, but he died within few daies; after whom, the same faction did chuse Reccimund, who hauing made an accord with Masdra, they entered jointly with a great armie into Lusitania, and spoiled it. Masdra was slaine by his owne people; after whom, that partie created Frumar king, but Reccimund opposed himselfe: so as these two petty kings impatient one of another, fell to spoyle Gallicia, one on the one side, and the other on the other side. Frumar being dead, Remismund or Arismund, the sonne of Masdra, ther on the other side. Frumar being dead, Remismund or Arismund, the sonne of Masdra, brought all the Sueues vnder his obedience, and was peaceable king of Gallicia. The Sueues since Reccilaire had received the Christian religion, reasonably pure concerning the principall points, and had continued in the same, vntill the time of this king Arismund, who received a certaine Gaule called Aix an Arrian, thinking ill of the myserie of the holy Trinitie, into Gallicia, who infected the whole country with his heresie, the which was maintained many yeares by many kings, whose names and deeds haue bene buried by writers in hatred of their impieties.

In the same time there had bin ten Emperours in Italie of small fame, and of lesse exploits, who made no great opposition against the Visigothes and French: so as the one seized upon Spaine, and the other upon Gaule, leaving but very obscure markes of the imperiall authority: it may be for the good of these two rich regions, who were better governed under those generous and free nations, than they should have beene under the Romanes, who were corrupted with all vices, and but a medley of all other nations. In these times the Bishops of Spaine would in their life time chuse successors to their Bishopricks; the which was reproved in a Councell held at Rome, under Pope Hilarie. Remismund or Arismund sought friendship and peace with Theodorice, the which he did courteously graunt: and moreover, Theodorice made an alliance with him, by the marriage of a daughter of his, the which hee sent him under the conduct of Salan, Maior of the palace, with rich presents. Remismund growne proud with these honours, he seized againe upon Lusitania, where he tooke Conimbrica, and spoiled it: Lisbon was deliuered vnto him by Lusides, who commaunded there: during which things, Theodorice was slaine at Tolouse by his brother Euric or Henry, hauing reigned fouretecn years: vnder him liued Sydonius Apollinaris, who of an Earle became a Bishop.

12 Desire to reigne induced Henry to kill his brother Theodorice, who (as some say) received that which he had done to another: for some did thinke, that Theodorice and Frederic had bene authors of the death of Torismund their eldest brother. Leon was at that time Emperour of Rome, sitting at Constantinople. As soone as Henry was seated in the royall throne of the Visigothes, he entred into Spaine with a great army, and seized vpon the whole country on this side Elbro; for he tooke Pampelone, Sarraosse, and other places of the province of Tarracona: then running into Lusitania, and seeing the combustions which were in the Romane Empire, on this side the Pyrenees, he assailed Arles and Marseilles, and joynted them vnto his kingdome, and defeated Riome, king of the Britons, who came against him in fauour of the Romanes, with twelue thousand men. Vindemir, brother to Theodomir, and vncle to Theodorice, an Ostrogothe, being king of Italie, brought him forces out of Hungarie, and gaue him means to seize vpon part of Gaule. Hee caused the Gothes lawes to be set downe in writing, who vntill that time had bin governed by customes. Being at Arles, where he held a generall assembly in armes, according to the manner of that nation, they did see the yron of their launces and other weapons change colour, looking greene, red, blacke, yellow, and of diuers other colours; and soone after the king died, hauing reigned 17 years: He was an Arrian, as his predecessors, and did persecute the churches, shut vp the temples, and caused them to be hedged about with thornes, that they should forget the way to assemble. During the reigne of this Henry, Odoacer a Herule or Saxon entred into Italie, who hauing forced Augustule (who termed himselfe Emperour) to leaue his purple robe, he made himselfe king of Italie, the which he held the space of 15 or 16 years.

6. Alaric.

Punishment of a treacherous Governor.

13 Alaric succeeded his father Euric, being the second of that name, who reigned ouer the Visigothes at Tolouse, when as Clouis the first Christian king reigned ouer the French. In his reigne the Romanes had yet some lands in Spaine, and in Gaule, where they had gouernours; one of the which called Burdamel, seized vpon the country which he commaunded in Spaine, and became a tyrant, but he was taken by the Gothes, and burnt at Tolouse in a bull of brasse. Apollinaris was also at that time Earle, and gouernor of Auvergne, kinsman to Sydonius.

Warre for territories betwix
the French and the Visigothes.

Before this time the Visigothes and the French had been good friends: but Clouis with most of his people hauing embraced the Christian religion, and left their idols, he thought himselfe bound to pursue those that were not of the same opinion, and to force them therunto by armes. He therefore fell in dislike of Alaric and the Visigothes, for that they were Arrians: besides, he tooke an occasion, for that his enemies and the banished men of France had sought refuge at Tolouse and other places belonging vnto Alaric: and moreover Clouis complained, That a day and place being appointed them to parle, he was aduertised, that Alaric had layd an

A ambush to kill him: wherefore there grew a great quarrell betwixt these two princes, the which they would decide by single combat betwixt themselves: but king Theodorice (who had newly dispossessed Odoacer of Italie, and there erected the kingdome of the Ostrogothes, a wife and valiant prince) reconciled them for that time, and the Visigothes turned the warre into Spaine, where they tooke Tortose, and slew one Peter who had played the tyrant there, whose head was carried to Sarraosse.

The hatred betwixt the French and the Gothes encreased daily, so as they must come to blows, and there was a battell fought neere vnto Poitiers, in the plaine of Voglad, 10 leagues from the towne, whereas Alaric was slaine, and with him Apollinaris Earle of Auvergne. There was also another battell neere vnto Bourdeaux, where there were an infinit number of Gothes Arrians slaine, so as the place is to this day called the field of Arri. Among the spoiles of the Visigothes, there were certaine vessels found, consecrated in eld time to the temple of Ierusalem. This king Clouis is by some called Lodomir. By means of these victories the French seized vpon Aquitain, & on Tolouse, the chiefe towne of the Visigothes, they besieged Carcasone, and meant to pursue their victorie, but Theodorice coming out of Italie, made them to rayle their siege.

At that time Toledo was the royall towne in Spaine. Many Christian Bishops chafed out of Africke by the Vandales Arrians, were retired into Italie; from whence some were sent in to Spaine. At that time liued Fulgentius, Bishop of Ruspe, a learned & an eloquent man, who was chased away and persecuted by the Arrian Gothes. Alaric (as the Spaniards write) had married Amalasunta, daughter to Theodorice, king of the Ostrogothes and of Italie, and had a sonne by her called Amalaric, who was yet a child, when his father died: wherefore Geslaric (who was bastard brother to Alaric) tooke the gouernment of the kingdome, his brother hauing reigned 22 years.

7. Genfolaric or Gesslaric.

14 Genfolaric was sonne to Euric, by a concubine, hee vsurped the crowne at Narbone, Ann. 508. his nephew Amalaric being yet but five years old. He was bafe and a coward: for being assailed by Gundebault king of the Bourguignons (who had also erected another kingdome in Gaule, to the prejudice of the Romanes) after that he had received a great rout neere vnto Narbone, he fled ignominiously into Spain, and shut himselfe vp in Barcelone, vntill that Ilba (sent by Theodorice king of Ostrogothes, grandfather as they sayd by the mothers side vnto yong Amalaric) came out of Italy to chase him from thence. Some make this Gesslaric bastard sonne to Alaric, and brother to yong Amalaric.

This K. Theodorice sent 80000 men out of Italie into Gaule against the French, to reuenge the death of Alaric. Ilba (who was General) joyned his forces with the Visigoths, and defeated the French, where there were about 20000 of them slaine. Prouence remained then vnto the Ostrogothes, and was a member of the realme of Italie, and Languedoc and Gasconie returned vnto the Visigothes, as before. Ilba then past into Spaine, to settle the estate of yong Amalaric, and chased K. Gesslaric out of Barcelone, the third year of his reigne, who fled into Africke to the Vandales, hoping to recover his dignitie by their means, but he labored in vaine: wherefore being returned into Gaule, he was slaine neere vnto Durance.

Amalaric eight King of the Gothes.

15 The Spaniards write, That K. Theodorice came out of Italie (where he had reigned 18 years) expressly into Spain, to settle his grandchild Amalaric in his kingdome, where (as they say) he continued 15 years, and that Clouis the French king being dead, and his kingdome diuided betwixt his foure sonnes, they made a peace with yong Amalaric, & assured him their sister Clotilde, restoring to him Tolouse, or at the least the vniuersity of it. This treatie was made with Theodorice his grandfather and tutor.

16 Under these Arrian princes the Christian religion was somewhat maintained by the Bishops, touching the fundamentall points, although intermixed with superstitions, the which encreased daily. There assembled tenne Bishops at Tarracona, who decreed, That the feast of

Councils at Tar-racona, Sarra-osse, and other places.

Sunday should begin on Saturday. From whence it came that in Spain and many other places they hold it a profane thing to work on the Saturday; no not the women to spin. This Council makes mention of the first Monks in Spaine. At Girona was another prouinciall assembly of 7 Bishops: at Sarraçosse of 12: in Illerda at the foot of the Pyrenes of 8: at Valence of 6 Bishops, whereas alwaies the Bishop of that place did preside. These Councils were not very free nor assured in the Arrians jurisdiction: but in those places which the Romans did yet hold in Spaine, the pure Christian religion was fauoured. The counsell of Sarraçosse did ordayne, that no Nun should were a vayle nor be professed before the age of 40 years. Theodorick king of the Ostrogoths, regent in Spaine, tooke to wife, as the Spanish authors write, a noble woman of that countrie, at whose intreatie he set at libertie all those of her nation that were in prison, and had by her a sonne, called Seuerin, Duke of Carthage, father to Leandre and Isidore, who were faints. The 15 year of his gouernment, he resigned the kingdom of the Visigoths to his graundchild Amalaric, being now of age to commaund, and returned to the taking of the king, and the end of the Vandales royaltie, the which had continued in these countries 113 years. Vnder the reign of Amalaric was celebrated the second Council of Toledo by eight Christian Bishops, although the king were an Arrian. He hauing (as we haue said) married Cloilde, daughter to Clovis king of France, intreated her verie ill, by reason of the diuersitie of religion (for the was well instructed) so as going through the streets, the people cast stones and durt at her in contempt: being retired the wip' t' off the bloud and durt with a handkerchiefe, the which she sent vnto her brethren, letting them vnderstand the disgraces and wrongs which she suffered: wherewith being incensed, they proclaimed warre against Amalaric: the armies incountred neere vnto Narbone, whereas Amalaric was vanquished, who thinking to saue himselfe in Barcellona, was slaine, being forsaken by his men. The annales of France say, that Childebert king of Paris did this execution, and that he tooke Toledo, the royall seat, spoiled the temples, and carried backe into France, 60 chalices, fiftene plates, and twentie little cofers, where they kept the books of the Gospell, al of pure gold, and much other treasure, and that he did distribute these ornaments among the Churches of France. Amalaric reigned five yeares and eight months after the gouernment of Theodorick. After his death, the kingdom of the Visigoths remained vnto Amalsuinta his mother, say the Spaniards, I know not by what title. I cannot concurre with them in this opinion, that this Amalsuinta was daughter to Theodorick king of Italie, the which we read was married to a prince of the bloud royall of the Visigoths, and of the familie of Hamels, called Euthaire, and had Athalaric by him, to whom Theodorick his graundfather dying, left the kingdom of the Ostrogoths in Italie. Procopius sayes, that the wife of Alaric, and mother to this Amalaric, was called Theudisuse, the which by the report of Jourdain, who names her Theudiscode, Theodorick had by a concubine when he was yet in Misia: others say, that this Theudiscode was married to Gundebault king of Bourgogne, and that the wife of Alaric, mother to Amalaric was called Ostrogothe, bastard also to this king Theodorick. Howsoever it be, it is not credible that Theodorick king of Italie, should so much affect the affaires of Spaine, as hee should abandon Italie for fiftene yeares, to remaine in Spaine. And there is lesse likelyhood, seeing that Athalaric sonne of Euthaire and of Amalsuinta succeeded him in the realme of the Ostrogoths, the which hee had of a lawfull marriage, whatsoever the Spaniards write, duke Seuerin of Carthage, father to Isidore and Leandre bishops of Seuille, and others, the which Seuerin should rather haue succeeded him in the realme of the Ostrogoths, than his graundchild, the sonne of his daughter. That which others write, that he sent Alba with an armie against the French, to reuenge the death of Alaric his kinsman, and that he had reteyned for his paines and the charges of war, Prouence (for these princes notwithstanding all their charitie, did not labour for nothing) and that for the loue of consanguinitie, being all of the familie of Hamels, hee had sent one of his captaines called Theude into Spaine, to be tutor and regent of the yong king Amalaric and of the realme of the Visigoths, with his mother Theudisuse or Amalsuinta, as the was called: that I say comes neere vnto the truth, as we may see by Procopius. All the reigne of Amalaric, as well vnder his tutors, as alone, is counted by all probabilitye 15 yeares.

Theude

Theude the ninth King.

SO it is, that Theude or Theodas, as others name him, reigned after the death of Amalaric, if we shal beleue Procopius, hauing married a great lady of the countrie of Spaine, who, the Spaniards say, was mother to the deceased king. The resemblance of names hath deceiued them in all their discourses: for at the same time, or therabouts, Amalsuinta mother to Athalaric, heire of the realme of Italie, married an other Theude or Theodas (seeing that she was not feared nor respected by the Ostrogoths, for that she was a woman) and made him tutor to her sonne, and regent of the realme, to her owne preiudice, but this hath nothing common with Spaine. At the coming of Theude the Visigoth, the French entred into Spaine, and spoiled the countrie of Arragon, and other places thereabouts: but they were defeated by the Visigoths, led by Theodiscl their captaine, who sealed vpon all the passages and straits of the Pyrenes. They say, that seeing themselves inclosed, they entreated them to giue them a day and a night to passe away, the which the Goths graunted, and all that remained behind, after that time, were put to the sword: a remarkable victorie, but it was afterwards blemished by the defeat of the Goths in Africke, as we will shew. The French notwithstanding returned, and tooke Sarraçosse, with other townes in Spaine: the Christian religion, if they forced their bodies by armes, being ignorant that religion is a profession of the spirit, the which may well be perswaded by reasons and doctrine, but no waies forced. It was the cause of all the French wars in those daies, ioynd with ambition and the insatiable desire of reigne, which vice they thought to obscure, fighting (said they) for the Christian religion, and enriching the Clergie men of their countrie, with spoiles and other gifts. In the meane time most of the Monks that were then in credit, long in the Churches, and the bishops became like dumbe dogs, following the courts of princes, and armies; a mischief which hath not bene since repaired. In Spaine, whereas the Clergie was not in so good estate, their gouernment was somewhat better: for many of their bishops were learned, according vnto those times, as some writings, which yet remaine, doe witnesse, namely Aprugius bishop of Paccence, Iustinian of Valence, Iuste of Vrgell his brother, Leandre of Seuille, and according to some of Toledo, and others, who did often assemble for the affaires of the Church, and held Prouinciall councils: yet they were not without blemishes, busying themselves more than was fit, about seruices, ceremonies and exterior ornaments: from whence sprung many superstitions. Childebert brought from Sarraçosse, as some say, Saint Vincent his thirt, the which was put at Saint Germain by Paris, where he built a temple to that Saint: and the authors say, that they of Sarraçosse redeemed their towne from spoiles by this iewell, the which is credible, considering the deuotion of that nation. After the retreat of the French, the Visigoths would passe the strait into Africke, to chase away the Romanes, who had surprised the towne of Septe from them: but as this nation possessed with a superstitious feare, would not vse their armes vpon a Sunday, for the reuerence of the day, the Romanes who had no such scruple, fell vpon them, and finding them carelesse and disarmed, they made a pitifull slaughter; so as there escaped not any one to carrie newes. It hapened at the same time that King Theude (the newes of this rout being published abroad) was slaine in his chamber, by one that made himselfe a iester, to haue the better access, who stabbed him in the bellie with a dagger. The king feeling himselfe wounded to the death, conured the noble-men that were about him, not to doe any harme to him that had hurt him, saying, that God had sent him a worthy reward for his merits, for that he had also bene the murderer of his captaine. He reigned 17 yeares and fise moneths.

bishop of Seuille, and by his wife Iugunde a French woman, whom, they say, he, put in the beginning of the ciuile warres, into the hands of those that gouerned the lands of the empire in Spaine, vnder Maurice the emperour, being newly brought in bed of a sonne, fearing the threats and furie of his father: and that after her husbands death the Romanes caused her to passe into Africke with her little infant, where she died; but the child was carried to Constantinople. Childbert king of France, to reuenge the wrong done vnto his brother in law, tooke armes against the Gothes, and hoping to recouer his sister and his nephew, hee made a league with the emperour Maurice. Against the French which did forrage Languedoc, was sent Ricared the other sonne of Leouigilde, who repulst them with great losse of their men, entering into their territories, where he tooke a great spoile.

Myracle.

They spake of many myracles during the raigne of this king, which God did in fauour and confirmation of the Christian religion, against the Arrians and their sect, the which hee had decreed should haue an end with this king Leouigilde. The ciuile warre being as we haue said) hot in Spaine, the armie of Leouigilde pursuing his sonne, and passing by the territories of Valencia and Murcia, the Monkes of the Abbey of Saint Martin in those marches, being terrified, abandoned their Abbot, and fled all into an island of the sea neere adioyning. The fouldiours being entred into the Abbey, and finding the Abbot all alone, being a verie deuout and religious man, and crooked with age, they did him many outrages: one of them hauing drawne out his sword to cut off his head, he fell downe flake dead; the which did terrifie the rest, as they presently fled. This being reported vnto king Leouigilde, he commanded, that all the goods which had bene taken in that monasterie, should be restored. An Ar-rian bishop meaning to decieve the king (who reproached him, that the Arrians did no myra-cles) suborned one of his sect, who could counterfeit himselfe blind, causing him to stand in the way whereas he knew the king should passe: there this gallant began to crie out, and to entreate this bishop which did accompanie the king, that he would make him recouer his sight, by his prayers. The bishop approached, and laying his hands arrogantly vpon his eyes, the king being present, and attending to see this myracle, it happened, that hee which did counterfeit himselfe blind, lost his sight in good earnest; and withall was so full of paine in that part, as detesting the bishop and his counsaile, hee confessed openly before the king and his traine, That the bishop had induced him to act this tragedie, and had corrupted him with money. Many other signes are written to haue bene seene in those times, the which we will not call into question, for that the end and vse of myracles, is to witnesse, and to giue credit to the word of God, and his true doctrine, which was then disgraced by the Arrian princes.

A counterfeit begger diuinely

Spaine was furnished with many Learned and holy men, whilest that the Arrians did raigne in Africke, and did persecute the Christians. They make mention of one Donat an Abbot, who passed out of Africke into Spaine, with about 70 Monkes, and a goodly librarie, where he was the founder of the monasterie Seruitane: and that they were entertained by a rich ladie called Minicea, who then built the first monasterie at Serabis, which is Xatiua. This Donat did first set downe certaine rules and orders for a monasticall life among them; for vntill that time they were not tyed by any vowes, neither had they liued in cloisters, but were dispersed in woods and desarts, leading a solitarie life, from whence he retired them. Leandre bishop of Seuille, was then famous for his learning and holinesse, a great friend to S. Gregorie, whom he had knowne at Constantinople: of which friendship, they say, that the image of the virgin
Marie, which is in great, yea in superfluous veneration in these dayes at Guadalupe, is a wit-nesse, and that S. Gregorie lent it to Leandre.

As one kind of Antichrist should haue an end, so it was necessarie, that (to exercise the Church of God) others should come. Wherefore during the raigne of Leouigilde, Atah-mer the great seducer was borne, with whose doctrine the Arabians did a while after infect Spaine; and soone after that grew the quarrell for the Primacie, betwixt the bishops of Constantinople and Rome. And as among those which made profession of the Christian religion there were many abuses which had bene received and embraced, or else dissembled by the most learned and religious, the rashnesse of the one, and the negligence of the other, gaue place to impietie, the which hath since preuailed in the world, vsing force with the one hand, and fraud with the other. This was in the year 580, which the Spaniards account 618

Anno 580.

A of their Æra: yet others say, That it was in the year of Christ 592, that this scourge of Gods Church was borne in Arabia, of the race of Agar and Ismael. His father was called Abdalla, or Abdella, his mother Emina. A little before the death of Leouigilde, Amalaric the tyrant would haue made himselfe king of Galicia, but he was taken by the kings lieutenants in those marches.

Leouigilde having raigned eighteen yeares, dyed at Toledo: who by the report of Saint Gregorie, repented himselfe of the rigour and crueltie he had vsed to his sonne Hermengilde, being desirous to reforme himselfe to the pure religion; and dying, recommended his other sonne Ricared to Leandre, intreating him to instruct him as he had done his other sonne: and he commanded Ricared to call home the Christian bishops which he had banished. He was the first king of the Gothes raigning in Spaine, which vied a robe of purple, or other royall ornaments: for vntill that time the kings of that nation were apparelled like vnto the other nobles. He first of all began to heape vp treasure, and filled his cofers with spoils of temples, consecrations, and other violences vsed to good men, whereof many were put to death by him. He corrected the lawes made by Euric his predecessor, and reduced them into better forme.

15. Ricared.

C 26 Ricared being crowned by Leandre, as Luke Tudensis writes, hee was instructed in the true Christian religion, the first yere of his raigne, and preuailed so with mild words and strong reasons, as hee perswaded many of the Arrian bishops to leaue that heresie, and to follow the better partie; and so consequently the noblemen & common people. He ordained, That the goods which had been taken and confiscated for that cause, should be restored; and of a destroyer he became a builder of churches. He put Sisibert the murderer of his brother Hermengilde ignominiously to death: he discovered & suppressed the conspiracy of bishop Sunna, and of Sugga, Arrians, who would haue made themselves tyrants. The bishop was banished, and Sugga's hands cut off, and then confined into Galicia. There was another conspira-cie auerred of bishop Flidila, and of queene Goswintha, against Ricared, and punished: Flidila was banished, and Goswintha died soone after: she had bene a perpetual enemy to the Christians. The French being come into Languedoc with a great armie of about threecore thousand men, vnder a capitaine called Desiderius, and then vnder Boson, being sent by Gunttran king of Orleans, Ricared sent Claude duke of Lusitania against them, who obtained one of the greatest and most memorable victories that euer was, neere vnto Carcasstone: For we read, that with 300 men or thereabouts, he defeated all this great power of the French, and tooke all their baggage.

An admirable victory, and forces credible.

The fourth yere of his raigne he caused a Councell to be called at Toledo, which was the third; at the which there were assembled threecore and two bishops of his realme, of either side of the Pyrene mountains, or threecore and ten, according vnto some. There he did re-E nounce and abjure the Arrian heresie, and Badda his wife, with all the noblemen Gothes, did the like, all confessing the equalitie of the three persons in one diuinitie. The Metropolitanas at this Councell were: 1. Manfona of Merida. 2. Leandre of Seuille, whom Luke Tudensis calls Primat and the Popes Legat. 3. Euphemius of Toledo. 4. Pantard of Bracara. 5. Nigith of Nar-bona. 6. Stephen of Tarracone.

A Councell of Toledo, where the Gothes ab-jured the Arrian heresie.

These were the Archbishops and Metropolitanas, by the which the Arrian heresie was condemned, with the which the noblemen Gothes had bene abused two hundred and thirteene yeares. At this Councell did preside Leandre bishop of Seuille, and Eutropius Abbot of the monasterie of Serui, afterwards bishop of Valence. Among other decrees it was ordained, That no Iew should be admitted to any publicke charge. The acts of this Coun-cell were not only allowed by the king, but also confirmed vnder his hand. Since that time the custome is in Spaine, that euerie one that presents himselfe vnto the Communion, is bound to rehearse the articles of the Apostles Creed after the priest. This was in the yere of our Saviour fue hundred eightie nine, and adding therunto thirte eight yeares, it makes the 627 of the Spaniards Æra. King Ricared being then in peace, and employing his time about matters of religion in Spain, he discovered some like trecheries, which did much trouble him:

him: for a chamberlaine of his, of the number of his captaines, called Argemund, attempted against his estate and life, to raigne in his place. The enterprife being proued, his partisans were executed, and he also, after that he had bene whipped, and led vpon an asse through the cite of Toledo, to serue for an example to all subjects, a not to rebell against their princes for ambition.

Reliques.

*Council at Se-
uille.*

*Learned and re-

The Iewes did what they could to procure the king to abolish the decree of the Councell made against them: and as in a manner all that nation haue euer giuen themselves to the trade of merchandise, and are therefore full of money, they offered a great summe to haue it effected: but the king continued constant, and they must haue patience. This holy resolution of king Ricared and his nobilitie, was ill seconded by the Pope and the Prelats of those times, he being already accustomed to make superfluous shewes, and oftentimes merchandise of external things, which were of small vse for pietie. The king sent royall presents to pope Gregorie the first, who was called Holy and an Angell vpon earth: and he requited him with reliques, with a linke of the chaine wherewith Saint Peter had bene bound by the necke, when he suffered martyredome; of the wood of the verie crosse, of Saint John Baptists haire, and such other singularities, with an Archbishops cloke for Leandre bishop of Seuille. These were the exercises of pietie, which were then too much vsed among Christians: At that time there was another Councell held at Seuille, of eight bishops, whereas Leandre their pastor did preside.

In Spaine there did flourish in those times, besides the aboue-named bishops, John abbot of Valclaire, who was afterwards bishop of Gironne, a Goth by race, but borne at Scalabis in Lusitania, who hath written a Chronicle vnto the yeare five hundred and ninetie: Fulgensius bishop of Astigi, an vnder of Carthage, brother to Leandre, a man well scene in the Greeke, Latine, Arabike, and Syriack tongues, and hath written many bookes: Senerius bishop of Carthage, Licinian of Malaca, and others. Florentine the sister of Leandre, was Priorelle of fortie Nunnes in the towne of Astigi.

Queene Badda, who was daughter to king Arthur of great Britaine, dyed; after which Ricared married Clotilde sister to king Childbert of Mets: by meanes of which marriage a peace was concluded betwixt the Gothes and the French.

Ricared and his vertues.*

Pope Gregorie would not haue the name of Primat, yet in the meane time he did exercise a iurisdiction in Spaine: for Iannarius being depofed from his bishopricke of Malaca, by the praiches of some of his enemies, he sent one called John to take knowledge of the cause, who with Apostolike authoritie, restored him to his bishopricke, and punished his aduersaries. Ricared hauing held the kingdom of the Gothes in Spaine and in Gaule fiftene yeares, dyed at Toledo, much lamented of all men: for he had reigned verie mildly, so as they called him Father of the people. He reduced the Gothike lawes into order, enlarged his dominions, hauing bene alwayes in armes against the Romanes, and their partisans which remained in Spaine: he was verie deuout and bountifull to the Clergie, so as hee was commended for a verie religious prince, especially for that he had giuen vnto the church of S. Felix at Gironne, the crowne of gold which he ware vpon his head: but, that which is of more esteeme, he purged Spaine of all heresies.

16. Luiba 2, and Viçterix 17.

*Council of Victeric to young

*T*O Ricared succeeded his son Luiba, or Liuis, Maurice reigning then at Constantinople. Some Spaniards say, That he was a ballard, others denie it, and giue him two brethren, Suinthila and Geila. Viçterix seized vpon the Gothes kingdom, and taking this yong prince, who was but sixteen yeares old, he cut off his right hand, and in the end slew him the second yeare of his raigne. Then dyed Leandre, to whom succeeded Idore his brother at Seuille.

Viçterix was an vnfortunate king, for in many encounters which he had with the Romanes, and those that held their partie in Spaine, he was still beaten. Moreouer hee strived to aduance the Arrian heresie againe, and in these miserable designs reigned feuen yeares. He married his daughter Hermenberge to Theodoric king of Mets, who could neuer know her, wherefore he sent her back to her father a virgine vn corrupted: and they say that Ermenichilde, *Theodoric*s grandmother, had bewitched him, and made him vnable to vie his wife, whom she hated,

A hated, Theodoric being otherwise verie licentious, and had made good proofe with other women. We read, that during the raigne of Viçterix, in the yeare six hundred and fues, Mahumet came into Spaine, to preach his doctrine at Cordoua; and that being discovered as they went to seize on him; he fled away so secretly, as no man knew what became of him. But we know, that Mahumet proceeded to the publication of his doctrine after a more violent meanes, hauing by money and persuasions corrupted the Arabian theues, whose earnest he employed to propagate his errors, among other nations, vnder the empire of Heraclius: yet it is not impossible, that Mahumet, being then about fues and twentie yeares old, seruing a rich marchant of Arabia, whose widow he after married, should come into Spaine for his masters affaires, and to haue given some knowledge of the poyson which lay in his breast. King Viçterix (whom others call Deteric, and some Bertric) as he had put the innocent prince Liuis miserably to death, was by a just reuenge miserably flaine by his owne people, as he sat at the table: a bafe king, who did nothing aduance the kingdom of the Gothes, but in taking the towne of Sigüenfa from the Romanes.

end of the ty-

18. Gundamir.

*T*HE Gothes after the death of Viçterix, created Gundamir king, who came to the crowne about the sixt yeare of the empire of Phocas, in the yeare 610: his wife was called Hilduare. This king at his coming made the churches sanctuaries, forbidding to take or force any criminal person that had fled thither: the which was done at the purluse of a Councell then held at Toledo, of foureteeen bishops, and other Clergie men, Aurafius being bishop there: in the which the Archbishop of Toledo was declared Primat of Spaine. All writers make not mention of this Councell, but onely (as the Spaniards say) there are memorials found thereof at Toledo: and it is written, That the rights of this Metropolitan were debated there, where he had his Suffraganes assigned him in all the province of Carpetania, which did comprehend Carthage: so as in this regard the Metropolitan of Toledo had then a greater iurisdiction than at this day. Idore of Seuille, Innocent of Merida, Eusebius of Tarracone, and Beniamin of Dumes, among others, assisted at this Councell. Hee had warre against the Valscons or Nauarrois, and against the Romanes or their partisans with happie successe. He reigned two yeares, and dyed at Toledo, of his naturall death.

19. Sisebuth.

Sisebuth succeeded Gundamir, a wife and valiant prince, learned and eloquent (as the Spaniards say.) He chased away the Iewes which would not be baptized, wherewith France was soone filled: but they were againe forced to flie, Dagobert the French king hauing made an edit, by the which they were enjoyned to conformance themselves to the Christian religion, vpon paine of death. Sisebuth employed his time to conquer the townes, castles, forts, signais and passages of the mountaines, which were yet held by the Romane garrisons, and did in a manner make himselfe master of all Spaine, Cesaricus commanding there for the Romanes.

The zeale of religion was great in many at that time in Spaine, but most of them wanted the true knowledge. The Church of Toledo was gouerned by Heladius, who of a Courtier became a Monke, and from thence had bene taken and aduanced, in his age, to the Archiepiscopall dignitie, the which was now growne full of state, but not such as it hath been since. Agapie, or Agapie, being also turned from a souldiour to a Monke, had bene made bishop of Corduba, not for any learning hee had, but for meere zeale. The nourishment he gaue to his diocessans, and his religious exercises, were in the inuention and veneration of relickes of the bodies of martyres: whereunto the world was then more addicted, than to know the grounds of their Faith. Yet there was a Councell held at Seuille, of eight bishops, against the heretikes which were called Acephali, or without a head, the which denied the truth of the two natures, diuine and humane, in Iesus Christ, where as a certaine Syriac bishop, a great defender of that heresie, was vanquished by the strong arguments of Idore.

Pope Primas

Christendome, no lesse from princes and kings, than from their fellow bishops: wherefore to settle the Primat in Spaine, they were forced to haue a Bull and permission from Pope Theodore the first, or Martin the first, then reigning; by the which this primacie was referred to the election of the bishops of that prouince. Vntill that time the Archbishop of Seuille had held this ranke, rather of honour than of power: but it falling out, that Theodisus the Archbishop, a Grecian borne, a man more learned in the tongues, than religious, seeing himselfe pursued by the other bishops and prelates of Spaine, being accused to haue corrupted the workes of Isidorus, who was held a Saint, and therefore depofed from his Archbishopricke in open Councell, he was so transported, as hauing abandoned the Christian religion, he retired himselfe into Africke with the Mahumetists, the Primacie of Spaine was then transferred from Seuille to Toledo, whereas the seuenth Synode was celebrated, by forrie bishops, the first yeare of the reigne of Cindasunthe, when as he receiued his sonne for a companion and assistant in the government of his estate, seeking thereby to make the kingdom of the Gothes hereditarie. This young prince was held verie deuout and studious of diuinitie; but about all things he was curious to build and enrich churches. During their reigne there liued another Eugenius, successour to the Archbishop of Toledo, about mentioned, famous for his sanctitie of life and doctrine, advanced by force by the king to the Archbishopricke.

King Cindasunthe dyed of poyson, as some belecue, hauing reigned ten yeares, or thereabouts: he and his wife are interred in the monasterie of S. Romane, at this day called Hormiga, betwixt Toro and Tordellas, vpon the riuier of Duero.

25. Reccefunthe.

Ann. 675.
8 Council of Toledo.

36 Recefunthe his sonne, reigned alone, and soone after his fathers decesse there was a Councell held at Toledo of eight and fortie bishops, and ten vicars, of such as had lawfull lets and could not conue; there were some abbots, and many earles and dukes did assist there. In those times, earles were of greater dignitie than dukes. In this Councell, being the eight, it was decreed, That they should abstaine from eating flesh in Lent, without leaue, in cases of ineuitable necessitie, vpon paine of excommunication, and not to eat any flesh in a yeare after: so much they did regard these necessaries of religion, confirming and amplifying in the meane time their authoritie with the people.

Irene a chaste virgin.

In Lusitania certaine lewd and cruell persons sought to rauish a virgin called Irene, against whom she made such resistance, as being impatient in their damnable lust, they slew her, and cast her into the riuier of Nabarin. Her bodie was caried to the towne of Sa. laris, the which changed the name, and is called Saint Irene; an argument of great sanctitie, seeing she preferred her chastitie before her life. The chiefe of these lustfull murtherers was called Britand.

Decease of the 9 Council of Toledo.

Portamius Archbishop of Bracar, was not so vertuous: for the celibate of Clergie men being then in request, and the children begotten by them declared incapable to inherit their fathers goods, and were deliuered for slaves to churches, by the ninth Councell held at Toledo, in the seventh yeare of Recefunthe, he fell to be loose of life: yet hee did acknowledge it openly in the Councell following, held at Toledo, which was the tenth, and did willingly resigne his Archbishopricke; to whom Fruetuosus succeeded, a man of a noble familie, being then bishop of Dume, the founder of many monasteries and chappels. The eight yeare of the reigne of Recefunthe Spaine was much terrified, for that there appeared starres in the firmament at noone day, and the Sunne was eclipsed.

Heretikes Hel. nidiou.

There came two heretikes, called Theude and Pelagius, out of Gothike Gaule into Spaine, who denied the perpetuall virginite of Mari the mother of our Sauour; renewing the heresie of Heluidius: the which were confuted by Alphonfus, nephew and successour to Eugenius in the Archbishopricke of Toledo, who wrote a booke vpon that argument. Whereupon the Spaniards say, that the virgin Mari appeared vnto him: and to this apparition they adde the gift of a cope, to wear when he should say Masse, the which they ascribe is kept at Toledo, or at Ouidoe; but they know not well at which of these two places it remains

maines

Alphonfus it hath remained inuisible. To this Archbishop, they say, that Saint Leocadia did also appeare, who reuealed vnto him the place where his bodie was buried, and had lyen many yeares hidden. Such graue testimonies haue they of the holinesse of this Archbishop Alphonfus, furnaming him Chrysostome, the Anchor of the Faith, attributing vnto him other like epithites, by reason of his learning and pietie.

There is no other thing found written of this king Recefunthe, being credible, that hauing no warres, he did not much trouble himselfe, leauing all the affaires of state and Clergie to bee managed by the Prelats and frequent Councells: yet there are some lawes found made by him. Hauing reigned nineteene yeares and three monthes, he dyed at Toledo, leauing two brethren, Theofred, who was father to Roderic, the last king of the Gothes in Spaine and Lafila. He was interred in the towne which in old time was called Gertic, and now Bamba, in the territorie of Palenza.

26. Bamba.

37 The famed day that Recefunthe dyed, Bamba before desired by the noblemen Gothes, was chosen king. Some say, that he would neuer haue receiued this honour and charge but by constraint; and that refusing it absolutely, there was a nobleman among the Gothes, which drew his sword, and threatened to kill him, if he did not yeeld to the Gothes intreaties: whereupon he condescended, more for feare, than for any desire to reigne, and was crowned by Quirin, or Quirice, Archbishop of Toledo, in our Ladies church; where they report, that there was seene coming out of his head, from among his haire, a vapour like smoke, in forme of a pillar, going vpward. There he made a confession of the Catholique Faith, confirmed the ciuile lawes and ordinances of the kings his predecessours, and receiued a solemne oath from the people. These ceremonies were scarce ended, when as they had newes, That the earle of Nismes, called Hilperic, or Hilderic, contemning the ordinances of the precedent kings of the Gothes, had brought the Lewes againe into the countrey, and made all Gothike Gaule in a manner to rebell against the king. And for that Aregis bishop of Nismes had contradicted him in this excesse, he had chased him away, and against the canons had consecrated another by two bishops of his faction. Gumild bishop of Maguelone did counsell and assist him in these actions. Wherefore Bamba to suppress the insolencie of this earle, sent a captaine named Paul, allyed to the deceased king, but faithlesse and treacherous to his prince; who turned the armie which had bene giuen him, against him, and made an agreement with the enemy, causing himselfe to be crowned king at Narbone, where he set vpon his head the crowne which king Ricared had giuen to Saint Felix church at Girone. Hee drew vnto his partie Rafmonde duke of Tarracone, and Hildagise, who was Gardingue (which was an office of the Crowne) and vsed all the treacheries hee could deuise against king Bamba. He spoyled all the churches of Languedoc, and fortified himselfe with men which hee had leuiued in Fraunce and Gascoine. But as such attempts doe seldom prosper, so this succeeded ill with him: for Bamba hauing raised great forces in Spaine, came against him, and in lesse than six monethes did happily end a most difficult warre: He rooke Barcelone, Girone, and Narbone, the which he besieged both by sea and land; then Magdelone, Agde, Beziers, and in the end Nismes, whereas the chiefe of this rebellion with the rest of his faction fell into his hands, the same day twelue monethes that hee came vnto the Crowne. Hee repaired the ruines which had bene made at Nismes, and throughout all Gothike Gaule, and caused restitution to be made of that which had bene taken out of the churches. At the intreatie of Aregband Archbishop of Narbone, he gaue the offenders their liues, reseruing to himselfe all other punishment. He repulsed Loupa Commander of certaine French bands, neere vnto Beziers. These things being happily performed by him, he returned to Toledo, triumphing, and carrying his rebels in pompe before him, hauing their beards and heads shauen, bare legged, attired in sackcloth, and mounted vpon Cammels. Among others Paul the chiefe of the rebels, carrying a crowne of pitched leather, leather,

leather, followed by a long traine of his confederats, was led in shew, and exposed to be scorned of all men, and in the end they were all put into darke filthie dungeons, where they miserably ended their dayes.

These troubles being pacified, king Bamba caused the walles of Toledo to bee built, and fortified them with towers and bulwarkes, in one of the which were written these Latine verses.

Erexit sanctore Deo Rex inclutus urbem, Bamba, sue celeberrimæ gentis honorem.

And vpon a port neere vnto the bridge called Alcantara :

Vos Domini sancti, quorum hic presentia fulget, Hanc urbem, & plebem solito seruate favore.

11 Council of Toledo,

He caused the eleventh Council of Toledo to be held, vnder Quirice, or Quirin, Archbishop of that place, and Primat of Spaine; where there were sixteene bishops present, and many deputies for others that were absent. They had bene many yeares without calling of any Council, wherewith the Fathers had bene much troubled, this was in the yeare 675: there king Bamba hauing caused the acts of the kings his predecessours to be sought out, according to that which they had decreed, and with the consent of the Fathers, he assigned to euery diocesse the bounds of his jurisdiction. The bishopricks of Lugo and Leon were declared exempt, and not subject to any Metropolitane, as they had bene vntill that time. Another Council was held at Bracar: these were provinciaall Councils, which were to be held euery yeare; and at certaine times they were to call a generall Council of all the bishops of the Gothes kingdome, of either side of the Pyrene mountains, the which was done at Toledo the chiefe towne.

Arabians first attempte vpon Spaine,

Bamba persecuted by Ervinge.

In this kings raigne the Arabians holding Africke, began to invade Spaine: they had a fleet at sea of two hundred threescore and ten vessels, the which by the diligence and valour of Bamba were in a manner all burnt, and the Arabians put to the sword. They did then spoile a great part of the countrey along the coast. There was in the Court a nobleman called Ervinge, issued from a daughter of king Cindaufinthe, and a gentleman of Grece, called Ardauasse, who being chafed from Constantinople, had fled into Spaine, where he had bene well entertained, and honoured with this allyance. This Ervinge being ambitious of command, poisoned king Bamba, so as he became madde; for the curing whereof there were many remedies applied, both naturall and superstitious, but to small effect: so as Bamba (either willingly, finding himselfe vnable, or otherwise) quit the crowne, and retired himselfe into a monasterie, where he liued seven yeares and one moneth, after that he had bene king nine yeares. The place where he passed the remainder of his life, is called Pampliga, neere Burgos. Thus Ervinge seized by force, as they say, of the kingdome of the Visigothes in Spaine, the which the Archbishop of Toledo doth affirme: yet it doth not accord well with the acts of the twelfth Council held at Toledo, vnder Ervinge, where the election of this king Ervinge is confirmed, and allowed as lawfull. But to reconcile these contrarieties, it is to be presumed, that Ervinge being king, and hauing power in his hands, gratifying the Fathers in some sort, that he was also gratified by them, as one hand washeth another, or as they say in France, one Barber shaves another.

27. Ervinge.

39 When as Ervinge was seated in the royall throne, hee confirmed the lawes of the M kings of the Gothes his predecessours, and did authorize with his name, some made by Saint Isidorus: and that to the end it should not seeme, that the Clergie vnder the title of the Church, would vsurpe a ciuile jurisdiction; he rejected many of the plebeians from all dignities and honours, hauing gotten them by money, and other vnlawfull means, to

A to the dishonour of nobilitie: he ordained (but with the aduice of the Romane See) That no Archbishop should be subject to the Primats. To fortifie the beginning of his reigne against Theofride the sonne of Bamba (whom he feared much) he gaue Cixilone his daughter, whom he had by Luibigotte his wife, to an Earle who was rich, and of great authoritie among the Gothes called Egica, cousin to Bamba deceased. And soone after the twelfth Council was held at Toledo, which was in the yeare 681, Julian Archbishop of Seuille being President, where there assisted one and fortie Bishops, siue Abbots, and fiftene great Noblemen. By the acts of this Council in the seuenth Article it appears, That the kings of Spaine had power to giue Bishopricks, and that to that collation, the confirmation of the other Bishops of Spaine was required, especially of the Archbishop of Toledo; the which doth also appear by the answer of an Epistle written by Braule Bishop of Saragosse, to S. Isidorus, where he is admonished to chuse some good man in the place of Eusebins, Archbishop of Tarracoe deceased: Isidorus answers him, That he did not know the kings pleasure therein. This Council did abolish certaine Bishops newly erected, and created by king Bamba, in some townes which were not very conuenient.

12 Council of Toledo, Ann 682.

Confirmation of Bishops belonging to the kings of Spaine.

Three yeares after, in the yeare 684, was another Council held at Toledo, which was the thirteenth, of eight & fortie Bishops, and three Archbishops, of Toledo, Bracar, and Merida; yet the Authors varie in the number of these Bishops: one of the decrees of these fathers was, That neither the king nor any other should marrie the widow of the deceased king, nor defile her by adulterie, vpon paine of excommunication, and to be damned to hell fire. And in the yeare 685 the fourteenth Council was assembled at Toledo, of sixteen Bishops, and many Vicars of them that were absent, to confirme the acts of the sixt Council of Constantinople, begun vnder Constantine the fourth, and some yeares after ended, against the errors of Apollinaris, renewed then, denying the two natures, diuine and humane in Iesus Christ: which acts the Pope sent into Spaine, that in a generall assembly of the Prelats they might be read, and by their authoritie allowed, and published throughout all the kingdome of the Gothes. The Archbishop of Toledo was then called Julian Pomer, of the Lewes race, whose father and mother had made themselves Christians; a learned man, religious, and of a good life. Ervinge hauing reigned seuen yeares, died at Toledo of a naturall death, leauing his kingdome to Egica his sonne in law. In his time there was a great famine in Spaine.

28. Egica.

40 AS soone as Egica, or (as others call him) Egican was king, he put away his wife Cixilone, for the wickednesse which her father had committed against king Bamba; yet he did auow the infant Vitha which he had had by her, and caused it to be nourished (in hope to make it his heire) in the towne of Tude or Tuy in Galicia, as if he had giuen it the realme of Galicia, and of the Sueues, for a portion, whilst that he reigned ouer the Gothes. He caused himselfe to be absolved at a Council held at Toledo, in the first yeare of his reigne, of the oath which he had taken against his dutie to that vnlawfull king. This Council was called the fifteenth at Toledo, whereas Julian the Archbishop of that place did preside, where there were sixtie one Bishops, or sixtie fix, according vnto some. There Julian did maintaine by reasons and good authoritie, what he had written in a confession of the Faith sent to Rome, as well in his name, as of all the Bishops of Spaine; which was, That in our Lord Iesus Christ were the word, the bodie, and the soule; the which had bene rejected by Pope Benedict the second, who (as it seemes) did not well vnderstand these things: the Article was allowed by the Council of Toledo, and afterwards being well considered, was receiued at Rome. The acts of this Council were published in Gothique Gaule in the Cathedrall Churches, for that the Bishops of that Province could not come to Toledo by reason of the plague; being enjoyned to receiue them vpon paine of excommunication, and the losse of the tenth part of their goods that should oppugne them. Six yeares after there was the sixteenth Council held at Toledo, Sigebert being Archbishop of that place, after the death of Julian, and was depofed by this Council for his ill deservings, and in his place was set Felix Archbishop of Seuille. Faulstin Archbishop of Bracar was aduanced to Seuille, and Felix Bishop of Portugallo to to Bracar: this alteration being made, they did proceed to the acts. The cause why they G depofed Sigebert, was, for that he had attempted to depriue king Egica of the realme, for the which hee was degraded, banished, his goods confiscated, and excommunicated; so as hee might not receiue the Sacraments but at the hour of his death: yea, a penaltie was inflicted vpon all clergie men, of what degree soeuer they were, that should attempt against their prince.

19 Council of Toledo, An. 694.

The yeare following, which was 694, the feuenteenth Council was held at Toledo, whereas the king with great humilitie demanded many things of the Fathers: among other, there was a decree made against the Iewes, who being accused not onely to haue reuolted from the Christian religion (in the which they had bene once baptized) but also to haue conspired against the King and the State of Spaine, it was said, That their goods should be confiscated, their persons, wiues and children, and their descendants held for slaues, and dispersed throughout Spaine: That those which had them in seruice, should not suffer them to exercise their Iewish ceremonies: That their children being once seuen yerres old, should be sent away from their parents, and giuen to Christians to bring vp, and then married to Christians, and by all meanes drawne from the conuersation and acquaintance of their parents, and men of their sect: this is to be seene in the eight article.

19th Council of Toledo, An. 694.

These last Councils were general assemblies of the nation, whereas the Clergie held the first place, the which in name and shew were made to determine of matters concerning religion, but in effect they treated of matters of State, whereas controuersies betwixt great men and other politicke matters were there decided: and although there were men of all estates, yea and of the noblest houses, and that there was an order, that regular men should take knowledge of regular causes, and secular causes should be decided by the secular men, yet it is easie to judge, that the soueraigne and last decision depended vpon the authoritie of the Fathers in all things: so as the spiritualitie in the confusion of these two powers did often vanish among worldly fauours, and ciuile policie vsurped by clergie men, became tyrannie, as we shall soone see.

19th Council of Toledo, An. 694.

Egica growne old, had settled his sonne Vitiza as Viceroy in Galicia, holding his seat at Tuy, then Tude, whither a little before he had confined Fasila, duke or gouernour of Biscaye, sonne to king Cindasunthe, as some hold, for certaine attempts made against him, whose wife was corrupted by Vitiza, who afterwards by her instigation slew Fasila, that they might enjoy their loues more freely. This excess happened in a towne which was then called Douzemaens, and now Palatio, neere vnto the riuer Vrbicum. This Fasila was father to king Pelagius, who restored Spaine, being oppressed and ruined by the Moores. Egica hauing reigned about thirteene yeares, died at Toledo, being honoured for a wife and temperate king.

29. Vitiza.

Ann. 701.

41 T He dishonour and infamie of the kings of the Gothes was in the person of this Vitiza, being full of all excess in his lust, without feare or reuerence of God in his actions, an hypocrite and dissembler: for at his first comming he shewed himselfe mild, liberal, and religious, but soone after he turned to his owne nature. He called a Council of Bishops and Noblemen at Toledo, to consult touching the gouernment of his realme: he caused Theofred's eyes to be pulled out, who had bene confined to Cordoua, least that hee who was beloued of the people, and brother to Recesuinthe, should aspire vnto the Crowne. Hee intended to doe the like to Pelagius, the sonne of Fasila, whom hee had slaine, but hee escaped, and fled into Biscaye, being referred for greater matters. Hee committed manie villanies the first two yeares, yet secretly, but afterwards hee exceeded in all vices, without any shame: he filled his palace with many wiues which he had married, and an infinite number of concubines, the which he would haue publickly allowed vnto all men, and did persuade the Noblemen to follow his example. Hee did likewise disannull the Popes Constitutions for a single life, and by an Edict which he caused to be set forth, suffered Clergie men to marrie, and to haue as many women married or vnmarried

The import and indolence of Vitiza.

18 Council of Toledo.

A vnmarried as they pleased, vnto all the inticements he could to infect them with his licentiousness, least they should oppose themselves against him, and by their censures draw the people from obeying of so filthy and vnchaste a king. And to prevent all rebellions, this man blinded with his lustfull pleasures, caused (vnder the colour of peace, which Spaine did then enjoy) all the townes of his realme to be demanteled; except Leon, Toledo, and Townes of Spaine Asturica. Besides hee disarmed the people, and depriued Sinderede Archbishop of Toledo demantled, and the people disarm (were it iustly or vniustly) of his dignitie, giuing it to his brother Opas, who was Archbishop of Seuille: hee disannulled all the immunities and priuiledges of Churches, called backe the Iewes, and restored the banished men to their goods and possessions, giuing them more priuiledges than euer they had before. Finally, as a presage of the future miseries, he shewed (in all sorts of excess and violence contrarie to the lawes of God and men) what princes, ill instructed and ignorant of true pietie, could doe. In the meane time blind Theofred, confined to Cordoua, being newly married to Recilone, a ladie of the bloud royall of the Gothes, had begotten two sonnes of her, Roderic and Cosila, to whom Vitiza would haue done as much as hee had done to the father; but they escaped, and implored the Romanes aid, as the Archbishop Rodrigo doth report, or else of the nobilitie of the Gothes, who in remembrance of Recesuinthe gaue them aid, to chase this infamous monster out of the royall throne, which hee did vnworthily hold. Being come to battaile, Vitiza was defeated and taken, and according to the president which he had giuen, his owne eyes were put out, and hee confined to Cordoua, without title or honour, where he spent the rest of his life in miserie, hauing reigned tenne yeares. Thus Roderic obtained the crowne by the fauour of the Romanes and the suffrages of the people.

19th Council of Toledo, An. 694.

30. Roderic last King of the Gothes.

42 T He time was now come when as the kingdom of the Gothes in Spaine must haue an end, being come to the height of their iniquities: for in their Commonweale all things, both holy and prophane, were managed with fraud and violence, and their princes affected confusion, to satisfie their ambition and infamous lusts: wherefore it pleased God to confound them in their imaginations, to blind them that would be blind, to root out the incorrigible, and to take his graces from them that did obstinately contemne him. Roderic hauing bene an instrument to punish a tyrant, made no vse of this correction, nor acknowledged the fauour from whence it came, but presently after his comming to the crowne he followed Vitiza's steps, yea, he exceeded him in all vices. He shewed himselfe cruell and inhumane to Sisibut and Elba, the children of Vitiza, whom he pursued with all the indignities that might be, and forced them to flee into Africke, depriued of all their goods, where they were entertained by Recila, Earle and Gouernour of Tanger or Tingis. Hee addressed himselfe to the daughter of Julian, Earle or Gouernour of Ceuta, called Caba or Caus, the which was bred vp in the Court, as other virgines of noble families, according to the custome, and rauished her, whilest that her father was in embassage in Africke, for the affaires of the kingdom. The place where he committed this rape is called Pancoruo, betwixt Victoria and Burgos. This was the occasion which made the Moores to invade Spaine. Some authors write, That Caba or Caus was wife and not daughter to Count Julian; yet wee find, that his wife was called Faldrina, and that shee was sister to king Vitiza. The Earle did wickedly reuenge this priuate iniurie by the ruine of the whole kingdom: for returning into Africke, whither he led Caus, causing her to embarke at Malaga, of whom the port of the said towne is yet named, he went to Musa Abenzair, Gouernour for the Emperour of the Arabians, whose name was Vlit, and promised to make him Lord of all Spaine, if hee would giue him men and meanes to make warre there. Musa hauing aduertised Vlit, he aduised him not to giue too much credit vnto the Earle, before hee had tried him: Wherefore at that time they gaue him a hundred horse and foure hundred foot, with promise of greater forces.

led all the coast along the Ocean, which now is Andalusia and Portugall, and then led them backe into Africke, laden with spoyle for a testimonie of his actions. This first descent of the Moores was in the year 713. The Arabians having made this triall of Count Julian's affection, the Gouverneur Musa gave him twelve thousand Moores, vnder the conduct of Tarif Abu Zarez; which Tarif (according vnto some) had beene in the first passage of the Moores into Spaine. Passing the strait, he landed his men at the foot of the mountaine Calpe: by reason whereof this place changed his name, and was in the Arabian tongue called Gebel Tarif, that is to say, the mount of Tarif. And the next towne taken by that captain, which was either the ancient Carteia, or Mellaria, was called Tarif. This armie being secretly fauoured by Sisibut and Eba, the sonnes of Vitiza, aided and fortified by Ricla Gouverneur of Tanger, and other noblemen Gothes, to whom the present estate was displeasing, being friends and affected, and it may be alke interested with Count Julian, ouerran and spoyled all Andalusia, and a part of Lusitania, entring into Seuille, and many other places which had bene demanteled, by the foolish aduice of king Vitiza. In these combustions, Roderic his successe both in his vices and kingdom, was so vnprouided, as his enemies had meanes to doe what they would, without resistance. In the end hauing assembled some troups in haste, he sent them against the Moores, vnder the command of a kinsman of his, called by some Inigo, by others Sanche. But the Gothes hauing in a manner forgotten to manage armes, by reason of the long peace which they had enjoyed, could not withstand the Moores force, hauing been for many years in continual warre, so as they were defeated, which made Count Julian to grow proud and insolent, and his enterprises to bee more fauoured: so as vpon the newes of this victorie in Africke, an infinit number of Arabians, Moores or Sarafins, and other Africans, passed into Spaine, as to the assured spoyle of one of the richest regions in the world.

Roderic seeing this fire to encrease daily, hauing called all the Nobilitie together, and rayed an armie, he marched against his enemies, hauing not all his forces yet joyned (for they of Biscaye and of the Asturias, and in a manner all those on this side the riuer of Ebro, were not yet arriued) finding the Arabians vpon the riuer of Guadalete, nere to Asfidone, which either is Xeres or Medina Sidonia at this day; whereas the two armies standing in view one of another, for the space of eight dayes, they had many bloudie skirmishes, without any great aduantage: but in the end they came to a battaile betwixt Medina Sidonia and Xeres, vpon a Sunday in September, in the year 714, whereas king Roderic was a spectator of his souldiours deuoures, being mounted vpon a great horse which they called Orelia, in a royall mantle, and a crowne vpon his head, with other rich ornaments, after the manner of the kings of the Gothes in those times, which made his souldiours the more courageous, and was the cause of a great slaughter that day of Sarafins or Arabians: but the multitude of the enemies one supporting another, and the tyred being still relieued with fresh supplies, in the end made the Gothes and Spaniards to quit the field: and it is written, That the sonnes of Vitiza, called home by Roderic, and to whom indiscreetly he had given the command of two points of his armie, reuoluted during the fight; whereupon all his men were cut in pieces, and all Spaine was thereby lost in few dayes, except the Asturias, Biscaye, and some part of the Pyrenes, whither the remainders of the Nobilitie and people fled, which refused to liue vnder the Arabians government. King Roderic was neuer seene more; his horse and spoyle were only found in a bogge: yet in the towne of Viseo in Portugall there is at this day this inscription to be seene in Latine.

An Epitaph
vpon R. Roderic.

Hic iacet Rodericus, vltimus Rex Gotorum: maledictus furor impij Iuliani, quia pertinax & indignatio, quia dura, Viscanus furia, animosus furor, oblitus fidelitatis, immemor religionis, contemptor Diuinitatis, crudelis in se, Homicida in Dominum, Hostis in Domesticos, Vastator in Patriam, Reus in omnes: Memoria eius in omni ore amarefct, & nomen eius in aeternum M putrefct.

The continuance of the Gothes reigne.

In this king ended the Gothes kingdom in Spaine, the which had continued (if wee account as the Spaniards doe, according vnto Isidorus, from Athanaric, who reigned in the year 370 in Myfia and Thrace) 344 yeares: but for that hee had no entrance into Spaine, Spaine, but only Ataulphe, who reigned in the year 413, and was the first Gothish king which entred there about the year 417, the Gothes reigne in Spaine had continued but 297 yeares.

After this defeat there was no order nor government among the Gothes, euery man followed what partie did best please him. Some retired into the mountaines of Alturia and Biscaye, and into Nauarre; others went into Gaule: many passed into Italie, Germanie, and England, begging aid from those princes (but in vaine) to restore the ruined estate of Spaine, and elsewhere as God directed them. Sindered Archbishop of Toledo (who had been deposed by the violence of Vitiza) attended not the end of the warre, but leauing his flocke, fled into Italie. Oppa who had succeeded him, tooke part with the Moores, and negotiating for them, lost himselfe in Asturia; in whose place the afflicted Christians did chuse one Vrbain, a religious man. The traitors which had drawne in the Moores to reuenge their priuat injuries, were all disappointed of the promises which had bene made them, and did perill miserably in diuers seasons, and after diuers manners: especially Julian, after that he had seene his wife stoned by the Moores (who allowed the treason, but hated the traitors) his sonne cast from the top of a tower in the towne of Ceuta, himselfe miserable, being depoyled of all his goods, died in a prison in Arragon, in the territorie of Huefca, as some write. The name of the Gothes from that time was in a manner rooted out from the face of the earth: for since there is no memorie of any Estate, Policie, or Gouvernement of this nation vnder this name, the which in former times was so great and famous, as well in the East as West, since the first remembrance of any people. The losse of one battaile did blemish all the beautie of their posteritie, who had vanquished and slaine that great Cyrus king of Persia, and of all Asia: who had made head against the armies of Alexander the Great, forraged the kingdomes conquered by him, and carried away the kings (his successeful) prisoners: troden vnder foot the maiestie of the Romane Empire, triumphed ouer Emperours, and ouer so many great Captaines and armies: taking the best townes in Italie; yea Rome, the Queene of all other townes, sackt by them: the which had seized vpon the most populous and richest Provinces of the West; where they had reigned happily for so many yeares, with so many remarkable examples of pietie, iustice, and valour. This braue nation was in one day ouerthrowne, so weak is the support of humane greatness.

The ruine of the kingdom of the Gothes in Spaine hauing caused so great a confusion in all things, as not onely religion, the manners of the inhabitants, the language, and the lawes, but euen the face of the earth, and the seat and names of townes were peruerted and changed, it shall not be from the purpose, if wee make a catalogue of the ancient Bishopricks established by the Christians in that region, whereof mention is made by writers, and namely, in the treaties of Councils, the which haue bene gouerned by many holy Pastors, as well in the time of the Romane Emperours, as of the kings of the Gothes, and were at the entrie of the Arabians ruined wherefoeuer they commaunded: wherein for the more ease of the reader, we will obserue the order of the Alphabet.

The Arabians Mahumetists which conquered Spaine, were also called I Moores, for that they crossed Mauritania, a region of Africk, which is opposite vnto Spaine, from the which Tingitana is diuided by a small strait, the which when as Tarif passed, was subject vnto the Gothes, and governed by Recila, a friend and partisan to Count Julian. It is therefore expedient to speak something of this nation, whose power in a short time did in a manner surpasse all the Monarchies which have been in the world.

Arabia is a spacious region, diuided into many parts: The ancients made a partition into three; the Happie, the Stonie, and the Defart. Arabia the Happie was so called, in regard of the two other which are barren, little knowne to the ancients, and nothing at all annoyed by the Romane armies. Arabia Petrea or Stonie carried that name of the capitall citie Petra, which had their kings, sometimes friends and allied, but most commonly enemies vnto their neighbours, and often tributaries to the ancient kings of Persia and Ægypt (whereunto they joyne) and afterwards to the Romanes. The Defart Arabia hath not at any time had any certaine policie, and very few townes, whose princes were but leaders of troupes of theues, enemies to all quiet, seeking nothing but warre, mercinarie to kings and princes that would employ them, a people without humanitie, without faith, and without any religion. All this country extends from East to West, almost from the foud Euphrates vnto Nyle, hauing Syria on the North side, and the Ocean to the South. Whilst that the Romane Emperours were in continuall warre against the kings of Parthia and Persia, either partie employed this nation, who went for the most part to the warre on horsebacke, fit to spoyle a country, to seize suddainly vpon a passage, to discover, surprize, or doe any other action of warre, which required expedition, especially if there were more question to forrage & spoyle than to fight. This race is descended from Ismael, of whom it is said, That his hand should be against all, and all hands against him.

2 Among these people Mahumet was borne, in the year of our redemption 580 (some say, it was in the year 591, and others 593) to trouble Christendome, and to punish their ingratitude, which teamed themselves Christians, Maurice being then Emperour of Constantinople. The place of his birth was called Itrarip, a little towne neere vnto Mecque; his father called Abedela, was a Pagan and an Idolatrer, and his mother Emima a Iew, a poore begging gille, the which was taken vp by Abedela for loue, for that she seemed faire. At the age of two yeares he was left an orphan; whereupon he was taken by an vncl of his, called Salutslebi, and bred vp in his house by Halma his wife, vntill the age of sixteene yeares, and then hee was carried away by a troupe of Arabian theetes, who met him alone, and sold him to a rich marchant, who said, That he was of the race of Ismael, and was called Abdimonepli, who employed Mahumet some yeares in his trade of marchandise, whereby he had occasion to see many countries, and to tast many religions, especially the Iewish and Pagan, to the which was added the Christian religion, which was then much corrupted, and was made much worse to him by the conuersation of an Arrian Monke called Sergius, who haunted the house of his master Abdimonepli. With this Monke and others he layed a plot to make himselfe famous by a remarkable impietie, and framed a doctrine drawne from the Iewish and the Arrian, mingled with other their inuentions: the which he afterwards brought in, partly by persuasions, partly by money, and partly by force, being enriched with his masters treasure, after whose death he had married his widow called Adegiah; so as about the year 623 he was receiued and acknowledged by the Arabians for their capitaine and great Prophet. Then was Heraclius in the imperiall seat at Constantinople; and a little before there had risen many seditions in Syria and Ægypt, during the which, Mahumet had plotted his designs, and had made himselfe famous among the seditious. And moreover, certain mercinarie bands of Arabian Scenits being cast and sent away with injuries by the Commisaries of Heraclius the Emperour, he drew them vnto him, and with these forces in a short time seized vpon a great part of Arabia, namely, of the townes of Mecque and Itrarip, the place of his birth, the which was afterwards called Medinah-Al-Nabi, that is to say, the city of the great Prophet; and from the day that place was taken, in the year 617, the Arabians and sectaries of Mahumet account their yeares, as we do ours from the Natiuitie of our Lord Iesus Christ.

Others say, That Medina or Almedina was another rich towne inhabited by rich Jewes, G whereof Mabumet gaue the spoyle to his souldiors, abhorring it about all other sects, for it seemed more opposit to his doctrine than any other; yet it is most certain, that he vsed Jewes to compound his doctrine. And vpon a defeat which the Persians had by the Romanes in those times, he tooke occasion to invade Syria, and seized vpon the countrey about Damas, and then tried to extend his limits all he could, employing in the end of his dayes his Lieutenants to make his conquests, whilst that he rested at Mecque, which was in the beginning the seat of his Empire. In his later daies he made foure capitaines, the which he called the cutting swords of God, the common fort tearmed them Amirans; the which were Ebnubezer, whom some call Vbequer, others Bubacur or Eubocara; then Homar, Ozman, and Aly. This last was son to Salutaleby, Mabumet's vncler. Ebnubezer was his father in law; for Mabumet had many wiues, and Ebnubezer's daughter was called Aixa or Aissa. This monster hauing reigned about ten yeares, hee died at Medinath Al-Nabi, in the house of this Ebnubezer, of poyson, as some say: for hauing published among other articles, That he should rise againe within three dayes after his decaile, one of his disciples impatient to attend, and curious to see the experience of his doctrine, poysoned him secretly: and some say, That he kept him 12 daies, and in the end seeing that he was dead, and his bodie so corrupted and stinking, as no man could endure it, this disciple being forced to retire by reason of the abominable smell of carion, and returning soone after, he found the dogs had come in pieces: wherefore hee gathered the bones together, the which were put in a coffin of yron, and in time caused a chappell to be built, vaulted with adamant stone, so as the cofer being put into it, the vertue of the stone drew it vp into the ayre, where it did hang, which seemed miraculous vnto the ignorant: yet such as haue travelled into those countries in our time, say there is no such thing now to be seene. He had one son called Cacim, who died before him, and many daughters, whereof Fatima is famous among the Arabians, as the stemme of the royall race of Aben-Alabecy, & was wife to Aly, according to the most certaine. Zeinab also, another of Mabumet's daughters, wife to Ozman, or (as some say) to Muhannas (it may be to both successuely) is honoured by this nation, and Muhannas her husband (as the beginning of another royall familie) called Aben-Humeys. There is mention made of Imicaultin and of Nephissa, daughters or neere kinswomen to this false Prophet: The sepulchre of the last was found in Caire by Sultan Selym, Emperour of the Turkes in our fathers time, and in it about the value of 500000 duckats in gold coyned, with much other treasure, which was giuen and carried thither for almes.

Mabumet had decreed, That Aly his cousin german, and sonne in law, one of the abouenamed Amirans, should succeed him in the realme established by him: but Ebnubezer his father in law, who was rich and mightie, and had Ozman and Homar on his side, brake this ordinance: for he pretended, that Mabumet had gotten a great part of that which he enjoyed at his death, by his means, credit, & wealth; & seeing that he died in his house, it was reason he should be his heire. Ozman and Homar were nothing discontented: for hauing also a desire to reigne, they were more willing the crowne should come to Ebnubezer (who they did confidently beleue would soone die, by reason of his age) than vnto Aly, who was young and in the prime of his age. Ebnubezer therefore reigned, & was created High Priest of the Arabians, otherwise called Sarafins, as in the time of the Christian Emperors of the East, who did willingly entertaine this nation, they were commonly called. The name comes of the country Saracena, in Arabia felix, or the happie, in which region, according to the same author, was the towne of Saraca, but farre off from these other people. Howsoever it be, it seemeth this name comes from Sara, Abrahams wife, notwithstanding they auow themselves to be descended from Ismael the son of Agar: but they take no pleasure (he should be termed a chambermaid. Hauing reigned 3 yeares, he died, not without suspicion of poyson: after which time these princes entitled themselves Caliphs, that is to say, Gouernors, Rectors, and foueraigne Princes, properly heires and successors.

After Ebnubezer, Homar held the keeper over the Arabians, being sometimes called Haumar, M sometimes Humar, Hemer & Homar, by writers, to whom is attributed the taking of the towne of Bozra, the chiefe of Arabia, of Damas and of Ierusalem, and in the end of all Phenicia, Syria, Mesopotamia and Egypt. And hauing vanquished Orismada or Harfunda, King of Persia, in battaile, he seized vpon that great and mightie kingdome, to whose succour then came the Turkes from the Caspian ports and straits, but in vaine: so as the name of the Persians was then ex-

A extinguisht, and they were all called Sarafins. He was suspected to be a Christian; for his father Catab was a friend and benefactor to the Christians, whom he drew to Ierusalem, and for that cause built the temple which remains vnto this day, with other shewes of superstition. Homar being in this esteeme with his people, he was slaine by a seruant of his, a Persian, called Amigira, making his prayers vnto God. This prince was hardie and warlike, and did effect great matters: he reigned ten yeares. He died in the yeare of Christ 641, and the 24 of the Arabians rainge.

B Ozman, or Hotman, Asman and Autamar, for this diuersitie of names are found in authors, sonne in law to Mabumet (for they hold, that he was married to two of his daughters, whereof it may be Zeinab was one) was the fourth Caliph of the Arabians. There was already growne great contention among this nation, touching matters of religion, it being vaine and without ground, by reason of many absurdities, which did contradict one another: which was no marvell; for Mabumet being ignorant of all learning, could not set downe his conceptions with any good method or order; but as they came into his braine he wrote them downe, and neuer perused them after: so as oftentimes forgetting what he had before set downe, preached, or otherwise published, he ordained diuers things which were repugnant and absurd. Whereunto the people which then followed him, being all giuen to armes, poore, needie, grosse and ignorant, tooke no good regard, their spirit being attentive to the exterior countenance; and if there were any more subtile, force and danger (lopt their mouths. But after some yeares, C they had more libertie and leasure to thinke thereof, and to examine Mabumet's doctrine which was taught, so as they grew into many disputes. To remedie the which, Ozman caused the papers of the Prophet to be sought out, whereof they found a great cofer full in the house of Aissa his widow, with the helpe whereof he caused their Alcoran, or Alfurcan, to be compiled, shewing himselfe verie liberrall to them that laboured therein. Yet some thinke, that this worke was begun by his predecesour Homar; and that he did reduce it into a better method, and into chapters.

Hubs one of his lieutenants invaded Africke, and ruined Carthage, so as Tunis came then to be well peopled, and soone after Cairoan, an hundred miles vp in the countrey, and somewhat farre from the sea, was built, which since was a royall seat of the Arabians. Muhannas also who gouerned Egypt, went with an infinit number of vessels into Cypres, which island he spoiled. This Muhannas was the founder of Caire, neere vnto the ruines of the auncient D Memphis, the which from a little burrough came to the greatnesse and state wee haue seene in our fathers time, and by his wisdom and conduct the estate of the Arabians was much augmented. He assailed the Romanes armie vpon the confines of Lycia, and put it to rout, so as the emperour Constant then reigning, was forced to flic in a disguised habit. Muhannas being putt vp with this victorie, he besieged and tooke Rhodes, beat downe that great Colosse of the Sunne, being 70 cubits high, or 80, as some write, and sold the metall to a merchant Jew, who laded 900 cammels therewith, and carried moreouer out of that island, infinit other goodly and rich workes, for it was replenished with such things, as Plinie writes, who

E wimeth, that there hath beene numbered in it 73000 figures, or statues, and an hundred Colosses. After these exploits he sent his armie at sea to the island of Sicile, from whence they were repulled by Olympius, Exarch or Gouernour of Italie. He himselfe returned into Syria, and there raised a great armie by land, to invade Capadocia, whither he marched. By these high exploits Muhannas was in great reputation among the Arabians, which made him aspire to the foueraigne dignitie, whereunto the death of the Caliph Ozman seemed to inuite him, wherefore he brought backe his armie.

Ozman died in the twelfth yeare of his rainge, the 653 of our Sauour, and the 36 of the Arabians, being set vpon in his palace by the Sarafins, which were of the faction of Ali his brother in law, they forced him to kill himselfe, for that hee would not fall aliue into their hands. Some write, that Ali himselfe slew him, by the persuation of Aissa Mabumet's widow.

There was great diffention then among the Arabians, vpon the election of a new Caliph: the competitors were Ali, Muhannas, and Mahomet: Ali obtained it by armes against Muhomet, but he was to trie it with Muhannas, who finding himselfe followed by a great armie of old old fouldiers, Egyptians and Syrians, and himselfe being also and expert captain, hee gaue him many crosses for the space of a 11 moneths, so as by a common consent their quarrell was put to the arbitrement of Alfates and Alfasi, two old men of great reputation among them; who notwithstanding could neuer agree, so as they returned againe to armes, till that Ali was slaine by the practises of Muhauis, neere vnto the towne of Cufa in Arabia, and there buried: wherefore the place is called vnto this day Masfad Ali, that is to say, the house of Ali. The inhabitants of Cufa and Aratha, did chuse for Caliph in his place Alhacem, eldest sonne to him and to Fatima, eldest daughter to Mahumet, who in his carriage and behaviour represented his grandfather by his mothers side. Being established, hee marched with an armie against Muhauis, but being one neere vnto another, when as euerie man attended a bloudie battell, suddenly Alhacem, either moued by feare, or pietie, and his natural mildnesse, came and cast himselfe at Muhauis feet, acknowledging him his superiour: so as they entred into Cufa, the which they did ranfome for a great summe of money; and being come from thence to Ictrib, Muhauis set the royall diadem with his own hands vpon Alhacem head, and would haue him raigne, which he assured himselfe would not be long, for hee dyed within fix moneths after. Thus Muhauis being freed from all competitors, raigned alone: he was (according vnto some) sonne in law to Mahumet, hauing married his daughter Zeineb, as it is likely, in her second marriage, from which marriage the royall familie of Aben Humeis is descended. It is hee which changed the Caliphes seat to Damas. He first invaded the Romane empire with happy successe, Constant sitting in the imperiall seat, from whom hee did exact a tribute. He ouerrun Africke, from whence there were brought by the Sarafins aboue fourescore thousand persons, slaues: And in the time of Constantine, sumamed Pogonat, or the Bearded, hee tooke Cizicus a sea towne, from whence afterwards with a great fleet of ships hee infested the prouinces of the empire, yea and Constantinople it selfe, but vnfortunatly for the Arabians: for after great losses both by sea and land, Muhauis remained tributary to the Romanes, to whom hee promised to pay yearly three thousand pounds of gold, fourescore slaues, and as many horses, and withall to deliuer 50 Christian prisoners at the emperors choyce. By this meanes there was a peace, or truce concluded for thirtie yeares, betwixt the Romanes and Arabians; during the which Muhauis began to trouble the Potentates of his owne sect, reformed and subdued the Persians, and gaue them Matur for their Gouernour.

Hizit 6 Caliph

Mahumets sect was spread farre into the East, but with great inconstancie, and mingled with heresies: by reason whereof hee called a Councell at Damas, of the Aliaquins of Mahumets law; whither hee commaunded to bring all the writings that could bee recovered as well of their Prophet Mahumet, as of the Caliphes his successours, and other interpreters: but there was nothing but contention and confusion, without any resolution: Wherefore there were five of the most learned men chosen, that is, Boar, Buora, Anoei, Asterminde, and Dauid, who were enjoined to gather out of all the volumes (the which as they write would haue laden two hundred cammels) what they thought came nearest to their Prophets will, which they held the truth. These being shut into a house, after they had turned ouer, and conferred these writings, they made six bookes of Mahumets doctrine, the which were presented by them, vnto the king or Caliph Muhauis, who published them, and by his authoritie caused them to be receiued, vpon paine of death to any one that should dispute the contrary. The rest of the papers were some in peeces, and cast into the riuer. From these six volumes there haue since growne foure sects among them, the Melicians, Alafians, Alambelians, and Buanifians, the which maintaine themselves at this day in the great cite of Caire. After these things Muhauis dyed at Damas, an excellent prince, and verie warlike, of an actiue spirit, nature recompensing that which he wanted by art: for he could neither read nor write, to the great griefe of them of his sect, whom they held verie fit to haue advanced it, if he had been learned. He died in the three score and seuenteenth yeare of his age, 678 M of our redemption, and sixtie one of the raigne of the Arabians, hauing raigned 24 or 25 yeares.

Hizit his sonne, or Gizit, or Iezid, was chosen Caliph after him, degenerating wholly from his father: For as he was actiue, resolute, and valiant, so this was base, voluptuous, and a coward: Whereupon Matur (whom his father had placed Gouernour of Persia) made himselfe

A himselfe king and Caliph, faining to be a Prophet; and of his race the Sophies which raigne thereat this day are descended. The people of Cufa in Arabia, seeing the vnworthinesse of Hizit, chose Hocem the sonne of Ali Caliph against him; but he was slaine by Abdalla the son of Hizit, leauing twelue sonnes, which were, Zemal, Abadin, Zemal, Muamed, Bagner, Muamed, Taguin, Muamed, Giasfar, Cadeneg, Giasfar, Musfa, Ali, Mucerali, Alle, Muamet, Taguin, Musmet, Hal, maguin, Ali, Hacem, Asquerin, Hacem, Muamed, Mahadin alone of all the brethren, is not yet dead, The Persians beleue, that Hacem Muamed Mahadin alone of all the brethren, is not yet dead, and that he will come one day mounted vpon a braue horse, to conuert all the world, and to preach the law to all men, beginning with the towne of Masfad Ali, where his grandfather was interred, where at this day they keepe a horse readie for him, the which they lead vnto their Mosquee, when they doe their seruice, with torches and lights in great pompe.

B Hocem being slaine, and Hizit dead the third yeare of his raigne, Abdalla there raigned: Ciuite warres in Arabia. but for that he was a tyrant, they aduanced Marian to the dignitie of Caliph, betwixt which the two warre continued two yeares: at the end whereof the Arabians held an assembly, in manner of a parliament, at Cufa, a towne in Arabia the happie, where Abdalla being deposed, Abdimeles was chosen in his place, who was verie young, of the race of Ali, and therefore much honoured by the Arabians: For Ali (as we haue said) was appointed heire and successor by the Prophet Mahumet, whereas Abdalla descended from Ebubezer, who had beene an vlturper. There was another nobleman of Arabia, called Dadac, which did bandie himselfe against Abdimeles, and was vanquished by him: but Abdalla did still hold the cite of Damas, and pursued another Caliph which was risen in Mesopotamia, which country is now called Diarbec. Against him Abdimeles sent a great captain, a kinsman of his, called Ciasfar, who hauing encountered Abdalla vpon the riuer Euphrates, returning victoriously from Mesopotamia to Damas, fought with him and defeated him, but with great effusion of blood.

C Abdalla being vanquished, thinking to saue himselfe in Damas, hee was kept out by the inhabitants, for his tyrannies: wherefore he fled to Caire, which at that time was not verie great, where they also refused him the entrie. Being therefore chased, and abandoned by all men, thinking to crosse ouer into Greece, he was slaine in a little island, whither a torment had cast him. With him ended the race of the Caliphes of Damas, called by the Arabians, Marau-
D nians, descending from Muauia and Ebubezer. Ciasfar pursuing his victorie, entred into Damas, and there vied all the cruelties he could against the Marauinians, taking the bones of the Caliph Hizit out of his graue, the which he burnt publicly, and cast the ashes into the riuer. Yet one of Muauis descendents, called Abedramun, escaped, flying into the furthest parts of Libia, towards the West Ocean, into Mauritania Tingitana, whither the Arabians were newly come: For all the length of Asfick, from Nile vnto the Ocean (except some places vpon the sea coast, which were yet subject vnto the Romane empire) had beene ouerrun and subdued by this nation. There this prince being acknowledged by the Sarafins to be of the race of the Caliphes of Damas, was well entertained and honoured by them: Wherefore taking courage, he erected an Estate, and built the towne of Maroc, which was afterwards the head of a great kingdom. He was the first which called himselfe Miralummin, that is to say, Prince of the beleueurs. Abdimeles nor Ciasfar pursued him not, being verie farre off, and for that he had limited his desires and ambition in those remote parts, but about all the attempts of the Romanes, did much trouble Abdimeles, so as he was forced to renew a peace with the emperours of Constantinople, and make the Arabians againe tributary to Iustinian the 2 then raigning, promising to pay him ten pounds of gold, a slaue, and a horse euery day: by reason of which peace so deere bought, he conuerted his forces against Persia, whereas one Abdalla Zubir had newly seized vpon that region, after that he had vanquished and slaine Matur, who had vsurped it vpon the Caliph Hizit. Abdimeles sent all his forces against this Abdalla, and hauing chased him out of Persia, he recovered that prouince. Then he sent one of his captaines, called Cagian, to pursue Abdalla, who was retired to Mecque, where hee was besieged, the towne taken, and Abdalla slaine by Cagian, who then burnt the auncient idole, and the temple there.

D After these things, the Caliph Abdimeles was againe engaged in warre against the Christians, by the treacherie of Iustinian, who snarred for it: for being defeated with most of the Grecians, Abdalla deposed and Abdimeles chosen the ninth Caliph.

Grecians, he was forced to save himself by flight, and was afterwards chased out of the imperial seat by Leonce, with great troubles throughout all the Eastern empire of the Christians: whereby the Caliph had not only means to recover all the Romans had taken from him in Asia, but also to chase their Gouvernours and armies out of all Africke, so as there was nothing remaining of the Romane name: yet his lieutenants were beaten invading Cilicia, by the care and conduct of Heraclius, a Romane captain, about which time Abdimeles dyed, having reigned over the Arabians one and twentie yeares. Whilest hee was busie in these warres, the same of the sanctitie and justice of Abdramon (who as wee have said had built Maroc) grew so great, as he was held by those Westerne Arabians for Caliph, and more than a Caliph: and the opinion of his vertues passing into Arabia, and throughout all the East, it happened, that dying and leaving his sonne Plus successeur of his goods and good fame, all the Arabians with one generall consent chose him for their Caliph in the place of Abdimeles, who dyed in the yeare seven hundred and seven. So the race of the Marauitians reigned againe, which was the posteritie of Zeineb, daughter to Mahumet, ingendred (as some beleue) on Aissa the daughter of Ebubezer.

*Plus Caliph of the Arabians,
the gouernour
of the Arabians,
and the 707 of Christ.*

Plus was the mightiest of all the Arabian princes, his predecessors, reigning in a manner from the Western Ocean, vnto the river Indus. He gaue the gouernment of Africk to Musa, with the title of Admirall, and in a manner absolute power, all which was subject to his empire, except a small portion of the country which the Gothes held neere vnto the strait, whereas the towne of Cepta stands, the which is now called Ceuta: all the rest had bin conquered by his predecessors, Caliphs. You must vnderstand, that the Arabians entring into Africke, they brought in Mahumets law, their language and their manners: so as the great number of Christians was much decreased, but not wholly extinguished, and many goodly churches came to ruine: the African tongue was in a manner lost, and the Arabian was made common. Yet there is at this day a certaine people found, which haue preserved the Africaine tongue, as the Biscanians haue done the antient Spanish, as some hold. They dwell in the mountains of the kingdom of Sus, about Cap d'Aguer, towards the Westerne Ocean, and call their language Thamazet, the which differs from the Arabian as much as the Biscan from the Castilian: and the Moors of qualitie in that country, learne the Arabic tongue in schools, or in courts, that they may be able to conuerse with them. It hath also appeared since, that many families haue retained the Christian religion, and the holy Scriptures, with some forme of Sacraments, but not altogether pure: for Ferdinand the third, called the Holy, reigning in Castille, and since in the reign of Iohn the first, there were found in the citie of Maroc, certaine antient families, called Farfanes, which retained still the name and profession of Christians, about 680 yeares after that the Sarafins had seized vpon Africk, whereof some came into Spaine, to Alcala de Henares. Moreover, it was seene in our daies, that after that the citie of Tunis had been taken by the emperor Charles the 5, from Haradin Barberousse, there were many habitations of Christians in that citie, having retained, and as it were inherited from father to sonne, for the space of about 800 yeres, the articles of our Faith, not without great admiration of the diuine providence, who liued in a suburbs without the towne, at the South gate, men much esteemed of their kings, and valiant and hardie in the warres. They had a temple separated from the Moors, who called them Rabatines, and of them the gards of the kings perfort did consist. These Rabatines were afterwards transported to Naples by the emperor, that they might be instructed in the Romish religion.

3 Whilest that Plus reigned over the Arabians, and that Musa gouerned Africk, the Moors passed into Spaine, as we haue said, against the kingdom of the Gothes, whereby there followed a lamentable desolation: a nation without doubt fatal to Christendome, which had shewed it selfe rebellious, and to contemne so many graces it had received: For in that age, ambition and tyrannie did tread all diuine and humane lawes vnder foot, and all good order was peruerced, as well in Ecclesiasticall as ciuile gouernments. The bishops did then contend for the Primacie, being growne insolent, by the carelesse of princes, who had referred the whole charge of affaires vnto them, abandoning themselves in the meane time to pleasures and disordnat lulls, with an opinion to be absolved of all their excess, in building of churches, conuents, and retreats for Clergie men, and endowing them with great reuenues, diuiding with them the spoyle they tooke from the people: who for their parts being ill instructed, and corrupted with the superstitions and traditions of men, could doe no other service vnto God, but set vp Images and altars, seeke out the bones of dead Saints, and such other things, little seruing to true pietie; thinking the paine they tooke in these exercises, a good satisfaction for all their offences. To conclude, there was then so great a confusion (the which is not yet amended) as God being justly offended, gaue scope to the furie of the Arabian nation, the which invaded the Potentates of Christendome with such furie, as in lesse than an hundred yeares they ouerthrew all the power and riches of the Romane empire, of the Persians, and of other Estates. This was not a passage, as that of the Gothes, Hunnes, Lombards, and other nations of Sithia: the which passed soone away, as an overflowing deluge, or if they stayed among vs, they soone conformed themselves to humanitie, pietie, and justice: but this plague was durable, and did still increase; for the Turke empire at this day is nothing but a remainder of the Arabians, mingled with the Hunnes, from whence the Turkes are come. There remaine few certaine families of that Turkish nation which came from the Caspian straits, in the time of Orismada the last king of Persia, who was defeated by Hauumar, Caliph or king of the Sarafins, and the which did afterwards vanquish them: and yet they grew so familiar with them, as after that time the Turkes and Sarafins were reputed but one nation.

We haue thought it expedient, for the more light of our historie, to make this digression and to seeke out the beginning of this indomptible power of the Arabians, and to relate the succession of that Estate, vntill their entrie into Spaine vnder the conduct of Tarif, or Tarif Aben Zate, who defeated king Roderic, as we haue shewed in the former booke, where this king dyed, and in a manner all the flower of the nobilitie of the countrey, in the yeare of our saluation seven hundred and foureteene, in July, or according vnto some, in September.

Returning then to our historie, we say, That the Arabians, or Moors (as wee will rearme them indifferently hereafter) hauing obtained this great victorie, in a realme without forts, it was then easie for them to rauage and spoile the whole country at their pleasure, seeing there was no force to withstand them. They diuided their armie into many troupes, & at one instant assailed all the places which they thought to be of any strength. One of their armies went against Malaga, and tooke it: another marched to Cordoua, vnder the conduct of a Christian Kenigado, called Magetard. Tarif with another troupe tooke Iacn, then called Mentifa, which defended it selfe to the last extremitie; the which he raied: then he tooke Toledo and Guadala. And passing on, hauing for his guide Mugnuza, or Numatius, a Goth, hee came vnto the laira. And passing on, he seized vpon Gigion and Astorga. Returning towards Catalogne, vnder the conduct of Mugnos, earle of Cerdagne, he made himselfe master of that countrey and left the earle there for Gouvernour. Another armie conquered the countries of Murcia and Granado, but not without resistance: for neere vnto Horiuela there was a cruell battell, the place carries the name vnto this day of the bloody field, yet the Sarafins were victors. Valencia yielded after that the inhabitants had beene beaten in field, yet vpon condition, to leaue a temple to the Christians, which is now that of S. Bartholomeu, and was then a colledge of S. Basil. Among other riches, mention is made of a table of Emeraude, which they carried away, the which was in a place since called Medina Talmeld, it is Sigenza, or Medina Zelin. It was rather a certaine kind of Indian Iasp, very like vnto an Emeraude, and very common in the East, whereof they hold, that Catin to be, which is so famous at Genua. The greedinesse of spoyle was the reason they wanted not any souldiors, for all Africk posted thither. The taking of Toledo was vpon a Palme Sunday, in the yeare 715, by the treacherie of the Iewes, whilest the Christians were at a Sermon at S. Leocades church in the suburbs.

Musa Gouverneur of Africk, jealous of the fortunat successe of Tarif, came himselfe in person into Spaine, and would haue the best part of the spoile. Afterwards they made war jointly together, notwithstanding that they were deadly enemies, and took Saragoffe & other towne. The reliques of Saints which they had so much reuerenced, and worshipped in stead of God, could neither defend the Spaniards, nor save themselves: for it is to be presumed, that these Barbarians did not bear them any great respect, after they had seized vpon the ornaments and chests of gold or siluer, where they had bin kept: yet if you will beleuee by the care of the Clergie

Clergie, and other deuout men, who transported some into Fraunce, others into Germanie, England, and other places, where in the time of our predecessors they were yet worshipped. Some authors write, That the Moores were eight moneths about the conquest of Spaine, others foureteeen, many two yeares; but the most probable, five yeares: for it is not credible, that so great a country, where there were so many Christians, and so many places of strength, at the least by nature, should fall in so short a time into the Infidels power, without any opposition: for they maintaine, That in diuers encounters, assaults, and sieges of townes and castles, there died about seuen hundred thousand Christians. Tarracone among others defended it selfe vntuouly, who shewed by their valour, that it was a true auuntine Colonie of the Romanes. In the end God hauing decreed to punish this people for their sinnes, and to admonish the other profaners of his glorie, it was forced to yield.

All the regions, cities, townes, and castles of Spaine, except some places in the mountaines of Asturia, Biscaie, and Nauarre, were made subiect and tributaries to the Moores; who had no great care at that time to force men in their religion, but did allow them the exercise thereof: and to some townes they granted many priuiledges, for that they would not vnpeople the country, burthening them with great tributes, which was all they fought.

The citie of Toledo among others had seuen churches granted them for the exercise of their religion, which were, S. Iuste, S. Luke, S. Torquat, S. Marke, S. Eulalie, S. Sebastian, and S. Marie. Moreouer, it was granted, that they should haue iudges of their owne religion and nation, and be gouerned by the lawes of the kings of Gothes, with other priuiledges. By this means the Moores retained an infinit number of Christian families, which liued and multiplied vnder them, else Spaine had bene left desart, for the Arabians could not people it. The Christians which liued among the Arabians, were called Musarabes (as it is likely) of the name of the Gouernour Musa, who would bee famous by this conquest. These Musarabes Christians did celebrate their diuine seruice, as it had bene vsed in the time of the kings of Gothes, and according to the institution of Isidorus bishop of Seuille, or of Leandre, as they had accustomed to serue God in those times throughout all Spaine, and continued vntill the seruice, called Gregorian, or Romane, was brought in, as we shall shew hereafter. This Musarabic seruice, is entertained at this day for a marke of antiquitie, in the chappell of the companie of Christs bodie, in the great church of Toledo, and in other places of that citie. They hold it for certaine, that all the Moores and other Africanes which past into Spaine, were not of Mahomet's sect, but a good number of them were Christians: For it is not credible, that the Africanes, who were made subiect vnto the Arabians, a little before their passage into Spaine, borne and bred in the Christian religion, and vnder Christian princes, should so soone haue changed their religion: But it is probable, that being newly subiect to the Mahometane kings, many followed their armies wheresoeuer they went, without any scruple of religion, although they were Christians, hauing no other end but spoile, as most fouldiours doe commonly.

The kings and Caliphes of the Arabians, did not care to force people newly conquered, to change their religion, but suffered them to liue with libertie, least they should vnpeople the country, and diminish the fruits of their victories. And that Africke had preferred families of Christians, it is verified by experience, as we haue formerly shewed. The like was in Spaine, the which notwithstanding the government of the Moores, did still retaine a great number of Christians, as well borne in the country, as others that came out of Africke to dwell there, holding the Moores partie, the which made the enterprises of the kings of Leon and Castille, and of other Christian princes, more easie to be executed, when following the steps of Pelagius (who first tooke arms against the Moors) they began to recouer the country.

Pelagius first King of the Asturians, the deliuerer of Spaine.

4 Pelagius (as we haue said) was the sonne of Pasila, Gouernour of Biscaie, whom Vitiza before he was king had slain, that he might more freely enjoy his vnchast wife: After whose death Pelagius retired himselfe into a place of safetie in the mountaines, and there was pre-

A preferred through the fauour of his kinsmen and friends, by the prouidence of God, who had so decreed to giue a beginning to the deliuerie of Spaine. They say, that the Cantabrians were the last people of Spaine, which were made subiect to the Roman power; and the last also that were drawne away, to vndergoe the Gothes yoke: whom notwithstanding they could neuer so subiect, as they would euer yeeld to any other lawes and manners, than those that were fit for them. During the Moores conquest, it is also to be presumed, that they maintained themselves in some libertie; and in like manner all the other people of Spaine, where as the mountaines, and places of hard access, gaue them any means to defend themselves. Yet we must confesse, that they could not altogether assure themselves from that horrible inundation; but they escaped better then the rest of the Spaniards which were found in the champion countrey of more easie access. The which is euident, by the report which the Spanish Authors make of this Pelagius; saying, That after the Moores had reigned five yeres in Spaine, he hauing resolved in himselfe to giue some succours to the afflicted Christians, left his secret retreats, and came into the Asturias of Ouedo, where there was one Xymastius, otherwise called Magnusa, by corruption of the language; a Christian by profession, but seruing the Moores, and by them made Gouernour of the countrey of Gigion, into whose friendship and seruice he did insinuate himselfe. Wherby we may coniecture, that betwixt the Moores and Cantabrians there was some comenage, some league, and (it may be) subiection, yet vpon honest and tollerable conditions, by reason of the strong situation of their countrey.

As Iust had bene the cause of the ruine of the kingdome of the Gothes in Spaine, so voluptuous desire made the Moores power decrease there. For Pelagius hauing a faire and louely sister in his house, this Magnusa grew in loue with her; and fearing he should not obtaine her, she being wise, and well bred, her brother being in the countrey, he resolved to giue him a commission, to goe to the great Admirall Musai embassade, to Cordoua, during which voyage he forced this Gentlewoman. Pelagius aduerted at his returne of what had past, notwithstanding that all might be couered vnder colour of mariage, which Magnusa said he had promised to his sister, yet he held this rape and violence done to the contempt and dishonour of his house: but he dissembled it for the present, and when he found a conuenient opportunitie, he retired himselfe with his sister into the strongest parts of the mountaines of Asturia, watching meanes to reuenge himselfe. Magnusa incensed, for that he had taken her from him whom he loued, and who he said was his wife, and finding his honour thereby interested, he gaue the Gouernours and Commanders of the Arabians in Spaine to vnderstand, That Pelagius made attempts against their State: wherefore thinking it needfull to prevent it in time, they sent great store of souldiers to Magnusa, to suppress him, who had almost surprised him: but it was the will of God that Pelagius should haue intelligence of this storme which was coming towards him: who hauing past the riuer of Pionia, he retired into the vallie of Cangas, where he found many wandering Christians, liuing in those places in great feare of the Moores. Whose wills he hauing founded, and exhorted them to be courageous, and to fight valiantly for the common cause, and to relie vpon the assistance of God, he found them readie to imploy themselves for the libertie of their countrey; and moreover they were so affected vnto him, as they chose him their captaine and leader in this worthie enterprise, giuing him then the title of King. And within few dayes the butte of this enterprise being dispersed through the mountaines, the Christians which lay hidden, came vnto him from all parts, so as in a short time he found himselfe strong ynough to defend himselfe against any that should come to assaile him. The Moores armie hauing failed at this time, returned to Cordoua.

We may well coniecture, that Pelagius was of the Gothick race, yet the Spaniards denie it, hauing no forcible argument, but that the name of Pelagius was not vsuall among the Gothes, and they maintaine, without any other proofes, That he was defended of that countrey by long succession, wherof we can speake nothing assured: But whatsoever he were, that honor is due vnto him, as a valiant Prince: for although it seemes that he was forced to take armes for the private iniurie done vnto his sister, and himselfe; yet he shewed great discretion, that he could wisely ioyn the publick cause with his priuat interest, and pursue the reuenge of the one and the other, by all the iust means which opportunitie and the estate of their affairs did allow.

cannot long containe it selfe in any good order, nor vnder one prince, or lawfull magistrat. G According to their naturall disposition, those which inhabited Spaine, made hauooke of all things by their robberies and thefts: whereupon this Viceroy Adam punished many of them by pecuniarie fines, and thereby made himselfe partaker of their spoyle. They say he exacted the fifth part of their substance: the which he did also of the inhabitants of the townes and castles of Spaine, which he tooke by force, and the twentieth part of them which yielded willingly vnto him. He died at Tortose, returning from the spoyle of Tarrasone. At that time the Sarrafines made great conquests in Gaule; they tooke Narbone, and besseged Toulouse, vnder the conduct of Zama, who was slaine there. Eude, a Goth, a nobleman of Biscaye, Duke of Aquitaine in the right of his wife, kindled this warre, and perswaded Muniz, a Moore, making warre in Languedoc, to rebellion against Abderramen; giuing him a daughter of his to wife. By reason whereof he was assailed by Abderramen, besieged, and taken in Cerdagne, and his head sent with his wife into Africke. Abderramen pursuing his victorie, against Eude, defeated him neere Arles, and gaue him another rout about Bourdeaux, spoiling and burning all the country betwixt the Pyrenees & the riuer of Loire: Yet in the end they concluded a peace, the Moore fearing the French whom he had incensed by these spoiles.

Eude died in the year 725, whom Eucled his sonne succeeded, and was vnfortunate. During whose raigne, Eude Duke of Aquitaine, being threatened by the French, who raigne in Gaule, to whom he was suspect: and fearing their power, he called in against them that great multitude of Arabians, and Sarrafines, which were defeated in Touraine by Charles Martel; which some affirme, were aboute four hundred thousand men, who notwithstanding were betrayed, and abandoned to the slaughter, by Eude, hauing ioyned with Martel the day of the battell, and turned his forces against them who were come, by his persuation, to inhabit Gaule. Their Generall Abderramen gouernour of Spaine, was slaine there, with aboute three hundred thousand Arabians. This memorable battell, which saued Gaule and the kingdome of the French from vtter ruine, was fought in the year 730, or according to some Spanishe Authors, 734: who say, That during these practises, Pope Gregorie the third then resident at Rome, had sent vnto Eude certaine hallowed sponges, the which being cut into small peeces, and distributed among the souldiers, preserved all such as carried them from being wounded, both in that battell, and afterwards in all other encounters.

Eucled sent Isabes into Spaine for Viceroy, who gouerned two yeares, and was the first, residing at Cordoua. To Isabes Adaisa Alcazax succeeded, a rash inconsiderate man, and therefore soone deposed: whom Himen succeeded, who liued but six monethes; and then Autun was aduanced, but he died within foure monethes after. Albatan followed him, who was cruell and inhumane, by reason whereof he lost both gouernment and life, by the commandement of the great Emperour or Caliph, Eucled, hauing gouerned Spaine two moneths only. It may be it was in his time that the children of Eude Duke of Aquitain deceased, being depriv'd of their possessions by the tyranie of the French, called the Arabians and Sarrafines againe into Gaule, who spoiled the whole country betwixt the Pyrenees and the riuer of Loire, Languedoc, and Prouence, and seized vpon many strong places, whereof Auignion was one. The sons of Eude were Hunola, Isfar and Azner. The head of the Moors in this expedition, were Albin and Amorthee: Albin was defeated by Charles Martel, and being chased out of Auignion, he fled to Narbone: where being besieged, Amorthee coming out of Spaine to raise the siege, he was also defeated with all his armie, and pursued and slaine neere to Colible, at the foot of the Pyrenees. Charles Martel pursuing his victorie, committed greater spoiles then the Sarrafines and Infidels had done. Albin saued himselfe in Spaine, and hauing afterwards past into Africk, he died at the siege of Tanger.

This yere of Christ 735 king Pelagius died at Cangas, leauing to succeed him his son Fafila, and his daughter Orsinde, or Ormisinde, the wife of Alphonso of Biscaye, one after another; hauing reigned 19 yeres, or 17 according to the most certain. His wife was called Gaudisela. M They were interred in the church of S. Zalala of Valania.

Fafila second King of Ouiedo.

Fafila sonne to Pelagius, second king of Ouiedo, reigned only two yeares. He was not so carefull as his father, to aduance the Christians Estate in Spaine. The Moors in like manner did not arme against him, for they were much troubled with the French warres. Wherefore this king giuing himselfe to the pleasure of hunting, more then was fit for his estate (not yetted) was slaine by a Beare, which he pursued in the mountains, being abandoned by his followers: VVhich some hold was in the year 737, but Gariay says, that there is a great error in the computation of these yeares. He was married to a Ladie called Froleus, and they are both interred at S. Croix neere to Cangas.

After the death of Albatan gouernour of Spain, Manes succeeded, who continued not long: then Mahumet, who liued but two monethes: After him Abderramen, who gouerned three yeares; who being dead, Abdemele ruled Spaine foure yeares, who punished some peticie tyrants, and hauing drawne a new people out of Africke, he filled the townes that were made desolate by the aboue mentioned defeats. He was chased out of his gouernement by Othas, who held it five yeares: then Abdemele returned, and gouerned a yere and a halfe, in whose place Alcatran was gouernour: who seeking to free Spaine of many strange souldiers; who were entertained then by the Caliph, he was slaine by them: So as the gouernment was vsurped by Aben Hax, who was presently set vpon by the children of Alcatran, who hauing vanquished him, he died within 15 dayes after: and then there grew great diuisions and troubles in Spaine; to suppress the which, the Emperour of the Arabians king Zubeir with great forces, who pacified all these diffentions, and contented the mutined souldiers with great entertainments: to satisfie the which, he tooke from the Christians (which liued vnder the subiection of the Moors) the third part of their goods. This gouernour Zubeir meaning to enter into Gaule, was prevented by the king of the French, who it seemes was Pepin, and defeated beyond the Pyrenees. He also sent a captaine against D. Alphonso the first, king of Ouiedo: but he was vanquished by the Christian armie; and in this battell were slaine all the Arabian souldiers which had murined. After Zubeir, Abderramen came to gouerne Spaine: then Iber Vezit, who liued little, and to him succeeded Abubacar, but he was slaine there, and in his place Reduan gouerned at Cordoua. It was the seat for the generall Gouernour of all Spain, of whom depended all other Gouernours, Captaines, or Admiralls.

Alphonso, the first of that name, and third King of Ouiedo.

Alphonso called the Catholike, sonne to Peter, Duke or Gouernour of the Cantabrians, Ouida or Biscains (of the Gothes race) descended from king Ricardo, succeeded Fafila in the kingdome of Ouiedo, in the right of his wife Orsinde, or Ormisinde, daughter to Pelagius, and sister to Fafila, in the year of Christ 737, and of their Era 775. It is likely this was the first woman which did inherit the Crowne in Spaine, vnto king D. Alphonso were chosen king by the Spaniards, the which is credible: for the right of succession was not then in vse among those people, in regard of kingdomes. It is likely the name of Catholike was giuen to this Alphonso, by some writers, for that he was a deuout Prince, and verie curious to enrich temples: yet the title of Catholike which is giuen to the kings of Spaine at this day, comes not from him, the which we know was granted by Pope John the eighth, vnto king D. Alphonso the third; and by Pope Julie the second, vnto the king D. Ferdinand the first, in the time of our fathers, for some considerations which we will hereafter shew. This prince was warlike, and tooke from the Sarrafines the townes of Lugo, Tuy, Astorga, and a great part of old Castille, the second yere of his raigne: then Porto, Beia, Flavia, Ledesma, Zamora, Cimancas, Duegnas, Saldagne, Miranda, Segobia, Ofine, Auila, Sepulueda, Birbieca, and all the country of Bureba, Brage, Vila, Salamanca, and others, which at this day belong to Portugal, Leon, Castille, & Nauarre, restoring the Bishops to their ancient sees, cherishing the Clergie, and making libraries in many parts of his country: he also tooke the towne of Pampelone in Nauarre. All which conquests he made, the Moors being not only busied in the warres of France, but in ciuile diffentions among themselves; being also fauored & receiued by the Christians which were the inhabitants in many places, whom they called Musarabes, liuing tributaries vnder the Moors. In his time Cixila was Bishop of the Musarabes of Toledo, a holy and learned man, as they say, who succeeded Vrbain, & after him Peter, surnamed the Faire, gouerned that church.

Three Sunnes
fene in Spaine.

Ouiedo built.

The estate of the Arabians was full of troubles after the death of the Mirabumun Enlid, being in contention for the government: in the which Gizeis the third was slaine, and Euseus his sonne remained Emperour, who reigned a yeare: After whom Marnan, of the race of Humeis, reigned six yeares. But there grew great civill warres by reason of these diuisions, the which in the end ruined their Estate. In the year 753 Tosha was sent to gouerne in Spaine, a souldier, and a man of worth; but he liued onely a yeare. Ioseph was substituted in his place, a great enemy to the Christians: who hauing bene vnfortunate in his warres against king Fruele, who slue about 50000 of his men in two battels: he was disdaind by the Moores in Spaine, who called in Abderramen to rule ouer them.

At that time there were three Sunnes seene in Spaine, and for the space of two yeres there fell not any raine from heauen, which caused a great dearth of corne, and of all other things: and soone after king Alphonso died. Some hold that this king was the founder of the towne of Ouiedo, whereof he intituled himselfe king: others say it was Pelagius; and some make it more auncient. He reigned 19 yeares, and liued 64, and was buried with his wife in S. Maries monasterie at Cangas. They held him for a Saint, and they say, that at his funeral there were voices heard singing in the aire, this verse in Latine; Ece quo modo tollitur iustus, & nemo considerat, ablatu est à facie iniquitatis, & erit in pace memoria eius: Behold how the iust man is taken away, and no man considers it; he is taken from the face of iniquitie, and his memorie shall rest in peace. He had three sonnes by his wife Ormeisinde; Fruele, who succeeded him in the kingdom of Ouiedo, Vimarán, and Aurelius; and one daughter Odesinde: he had also one sonne called Maregat, by a concubine.

8 IN the year 756 Fruele was king in the place of his father Alphonso. They attribute to him, as a holy ordinance, that he did forbid the Clergie of Spaine to marie, the which they had vsed, and it may be abused since the reigne of Vitiza, and had made them subiect to the decree of Pope Gregorius the first, and the Councell of Rome. This act is written of him as good and holy, although in many other things he shewed himselfe cruell and wicked. Ioseph K gouernour for the Moores being in armes against him, and hauing spoyle the confines of Galicia, they came to battell, which Fruele won: he slue 54000 Moores, and put the rest with their Commaunder to a shamefull flight.

Garcia Ximenes, who (as we haue said) had begun a principallie or royaltie in Sobrabre, tooke to wife a Ladie of a noble house, called Inigo; by whom he had one sonne, called Garcia Inigo. He intituled himselfe king of that countrey: wherewith the Nauarrois being discontented, they abandoned him, and ioined to the king of Ouiedo. The first occasion which the Christians (inhabiting in the mountaines of Nauarre and Arragon) tooke to erect an Estate, and make head against the Moores, was of an assemblie at the interment of an Hermit which liued in the rockes nere vnto Iaca. This Hermit was buried in the place whereas afterwards the L monasterie of S. Iohn de la Pognas was built, the which at the first was a Colledge of Chanoins. Garcia Ximenes reigned 42 yeares, and left his pettie kingdom to Garcia Inigo his sonne, to whom the Nauarrois submitted themselves againe: but Fruele reigning in Ouiedo, forced them by armes to returne to his obedience.

Ouiedo.

Title of Dom
first vsed.Frailan was her his brother.

Froila married the daughter of Eude Duke of Aquitaine, called Menine, or according vnto some, Memerane; by whom he had two sonnes, Alphonso, called the Chast, and Bernard, or Vermond, both which reigned, although that D. Bernard was made by the Clergie: and moreover he had a daughter by her, called D. Ximene, who was mother to Bernard of Carpio. This king did first vse the title of Dom, which the king and all the Noblemen of Spaine haue euer since obserued. What the furious desire of raigne is, and with what ieaousie kings are often tormented, Fruele shewed by the cruell parricide of his brother Vimarán, whom he caused to be slaine through ieaousie, seeing him to be a gallant Knight, and generally beloued for his good parts; yet he repented the fact, but too late. For satisfaction whereof, they write, that he adopted the sonne of Vimarán, called Vermond, to succeed him in the kingdom: the which hath bred some doubt, whether this Vermond (which came to the Crowne in the fourth

A fourth place after Fruele) were the sonne of Vimarán, or of Fruele himselfe; who soone after was also slaine by his other brother Aurelius, in reuenge of the death of Vimarán, hauing reigned eleven yeares and a halfe, or therabouts.

9 During the reigne of this king the Arabians diuided themselves wholly from the Caliphs of Damas, under Abderramen, who chased and in the end slew the Gouernour or Viceroy Ioseph, made himselfe king, and Mirabumun or Miramonnelin, and held Spaine with that title 33 yeares, not acknowledging the Emperour or Caliph of Damas in any thing. This was in the year 757 of our redemption, and 138 yeares after the Moores descent in Spaine; by reason of the diuision of the fouraigine dignitie of the Arabians in the East: for against Marnan, who had succeeded Hzet, Caliph of the Arabians at Damas, there had risen many tyrants, whereof he punished some, but Asmulin vanquished him. This was of the race of Muter, who had reigned in Persia, and followed his feet, maintaining that Ali had bene the true Prophet, and greater then Mahomet: he commaunded then ouer the Corsenens, a people in Persia: He was aduised by Cataban his friend, to procure the slaues throughout all Persia to kill their masters, and to rob them; the which they did, and came rich with their masters spoyle to Asmulin. Soone after being impatient of ease, they diuided themselves into two sects, the Calimes and Lamponites; Asmulin taking part with the Lamonites, defeated the others, and with his victorious bands assailed Iolun, Gouernour of Persia, vnder the Caliph Marnan, whom he vanquished and Marnan also, who came against him with about three hundred thousand fighting men, forcing him to flee into Egypt, whither he was followed, defeated, and slaine by Salin, the sonne of Asmulin, by whom through his victories the kingdom of the Persians was settled in his familie. The rest of Marnans familie and followers were disperfed in Affricke, where they erected the kingdom of Fez, and some passed into Spaine, which might be that race of Abderramen, of whom we here intreat; who notwithstanding Alse affirms was basely defended: and Garibny on the other side sayes, that he was issued from the race of Aben Humeis, and from Zaireb the daughter of Mahomet. His father was called Mosbia, and his seat was also at Cordoua: he brought his armie before Valence, which resisted him, and tooke it. They say, that the bones of S. Vincent were worshipped there, and that many families among these Christians, ill instructed, fearing the coming of this Sarracene king, dilodged, and carried these relikes into the woods and mountaines, which lye betwixt Valence and the mouth of the riuer of Guadiana: and hauing passed vnto that point which in old time was called the holie Promontorie, they were encountered by a Moore of Fez, called Alibouz, who rauaged the countrey of Algarbe; he slew these men, tooke their children prisoners, and left S. Vincent's bones vpon the field, where they were afterwards found, and thereof this Promontorie was called Cap S. Vincent.

C The Almighty God (although that he had deliuered his Church into the hands of Barbarians and Infidels, by reason of the prophanation of his name, and that the Spaniards made little vse of their chastisements) maintained alwaies some light of the Gospell among them, raising vp men, who entertained some order and shew of Christianitie, and had the Scriptures and their ceremonies throughout all the towne of the Moores jurisdiction. They make mention of Venus Bishop of Seule, at that time a learned man, and of a good life. Cixilas was Archbishop of Toledo, to whom P. Adrian (as the Spanish Authors say) did write a letter, blaming the custome of the Christians in Spaine to eat flesh on Saterdayes; wherefore they made an order, not to eat any that day but the entrailes, head, and feet of beasts, the which hath bene since obserued.

D Aurelius succeeded his brother D. Fruele in the realme of Ouiedo, hauing slaine him in the year 767. notwithstanding that, he left a sonne called D. Alphonso the chast, with father children: but the hatred which the noblemen of the countrey did beare vnto his father, was the cause of his reiectiō, being then also verie young: whereby it appears, that the right of succession was not in those dayes practised in Spaine. This Prince was politike, and of an active spirit, yet not giuen to armes: wherefore he made a peace with the Moores,

Moore, so as during his raigne they did not attempt any thing one against another. The G bondmen in his countrey being mutined against their masters, and in armes, they were suppressed by the wisdom of this king, and reduced to their first condition of servitude. They report a shamefull and abhominable thing of him among Christians, That in his capitulation with Abderramen to have a peace, besides that he made himselfe his tributary, he promised among other things, to give euery year to these Barbarians a certaine number of virgins, yet Pasqu doth attribute it to Mauregat. He married his sister D. Odefinde or Vfende, to a renowned knight called D. Sillo: and having reigned six yeares and six moneths, this king D. Aureliu died. All these kings were in a manner buried in the towne of Languas, which many write Cangas: We does not find that he had either wife or children. H

D. Sillo, sixt King of Ouiedo.

An. 774. 11 D. Sillo his brother in law, and his sister Vfende or Odefinde, obtained the kingdome of Ouiedo, in the year 774.

12 In Arragon there was an Earle called Aznar, risen in armes: some hold, that he was sonne or grandchild to Duke Ende of Guyenne, who comming to serue D. Garcia Inigo king of Sobrarbre, tooke Jaca, and obtained of him in gift the countrey which lyes betwixt the two riuers, called Arragon, with the title of Earle or Gouernour: dying, he left two sonnes, Galinde and Ximen Garfes.

As for D. Sillo, the beginning of his raigne was troublesome, many refusing to obey him: wherefore to assure his estate, he renewed the peace with the Arabians in Spaine, and subdued his rebels by a victorie which he got of them vpon the mountaine of Zebbrero in Gallicia. In the end, seeing that he had no children, he resigned the charge of affaires to D. Alphonso the chaff, nephew to his wife, and to her, giuing himselfe wholly to a contemplatiue life.

In his time the noblemen Arabians enjoying the townes and prouinces of Spaine, vnder the Miralumin Abderramen, impatient one of another, according to the naturall disposition of this mutinous nation, they fell to warre among themselves: Abubatar Deuisfer, and others, had chased away Ibnaballa of Saragoffe, who is also called Abi Arabi, who called in Charlemaigne king of France to his aid, and he entred into Spaine with a great armie, besieged Saragoffe, tooke it by composition, and settled Ibnaballa in his Seigniorie, making the noblemen Moores that were his neighbors, his tributaries. Among other conditions accorded betwixt Charles and the Moores, it was said, that they should suffer (others say heare) the preachings of the Christians, the seruants of God. K

D. Garcia Inigo, second King of Sobrarbre or Nauarre.

Nauarre or Sobrarbre. 13 IN this growing kingdome of Nauarre, D. Garcia Inigo had succeeded his father Garcia Ximenes in the year 758, who reigned 44 yeares. This king enlarged his limits by reason of the Moores dissensions, and tooke Pampelone from them; the which we read was also taken about that time by Charlemaigne, king of France: so, as it seemes, that being readie to come into Spaine to succour Ibnaballa, the pettie king of Saragoffe, he would seize vpon Pampelone, to assure his passage; and then having restored Ibnaballa, and defeated Abderramen, killing about 30000 of his Moores, as the Spanish Authors report, he demanteled it in his returne into France, so as it was easie for D. Garcia to seize thereon. M

D. Mauregat, seuenth King of Ouiedo.

Ouiedo. An. 783. 14 D. Sillo died in the year 783, having held the royall seat nine yeares and one moneth, and was interred at Ouiedo, in Saint Iohn Church, which he had built,

A built, and was afterwards transported to S. Saluador: After whose deace, by a general consent, the realme of Ouiedo was giuen to D. Alphonso the chaff: but his vnclie D. Mauregat, baltard brother to his father, as he had beene vnlawfully begotten, so he shewed himselfe in his actions and affections, both to him and the State, without law, without pietie, and without honour: for being desirous to reigne, he layed a plot with the Moores, and by their aide, chased Alphonso his nephew out of the Asturias and Leon, forcing him to retire himselfe into the countreyes of Alaua, and Biscaye, where he had many allies, who perserued him from the treacherous practices of this tyrant. The accord he made with the Barbarians, to procure succours from them, was villanous, and vnworthie of a Christian Prince: for hee bound himselfe to pay them a tribute contrarie to all law and honestie, which was, fiftie virgines of noble families, and as manie of baser condition, the which hee should send yearly: this impure and brutish king exposing those poore Christian creatures, by an expresse agreement, vnto the damnable appetite of Infidels: by reason whereof he was hated of all men, and (as it is likely) of God also. He reigned fise yeares and fise monethes, dying without children, and was buried at Praua.

In his time Abderramen reigning ouer all the Moores in Spaine, he did wonderfully spoyle the Christians, being verie mightie; for he had thirtie thousand horse and two hundred thousand foot in his ordinarie warres: with which forces he draue the kings of Ouiedo into the mountaines of Asturia, and brought vnder his subjection Gallafray king of Toledo, who made head against him, with manie other noblemen of his sect. He called the Mesquite or Mosquee of Cordoua to be built, of a rich and stately structure. The Cathedral Church of that citie, admirable for the greatnesse and number of goodly pillars: the gardens and castles called Arizaphe or Alixares, are also his workes. This Prince died in the year 787, and 170 of the Arabians, leauing eleuen sonnes and nine daughters. He was interred in the castle of Cordoua, and had for his succesor in Spaine his sonne Icen, or Ixeu, or Ismen, for so he is called by diuers Authors.

D. Veremond, first of that name, and eighth King of Ouiedo.

15 D. Veremond, or Bermond, the sonne of Eroila, reigned after Mauregat in Ouiedo and Leon, having beene of the Clergie, and made a Deacon. Wherefore fearing to offend God, if he did forsake his Clericall profession to gouerne the kingdome, he left this dignitie, and resigned it to his brother D. Alphonso the second year, or as some write, the third, of his raigne. And moreover, being married to a Ladie called Imoline, from that time he did forbear her companie, notwithstanding that he had had two children, Rather and Garcia: He liued foure yeares and six moneths after that with D. Alphonso; and lyes interred at Ouiedo.

16 In his time, Icen, Osmen, or Ismen, the second sonne of Abderramen, reigned at Cordoua, who seized on the Crowne, to the preiudice of his elder brother Zuleima, who gouerned at Toledo. The inhabitants of Toledo, and all that iurisdiction, obeyed Zuleima still, who tooke vpon him the title of King, seeing himselfe assured of his people. D. Hizen being jealous thereof, came to assaile him, where there was a great and a bloudie battaile betwixt the two brethren, neere vnto a place called Velches, in the which Zuleima was defeated, and all the passages being stoppt, that he could not fortifie himselfe in Toledo, he fled into Murria; from whence he afterwards passed into Asticke, to seeke in-vaine for means to recouer that which he had lost in Spaine. Hizen after this victorie marched towards Toledo, and did so terrifie them of the towne (who were neither well furnished with souldiors, nor victuals) as they yielded presently, vpon honest conditions for the inhabitants. Thus Hizen remained peaceable king of Spaine, being wonderfully proud and haughtie, so as presently after he sought to continue the warre in Languedoc, which his predecessors had begun, where he did much annoy the Christians, and carried away great spoyle, with the warre. Neighbour Princes were amazed at this relick: for we read, that Charlemagne (in whose time D. Alphonso began to raigne) being aduertised of this invention, posted thither, and afterwards obtained from Pope Leo the third, sitting at Rome, That the Episcopall Sea of Iria should be removed to Compotella, vnder the Metropolitan of Braga, from the which it was since exempt, as we will shew hereafter. In king Alphonso's time, and (as some thinke) when Charlemagne was in Spaine, there were two Councells held against Eliand Archbishop of Toledo, and Felix first Bishop of Yrgel, and their followers, infected with Nestorius heresie, who imagined a double person in Iesus Christ, as he consists of two natures, diuine and humane: for this cause Eliand is not in the catalogue of the Archbishops of Toledo: Felix had tryed in vaine to draw vnto his error Odesinde widow to king Sillo.

Moors.

Halihatan
Fourth King of the Moors: Warre betwixt him and his vnckles.

An. 799.

21 Abizmen Hizen or Iseca, Miralmumin, deceased in the year 794, hauing reigned seuen yeares and seuen moneths; to whom succeeded Halihatan his sonne, who either for feare, or for feare and distrust, had an ordinarie gard of five thousand horsemen, part Christian renegado's, part Eunuches. In the year 799 Zuleima and Abdalla his vnckles hearing of the death of Hizen, came out of Affrick into Spaine (from whence they had bene chased) to trie if they might enter into Toledo, whereas Zuleima had reigned: they came to Valence, and armed themselves with the forces of that towne, and so went to field, giuing them of Toledo to vnderstand (whom they knew to be affected vnto them) of their coming, and designe: who acquainting other Moores therewith, they tooke armes for Zuleima, chasing all such out of the towne, as they thought opposite vnto them and then they did aduertise Zuleima how that all went well for him; who preparing himselfe to goe to Toledo, was encountered by the armie of Halihatan his nephew, by the which he was defeated and slaine, this year of 799. Abdalla fled, but afterwards considering that he had no meanes to rayse his decayed fortunes, he came and yeelded himselfe to his nephewes mercie, who receiued him, and vsed him honourably. So Toledo fayled the second time to be made a royall seat, by the defeat and death of Zuleima: yet the inhabitants finding themselves guiltie, would not trust Halihatan, but maintained themselves in their rebellion, for the space of nine yeares. Halihatan being vnable or vnwilling to trie his forces against so great and well fortified a citie, fought in the meane time to win them by all mild and friendly meanes. Among others, he employed about this reconciliation a Moore, who was a knight, and borne at Toledo, yet then resident at Huesca, and Gouvernour of those marches: who being come into the citie with letters from king Halihatan, wrought so wisely, as in a short time the Toledanes returned to the kings obedience, to whom there was promised assurance, and forgetfulness of all they had done; but there was nothing obserued: for this Hambroz, to abuse the Toledanes, said, That he would not remaine in the castle, for feare to be surprisid by the kings men, which arrived daily, but caused another lodging to be assigned him, in a street called Moutichel, neere vnto S. Christophers Church, in the which he made a caue vnder the ground, to murder them that had rebelled against the king. In the meane time, Halihatan vnder colour to make warre against the Christians, and to succour the frontier, caused his forces to approach neere the towne, vnder the command of a sonne of his called Abderramen, the which by the means of Hambroz entred quietly into Toledo, and without any shew to doe harme. Abderramen lodged with Hambroz, where shewing a good countenance to the chiefe of the Toledanes, Moores, he invited a great number of them to a stately feast which he had prepared for them. As these Moores came one after another, thinking to make good cheere, they were presently layd hold on, and beheaded, by some that were appointed to that purpose, and then cast into the vault. There had bene many dispartch in this manner, when as one of the guests which was invited, discovering some blood, grew amazed, and suddainly slipped out, and gaue an alarme to the towne, crying out, that they murdered the citizens in Hambroz lodging. The Toledanes being terrified with these newes, and hauing no meanes to make resistance, and without any captaine to lead them, found no better expedient then to crye out for mercie, but it was in vaine: for then they pursued them openly, so as there was about 5000 slaine, to punish their offence committed against Halihatan; against whom, they of Cordoua being also rebelled, he caused 300 of them to be hanged vpon the riuier side: there was a captaine called Abdelcarin appointed for this execution, who a little before had subdued Calaoira. Halihatan growne proud with this

A this successe, sent his captaines to annoy the Christians frontiers, who entred into Galicia in the year 812, where he was vnfortunat in many encounters, by the prouidence of king D. Alphonso. The like happened to Ores, Gouvernour of Merida, who was defeated neere vnto Beneuent in the territorie of Leon. The year after 813, another Moore called Alema, Gouvernour of Badajoz, layed siege to Zamorra, but he was forced to retyre. Not content with this, two armies of Moores entred into D. Alphonso's his countrey, in diuers places, against the which he opposed 2 armies; the one led by himselfe, the other by Bernard del Carpio his nephew, who was growne of good yeares, in both which he was victor; so as the Moores did forbear for a time to annoy the Christians, and fell to spoile one another: whereupon a great nobleman among them, called Mahomad, came out of the quarters of Merida, to seeke redress of king D. Alphonso, for that he was violently pursued, and could find no safetie in all the Moores countrey. D. Alphonso entertained him, and assigned him rents to liue on in Galicia: but he shewed himselfe ingratefull & trecherous, raising a great armie by the intelligence he had with other Moores, to invade the countrey of his benefactor: but they were readie in time to resist him, and gaue him batteile, where there died about 50000 Moores. Mahomad their Generall being taken, was beheaded as a traitor. At that time Marfil or Masile, successor to Ibnaballa, reigned at Saragoffe, who was at the battell of Roncevaux, where the French were defeated. It is certaine, as Authors write, that this batteile was giuen in the time of D. Alphonso the chaff, but the year is doubtfull, yet they hold it was a little before the death of Charlemagne, who died about the year 815.

22 If that which the Spaniards write be true, it is most certaine, that among these Priests ambition went before, and religion followed after. D. Alphonso hauing liued chastly, being fortie that he had no children, and for that he had receiued great aid from the Emperour Charles, and it may be presumed, that so mightie a Prince was most necessarie to restore Spaine to her beautie, and the Christians to their former possession, or else for some other consideration, he had a determination to make him heire of his estates after his death: but the Nobilitie of Spaine hauing notice thereof, did not allow it, refusing to be vassalles to any foraine Prince: yet D. Alphonso had by his letters and embassages giuen great hope thereof vnto Charles, who affected it, and had appointed the realmes of Ouiedo and Leon for Bernard sonne to his sonne Pepin, and did prepare himselfe to come vnto Alphonso, vnder colour of succouring him against the Moores, but he had newes from him, that he was forced by his Earles and Barons to recall it, and therefore he entreated him to forbear his coming: the which Charlemagne taking for an affront, resolved to force him by armes, to performe his promise: wherefore he raised a mightie armie of French, Germanes, and Italians, which were vnder his Empire, and sent it beyond the Pyrenees, led by his best captaines: yea, some (who haue not duly considered the age of Charlemagne, who was then 72 yeares old) say, that he was there in person; whereof the Spaniards being aduertised, they made a league of all the Christian Potentates, of Galicia, Leon, Arragon, Nauarre, and others, and of some Princes of the Moores, to whom the gouernment of the French in Spaine was suspected; among the which was Marfil of Saragoffe. All these forces joyned together, stopt the passages, and forced the French to returne into their countrey, but with great disadvantage and disorder, through the straits of the mountaines, whereas the Spaniards hauing seized vpon the passages, the forward and battaille of the French were defeated, and their baggage taken, with such slaughter, as they write there were about 40000 men slaine that day: among the which was Roland, as they write there were about 40000 men slaine that day: among the which was Roland, and all those whom fabulous writers call Peeres of France, with other great personages. In this action, the valor and good conduct of D. Bernard of Carpio, nephew to D. Alphonso, was admirable, as also in his warres against the Moores, as the Spaniards write, who was for a long time held for the kings sonne, and he himselfe beleueed it: but being aduertised of his parents, and of the calamitie of the Earle of Saldagne his father, he made many petitions vnto the king, and vsed all the means he could to moue him to pardon the iniurie which he pretended had bene done him, and to free him after so many yeares imprisonment; the which he could not obtaine: wherefore being discontented, he retyred from Court into his countrey of Saldagne, where he shewed himselfe as much as he could an enemy to king D. Alphonso.

D. Fortun,

D. Fortun, third King of Nauarre:

Nauarre.
An.802.

23 D<sup>V</sup>ring the raigne of Ouiedo and Leon, D. Fortun was the third king of Sobrabre and Nauarre, who came vnto the Crowne in the year 802, after the decease of D. Garcia Inigo his father. He was not onely to make head against the Moores, but also against the French, who spoyled his countie of Nauarre and Arragon, as well as those of the Mahumetists: for souldiours hold nothing holie, but that which is barren, and yeelds no bootie. During the raigne of this king was that famous defeat at Roncevaux, where he was with his Nauarrois, and other confederates, for the Spanish partie, where the French hauing beene defeated and stripped of their baggage, they afterwards did all they could to annoy Spaine. This king was married to Theude, daughter to D. Galinde, by reason whereof he did inherite (as some say) the countie of Arragon: yet this vnion of Arragon and Nauarre is not receiued by all Authors, but is referred to a later time, and there are memorials found of other Earles in that countrey, after D. Galinde.

Of this marriage came the infant D. Sancho Garces, successor in the realme of Sobrabre and Nauarre, to D. Fortun his father, whom it may be this Theude had had to her second husband: for some Authors say, that she had beene formerly married to one of Charles his captaines, and of his blood, called Bernard, not he which gouerned Cattelogne. D. Fortun had great warres against the Arabian Moores, to whom, with the Arragonois, and other his allies, he gaue bataille, at a place called Olcassa, or Olcast, in the which died D. Ximen Aznar Earle of Arragon, brother to D. Theude, the which some maintaine did happen vnder D. Sancho, sonne and successor to D. Fortun, who was vanquished and slaine by Musa Ahen Cacin or Hecacin, king of Saragoffe. The Christians woon this bataille of Olcassa, by the valour of them of Roncal, who had for a testimonie thereof, the title and priuiledges of Gentry, which they enjoy at this day.

D. Sancho Garces, sixt King of Nauarre.

24 D<sup>F</sup> Fortun hauing raigned thirteene yeares died, and there succeeded him, in the year 815, his sonne D. Sancho Garces, who continued the warres against the Moores with good successe. There is mention made of a bataille he woon against them, in the year 821, nere vnto Ochauiere; in the which the inhabitants of the valley of Roncal behaued themselves so valiantly, as they deserued a new confirmation and enlargement of their priuiledges of Nobilitie. These people although they were subjects of Nauarre, yet they leue an annuall tribute of the French, their neighbours, by an accord made in old time. It is a place vnder the iurisdiction of Sanguesse, situated in the Pyrennee mountaines of Nauarre, confining vpon them of Val Breton, which are of France, from whom they exact three Cowes euery yeare, on the third day of Iune, with certaine ceremonies obserued of old time. Some thinke this tribute grew by reason of the warres which this king had with the Gascoines and French, who being incensed with the Count of Roncevaux, did vsually invade the territories of Sobrabre and Nauarre, who after they had bene vigorously repulsed by him and his successors, they were forced to make the abovementioned peace, and doe the homage.

Arragon.

Diverse Earles
of Arragon.

25 In Arragon, D. Ximen Aznar, the sonne of D. Galinde, hauing commaunded with the title of Earle (a gallant knight, who died in the bataille of Olcassa, following the partie of D. Fortun Garces of Nauarre, or else in the seruice of D. Fortun his sonne, about the year 803) to him succeeded his vnkle, called D. Ximen Garces, notwithstanding that he had a brother, whose name was Endregot, whether it were by force, or otherwise, the Historians make no mention. This D. Ximen Garces liued little, he was wise and valiant, and was slaine

A slaine in an encounter against the Moores. After him D. Garcia Aznar was fift Earle of Arragon, who also did not long enjoy his estate, and was slaine fighting valiantly against the Moores in Spaine. D. Fortun his sonne did inherite the Earldome of Arragon, who imployed himselfe valiantly in the warres against the Moores: he died without any sonne, so as Arragon was then vnto Nauarre, by the means of D. Vrraca, daughter to D. Fortun, or as some write, of D. Endregot Galinde, who was married to D. Garcia Inigo, second of that name, king of Nauarre, sonne to Inigo Arista, the which was the first woman which did inherite this Countie of Arragon, and brought in a custome, that the women should succeed.

B 26 Another Bernard, of whom we haue made mention, who intituled himselfe Earle of Barcelone, Duke and Marquesse of Spaine, gouerned Cattelogne, about the year 796, for the French; after the death of Zato the Moore, being their vassile and tributarie. He had beene Gouvernor of Prouence and Languedoc vnder the Emperour Charlemaigne. In Cattelogne he made sharpe warres against the Moores, wherein he was assisted by a Spanis knight called D. Geoffrey, the haire, which succeeded in the gouernment of Barcelone. This Geoffrey was Lord of the castle of Arria, in the territorie of Conflent, and Countie of Barcelone; with the hope of which D. Bernard he tooke from the Moores all the countrey which lies betwixt the two riuers of Nogueta and Lobregat: but after the death of Charlemaigne, a Gouvernor of Guienne, called Aymon, hauing rebelled against the Emperor, Lewis his sonne and successor, besides the hurt he did in that Prouince, entred into Cattelogne, and tooke townes and castles, being fauoured by Abderramen king of the Moores at Cordoua: and in the year 820, these rebellious French and the Moores hauing joyned their forces together, they came and besieged Barcelone.

Cattelogne.

27 This Abderramen, second of that name, had succeeded his father Halibatan, who died in the year 819, and of the Arabians 102, hauing raigned 24 yeares, who of many wiues, which Mahumet's law doth allow, had left 19 sonnes and 21 daughters. This warre of Cattelogne was one of Abderramen's first exploits, in the which Barcelone was taken in the year 820, but soone after recovered by the Christians.

Moores.

In the year 824 died Don Alphonso the chaff, hauing instituted for his successor D. Ramir, sonne to D. Bermond or Veremond the Deacon, rejecting D. Bernard of Carpio his sisters sonne, who was his lawfull heire. This Prince raigned 29 yeares, and was buried at Ouiedo, in S. Maries Church, which he had built. He was a great benefactor of the Clergies. Wee find a donation made by him to the Church of Compostella, of about a league of ground about S. Iaques sepulchre, but the date of these letters are of the year 835; which agrees not with that which Authors write of the death of this king.

D. Ramir, first of that name, and tenth King of Ouiedo.

28 D<sup>F</sup> Ramir was sonne to the king D. Veremond, called the Deacon, and adopted by D. Al. Onedo, phonso his vnkle, a generous and worthie Prince, and not inferior to any of his predecessors in vertue. In the beginning of his raigne he married a Ladie, called D. Vrraca, borne in old Castille, of which were borne two sonnes, D. Oradogno who raigned, and D. Garcia. This king did that which all other Princes abhorre, for he receiued his sonne to be a companion with him in the kingdome, and caused his brother D. Garcia to raigne with him, so as there were two courts and two kings in Ouiedo and Leon. The first warre which troubled this king was ciuile, by the rebellion of a nobleman of Asturia, called Nepotian, against whom D. Ramir assembled his armie, in the towne of Lugo, and being come to bataille, he vanquished him, and put his men to flight: himselfe being taken some few dayes after, had by the kings commaundement his eyes put out, and was put into a cloister of Monkes, an vsuall punishment in those dayes for traitors and rebels.

In this kings time, the fame of the miracles which S. Iaques did at Compostella, began to be spread ouer all Europe, so as many pilgrims came thither both by sea and land, from all parts of Christendome: but about the year 827, the coasts of Galicia were annoyed with Norman man pyrats, a people of the North, who since vnder Rollo and other capitaines, invaded France, and planted themselves in the Prouince, called by their name Normandie. These pyrats, moved with another zeale than to visit S. Iago's, kept the sea, and spoyled the coast with a great number of ships: D. Ramir came and charged them at a place called Fax, where he made a great slaughter: those which remained, retoured their ships, and came into the mouth of Guadalquivir, where having landed, they spoyled Seuile, and the country thereabout, and then returned into their countrey. This king D. Ramir was troubled with another faction: Alderred and Finial, two Earles of his countrey, being risen in armes against him in the year 828, against whom he marcht with his armie, tooke these two rebels, slew Finial, with his seven sonnes, confounded his rebellion, and caused Alderred eyes to be put out, and call him into prison.

Abderramen Miralmin in Spaine, had continued long in peace with Alphonso King of Ouiedo and Leon: but some years after his decess, he had a desire (for that he had had some good successe against the Christians in Spaine, and also at the persuasion of Aldes, who raigned then in Cast) to demand of king D. Ramir the tribute of a hundred virgines, which king Aladregat had promised to pay to his predecessors, kings of Cordoua: the which was denied, as vnjust and vnworthy, by a general consent of the Bishops and Nobilitie of the countrey, assembled to this end in the towne of Legon; where by the same meanes there was a warre concluded against the Moors, to abate their pride. King D. Ramir having then called all the Nobilitie of his countries of Asturia, Leon, Gallicia, and other places vnder his obedience, and leued great numbers of souldiours, he entered into the Moors countrey, by Rioie to Nogera and Aluenda, and came and encamped neere to Logrogne, whither the Moors armie came soone after, where there was a cruell battaile, to the great losse of the Christians; so as without the approaching night it is thought, they had bin all defeated: the king retired to a place called Clauijo, where at this day there is a Bourg neere to Logrogne. The night gaue the Christians means to retire, and to talke themselves, who by the will of God refused courage in such sort, as the next day they presented themselves againe in battaile. The Moors contemning them whom they had vanquished the day before, came to charge them without any great order; but they found such resistance, as they were forced to leaue the field, and to flye; where they lost (as Histories report) about 6000 men, and as it is set downe in a Charter which is the Treasurie of S. Iago's of Compostella, in the which mention is made of an apparition of the Apostle to king D. Ramir, the night after his man were defeated, who encouraged him to affront the enemy againe, promising him victorie, and that he himselfe would be in the battaile, as Patron and Protector of his kingdom: and they affirme, that the armies being joyned the next day, S. Iago's appeared againe, mounted vpon a white horse, carrying a white standard, with a red Crosse, fighting and encouraging the Christians as he had promised. Such apparitions will be receiued according to euery mans pietie and good instruction. There are yet at this day found heads of darts and of lances in the place whereas D. Ramir obtained this victorie: by fauour whereof, he tooke Calorra from the Moors, with other places along the riuer of Ebro; but he returned soone vnder the dominion of the Moors, whose commaund was great at that time in Spaine.

After this victorie, D. Ramir being at Calorra with his brother D. Garcia, the Queene D. Vrraca, and the infant D. Ordoño, being accompanied with the chiefe Prelates and Noblemen of the countrey, it was held fit to acknowledge the fauour and assistance, which they did beleue S. Iago's had done them. Wherefore this king being perswaded either by his dreames, or by his Priests, ordained, That all such as dwell about Compostella should pay yearly a certaine measure of corne and wine to that Church, out of their reuenues, for the yow, for so this tribute was called: the which is payed at this day. Moreover, that after any victorie gotten against the Moors, when as they came to diuide the spoyle, S. Iago's Church should hold the place of a knight, and haue a share. The letters graunted by king D. Ramir, beare date in the year 834, at which time we find by the Histories, that he was not liuing. It is called S. Iago's yow, it was confirmed by Pope Celestin, then holding his See at Rome. Some haue written, That in this kings time the Order of the Knights of S. Iago's began, but it was later, as we will shew.

In

In Catalogne, the Christians being much oppressed by the Moors, vnder the Miralmin Abderramen the second, the Emperour Lewis the gentle sent an Abbot to comfort them: for he could find them no souldiours (say the Spaniards.) This Abbot was called Elizachar, who encouraged the Christians in such sort, as Abderramen returning to the siege of Barcelone, accompanied with Count Aymon, they found such resistance, as they were forced to abandon it, about the year 830. Bernard being much esteemed for his valour, he was called home by the Emperour Lewis, who made him his Chamberlaine, and graunted him then (as some say) the title of Earle of Barcelone, and for this cause is accounted the first Earle of the Catalaynes: but it appeares elsewhere, that he had this title of Earle, yea of Duke and Marquess long before, the which was nothing but Gouvernor of the Countrey, or Prouince.

D. Ximen Inigo, fift King of Sobrarbre and Nauarre.

To D. Sancho Garret king of Sobrarbre and Nauarre (who died, as some report, in an encounter of the Moors, led by Musa Aben Casin, pettie king of Sarragosse) succeeded his sonne D. Ximen Inigo, in the year 832. Of the deeds and manners of this king the Histories make no mention, yea many Authors passe ouer these first kings of Sobrarbre, and begin the Historie of this Kingdome with D. Inigo Arista, who came afterwards to the Crowne. They hold, that D. Ximen is interred in the Couent of Saint Sauior of Leyre, with D. Nugna his wife.

D. Ordoño, eleuenth King of Ouiedo.

Ordoño, which is as much to say as Fortun, sonne to D. Ramir, came vnto the Crown of Ouiedo and Leon, in the yere 833, according to the common opinion. Being entered into the government of the State, he had warre with some people of the mountains of Cantabria (which are not specified) whom he vanquished, and brought vnder his subiection. He married a Ladie called D. Monadona, or Munia Donna, that is to say, Donna Nugna, by whom he had five sonnes, D. Alphonso, who was king after him, D. Bermond, D. Ordoño, D. Odoaire, D. Fruela, and one daughter. He did enlarge and beautifie the buildings of the townes of Leon, Astorgo, Tuy, Amaya, and others.

They make mention of a miracle in his time, in the person of a Bishop of Compostella, successor to Theodoris, and second Prelate of that Church, named Ataulphe, who being accused of Apostasie, and that he had revolted from the Christian religion to that of the Moors, being called to Court to purge himselfe, he came to Ouiedo vpon a holie Thursday, when as they did bait a Bull with dogs, having an intent to expose the Bishop to the furie of this beast as soone as he should arriue. But the Bishop hauing said Masse (as the Storie reports) attyred in his Episcopall robes, came boldly to the kings palace, and passing by the place where they did hunt this Bull, as he saw him comming towards him, he opened his armes to take him, relying in God and his owne innocencie: but the beast came quietly vnto him, and suffred him to take him by the hornes, who led him vnto the king: whereat the king and all the assistants were so amazed, as they did presently judge that he had bene wrongfully accused. But this holy man leaving his Church and flocke, retired himselfe into the deserts, there to liue with beasts, and became a Hermit. Of this Bulls hornes they afterwards made reliques in the Church of S. Sauior at Ouiedo. Sifmand succeeded in his Bishoprick, and was so vehement to pursue the punishment of such as had falsely accused Ataulphe, as he neuer ceased vntill he had gotten a graunt from the king, that all their kinsfolkes should be deliuered for slauies to the Church of Compostella, although they were not guiltie.

About the beginning of this kings raigne, there were great ciuile diffentions among the Moors. A nobleman among the, a Goth by nation, but a Moore by profession, called for this cause Musa Aben Casin, that is to say, Musa of the lineage of the Gothes, rebelled against Abderramen Miralmin. He raignd at Sarragosse, & drew to his partie Husca and Tafalla, and by his example he caused the of Toledo to take armes, being ill affected to Abderramen, by reason of the rigourous which his father Habibatan had vsed against them. This Moore fortified with these townes, rayfed a great armie, and caused a sonne of his called Aben Lope or Lath, to enter into Toledo, and then to ouerrun the countries of Nauarre and Cattellogne, and so passed the Pyrennees, into the territories of the French. At his returne he caused himselfe to be proclaimed King and Miralminum of Spaine, and tooke a towne belonging to the king D. Ordono, called Albayda, fortified it, and put a garrison into it: but his furie was stayed by D. Ordono, who came & besieged Albayda, and then with part of his forces he went to encounter him, as he advanced to succour the besieged, fought and vanquished him, killing 12000 horse Moores, and an infinit number of foot, with Garcia sonnie in law to Alonso; he himselfe escaped, being wounded in three places. The spoyle of this armie was great, and Albayda returned to the Christians: After which rout, Lope who had bene left Gouverneur at Toledo, made a league with D. Ordono, the which he faithfully maintained both in warre, and all other things during his life. This Lope is numbred for the third king of Toledo, being a Moore. D. Ordono did soone after assaile Ceyt, Gouverneur of Coria, and Mufres or Micanda of Salamanca, Moores, whom he vanquished, and tooke their Townes and Governements.

About the year 839 Abderramen died, leaving by his wiues 87 children, that is, 45 sonnes and 42 daughters, having held the realme of Spaine at Cordoua twentie years. He was in the 222 year of the Arabians. This Prince was full of state, and was much pleased to make great buildings: he caused the places and freets of Cordoua to be paved, and brought a great fountaine thither through pipes of lead, whereof some markes are yet to be seene about the Cathedral Church, which was then the Mosque. He was politicke, and was somewhat inclined to justice: he reformed the vnjust law of the Gothes, by the which the brother did succeed the brother, although he had children: he suffered the Christians which were vnder his command to liue in great libertie, so as in the chiefe citie of Cordoua they had many Churches, as that of the Asile, Zoilus, Faulstus, Januaris, Martial, Cyprian, Genesius, and Eulalie. And in the suburbs, or neere vnto, there were eight Monasteries; that of S. Christopher, of the virgin Marie, called Cuteclar, S. Sauour, Zoilus, Felix, Martin, Iustus, and Pasleur. He brought the making of silkes, with many other handie trades, into Cordoua: he caused money to be coyned with his name thereon.

Mahomet Miralminum at Cordoua.

Mahomet's victory.

His eldest sonne Mahomet succeeded him, who was the first Miralminum in Spaine of that name, and the fifth king of Cordoua. Being fetled, he marcht with an armie into Nauarre, from whence he was repulled: wherefore he turned his forces against Toledo, which was in league with king D. Ordono. Wherefore the Christians who desired to abate the power of the Moores, and to keepe them diuided all they could, came to succour the Toledanes, being led by one of the sonnes of king D. Ordono: both armies met not farre from the citie, neere vnto the river of Guadalestre, but Mahomet had the victorie: there were slaine in this battaile 13000 Moores of Toledo, and 8000 Christians; yet all this could not make him master of the towne. Mahomet being victor, he caused the heads of his enemies to be carried into diuers townes, to strike terror into those that would rebell; for it was the custome of that nation at the change of Princes to stirre vp new troubles. This warre continued three years, vnto the death of the king D. Ordono.

Cattellogne.

D. Geoffrey Earle or Gouverneur of Barcelone.

Ouido.

33 Cont Bernard of Barcelone liued at this time, much fauored in the Court of the Emperour Lewis the Gentle, not without enuie, especially of such as had had the government of Prince Bernard the sonne of Peppin king of Italie, in his youth. He was accused to haue committed adulterie with the Emperesse Judith: whatsoeuer the cause were, D. Geoffrey of Ania succeeded him in the Countie of Barcelone, in the year 839.

In the year 841, king D. Ordono being much afflicted with the Gout, and other infirmities, was withall oppressed with griefe for the rout of his men which he had sent to succour the Toledanes, whereupon he fell grievously sick and died, having gouerned the realme of Leon and Ouido tenne years. The letters and titles of the Church of S. Iuques of Compotella, giue longer liues to these kings: for there is one found of king D. Ordono, of the year 854, and another of the year 862, year of 874, wherefore there is no great certaintie of the time in the reignes of the kings of Ouido and Leon. These letters and titles differ aboue 33 yeares from the common opinion.

D. Alphonso

D. Alphonso, third of that name, twelfth King of Ouido.

44 Alphonso the Great, sonne to D. Ordono, was but foureteen years old, or ten, as some say, when he began to raigne: a prince endowed with all royall vertues, whose life and gouernment was long. His estate was disquieted by a knight of Galicia, called D. Froila Bermudes; who concerning the kings youth, did rise and seile vpon the Crowne. D. Alphonso being retired to Alaua, to preferre himselfe against this tyrant, as he was busie to raise an armie of his friends and subiects, he had newes, that D. Froila being come to Ouido, the chiefe towne of the whole realme, to be crowned there, he had bene slaine by the Senators and Councillors, which had conspired against him, wherefore he came thither, was received, and recovered his realme in peace. Then was there gouernour in Alaua a knight, called Eylo, or Zeylon, brother to one Zenon, which some Authors say, had bene Lord of Biscaie. This Eylo, as soone as Alphonso was fetled in his realme of Ouido, rebelled against him, and drew from him all which the kings of Ouido held in that prouince. D. Alphonso (who was then at Leon) being aduertised of this disorder, marcht with such forces as he could gather readily together, towards Alaua, where his presence caused him to be generally obeyed. He tooke this gouernor, and carried him to Ouido, where he ended his dayes in prison.

Tyranny and usurpation easily punished.

Mahomet, first Moore of that name, raigned then in Spaine; against whom the earle of Barcelone made sharpe warres, but with small success. He sent an armie against the Christians, led by two capitaines, Imundar and Alcama, the which came and lodged about Leon, as if they would besiege it, in the year 842. But king D. Alphonso succoured it, and forced the Moores to retire. In the end of Abderramen's raigne, there had bene a great persecution against the Christians, which dwelt in the Moores countries; whereof their infolencies and rebellions was the cause. They had, as we haue said, libertie of their religion, and they were suffered to build Temples and Monasteries at their pleasures; their Priests and Monkes did freely vse their severall habits: They had Iudges and Rectors among them to administer iustice, vnder the authoritie of the Mahumetane kings: onely they were forbidden to enter into the Mosque, and not to speake ill of their Prophet Mahumet. They payed tributes, the which were sometimes augmented, as necessitie required, or according to the passions of their kings. Whereupon many Christians took occasion to murmure, and to make bitter complaints, the which did incense the Moores. Some Christians of more iudgement exhorted the rest to patience, foreseeing the mischiefe, but it was in vaine; yea Alcassid a Bishop, and Sernand an Earle, who were of these moderators, were condemned by a Councell, and are blamed by the Authors of Histories, who haue made no scruple to put in the number of Martyres those rebels which perished in this massacre, the which was great, and continued ten yeares, for an aduertisement to all others, not to rise against their prince, to whom they are made subiect by the will of God, especially for their temporall goods.

Anno 842. The libertie of Christians among the Moors in Spaine.

In the meane time the quarell betwixt this Miralminum and them of Toledo, continued, and their obstinacie was such, as Mahomet, seeing they would not acknowledge him vpon any conditions, he sent a mightie armie against them, vnder the conduct of his brother, or as some hold, of his sonne, called Almondar, who spoiled, rased, and burnt all that was within the territorie of Toldo, and yet no man durst make head against him, his forces were so great. King D. Alphonso embracing this occasion of the Moores diuisions, being entred into league with the French and Nauarrois, he entred and spoiled their countrey. They hold that Bernard of Carpio was chiefe of this armie. Mahomet did about all things desire to subdue them of Toledo, the which was a great and strong citie, and therefore hard to be forced: Wherefore he resolved to reduce it to extremitie of victuals, by a long siege, and so force them to yeeld. And hauing raised a great armie in the year 848, he led it himselfe in person against the Toledanes, who issued out of the towne, resolving to fight with him, but it was to their losse and confusion, for they were forced to retire with shame; the towne was besieged, the bridge vpon the river of Tayo (the worke of king Hifem) was beaten downe (the Moores call bridges Alcantara) and all meanes of succours taken from the inhabitants. Wherefore they began began somewhat to yeeld, and to talke of a composition; wherein they were heard and satisfified: so as Mahumet entered the citie with great ioy, hauing reduced so great a people vnder his obedience: From whence he sent some troupes to spoile the Christians countrey, as far as the riuer of Duero; who were charged, repulst, and forced to leaue their bootie, by D. Bernard of Carpio, and others. Lope, who called himselfe king of Toledo, saued himselfe, and fled with his brethren, and Abdalla his sonne, to the king D. Alphonso; who receiued them courteously, and made such esteeme of these Moores, as he gaue them his sonne D. Ordago to instruct in armes and ciuillitie. Abdalla made no long aboad there, for being thrust on with enue against his vnclie, he made his peace with king Mahumet, and retired to Cordova, from whence he made great spoile vpon the Christians countrey: but he was incourted and defeated at a place called Cillorico, and forced to raise his siege from Pancomio with shame. Afterwards he came to fight with two Zimels, the one his vnclie, the other his brother, in the ter-ritorie of Toledo, whom he vanquished, and tooke prisoners: And as he was of a stirring spirit, and enemie of all rest, he drew vpon him both the Christians and Moores, by the surprise he made of Sarraçosse, where he maintained himselfe, notwithstanding all the forces of Ma-humet, who sent Almundar his sonne, and Abdaly a capitaine, against him, with great forces.

And although that Abdalla were on the other side molested with the forces of D. Alphonso, (who during these warres had sene the monastier of S. Facende burnt, the which he afterwards caused to be built vp againe) yet his posteritie reigned at Sarraçosse. Mahumet hauing disposed of this new conquest, returned to Cordova, vnder whose command Toledo remaned for some yeares.

etie of D. Alphonso.

After these happie exploits the Moores were content to rest a while, and to suffer the Christians to liue in peace, and D. Alphonso in the meane time gaue himselfe to works of pietie, according to the inclination and instruction of those times. He caused S. Iagues church to be new built of free stone, and enriched with pillars and other workes: imploying therein part of the spoile which he had taken from the Moores; for this church at that time was but of earth. He bestowed great almes of the poore, and widowes. He was solicited by Bernard of Carpio, to deliuer the earle D. Sancho, his father, out of prison, where he had remained for many yeares:
but (notwithstanding all the great seruices which he pretended to haue done) he could not preuaile. Wherefore he resolved to declare himselfe an enemie to D. Alphonso, retiring to Salamanca, where nere vnto it he built a fort, which he called Carpio, of his owne name, from whence he did much annoy the Asturians, and them of Leon. It was situated three leagues from Salamanca, vpon the riuer of Tormes.

D. Inigo Arista, sixt King of Sobrarbre and Nauarre.

Nauarre.
An. 940.

D. Inigo, surnamed Arista, came to the Crowne of Nauarre about the yere 840. Some say he was sonne to D. Ximenes aboue mentioned; others (among the which is Su-rites the Spaniard) affirme, that he was son to the earle of Bigorre, called Simon; and that he was chosen by the suffrages of the men of war, king of Sobrarbre, by reason of his vertues and valour: so little certaintie there is in antiquitie, especially of the beginning of races and families. The name of Arista was giuen him, by reason of his vehemencie and heat in war. The Spaniards call a courageous and hardie man Aristo. He was the first of the kings of Nauarre, that was appointed and crowned after the manner of our kings of France, the which was obserued in the other following kings, although some beleeue, that this custome came onely into Na-uarre, after they had kings of the house of Champagne. The French, among other Christian nations, haue retained it of the ceremonies of the ancient law of the Lewes, by the aduice of their Bishops. He tooke for his Armes a Croffe argent in a field azure. During his reigne, and some yeares after, the Episcopall seat of Pampelone was in the royall abbey of S. Saluator of Leyra, yet holding the title of Bishop of Pampelone, or of Iruna, by reason of the warre and spoyle which the Moores made. There is no great certaintie among writers of his deeds, the time of his death, nor of his funeralls, nor yet of his wifes familie, whom some call Oncas, which is to say, Iniga; others Theude: bringing the one from Pampelone, the other from Biscaie. It may be he had two for named.

D. Geoffrey of Arria was earle of Barcelona after the death of Bernard, about the yere 840, by the liberalltie and grant of the Emperour Lewis the Gentle. He was married to a French lady, called D. Almaria, by whom he had a sonne called D. Giffred, or Geoffrey the haire, who was the first preppariar earle after his father, but not immediate. Cattellogne was then vnder the soueraigntie of France; and there are priuiledges found, granted by king Charles the baule sonne to the Emperour Lewis, in the yere 844, whereby the inhabitants of Barcelona are made as free as the French, hauing libertie to administer iustice, and to liue according to the ancient lawes of the Gothes. This Count Geoffrey imployed all his meanes to make war against the Moores, he attempted the towne of Tortola, but in vaine: yet hee tooke firm them and from the tyrant and rebell Aymon, that which they had vsurped of his gouernment seven yeares before. He was pursued by a Catalen knight, called D. Salomon, earle of Ceysaga, who enuied him, and slandered him to the king his Soueraigne: wherefore being called to Court, as he was going vpon the way, he was slaine in Auvergne, in the yere 858, according unto some.

Ouiedo.

During these yeres king D. Alphonso was much troubled with the war which D. Bernard of Carpio made against him, who gaue him diuers routs; so as he was forced to leaue the Lions skin, and to vte the Foxes, at the least there was great shew of deceit: for the king, seeing that he could not suppress D. Bernard, he offered to releafe his father, who was now verie old, if he would deliuer into his hands his new fort of Carpio: the which Bernard, by a singular pic-tie, did willingly grant, and was ready to deliuer his fort into the kings hands, the which he did presently take. Those which went to the castle of Lune, to draw D. Sancho out of prison, found him dead, as they reported: wherefore Bernard holding himselfe abused, made great complaints vnto the king; but he was commaunded to depart out of the territories of Oueido and Leon, and the dependances thereof. Whereupon he retired into Nauarre, and then into France: yet some say, that he returned into Spaine, and there died, and that he was buried in the monastier of Aguilar del Campo.

Custodie of king
D. Alphonso.

Zeno brother to D. Eylo, or Zichon, whom we had confined into Ouiedo, in the beginning of the reigne of this Alphonso, who being made earle or gouernour of Biscaie, by the kings bountie, would rebell as his brother had done, forcing the king to send an armie against him, by the which he was vanquished, taken, and led to Ouiedo, where he ended his dayes in prison. This Zeno left two daughters, the one called Theude, was married (according vnto some) to D. Inigo Arista, king of Nauarre; and the other D. Iniga, to the infant D. Suria, of whom we shall hereafter speake. This was in the yere 856.

Rebellion of the youner of Biscaie.

All this time, and to the yere 859, there had beene a suspension of armes, betwixt king *D.
Alphonso* and the Moores; but that yere king Mahumet went to armes, and came and belieged the towne of Coimbra, belonging now to Portugal: but D. Alphonso forced him to raise his siege, and not content therewith, entred into the Moores countrey, wasted it, and returned with great spoyles, continuing euery yere to annoy them in such sort, as they were constrained to accept of a truce for three yeares, with the preiudice of their reputations, and great disadvantage in their iurisdiccions. Then there reigned in Sarraçosse a Moore, called Aben Alsaie. The rest of Mahumet's reigne vnto his death, was spent in voluptuous lust and idleness.
In his time there was a great earthquake in Spaine, and a little before his death lightening entring into the Mosque, where he was, slew two Noblemen Moores, neere vnto him.

D. Garcia Inigues, third of that name, and se- uenth King of Nauarre.

About the yere 867, as some Authors write, died D. Inigo Arista, king of Nauarre, to whom succeeded D. Garcia Inigues, his sonne, the third of that name, who vniued the countrey of Arragon to Nauarre, by marrying with D. Pyrraca, daughter to D. Fortan, the last earle, or of D. Endregot Galindo, of the same house and familie of Arragon. He had two sons by this Ladie, D. Fortan, and D. Sancho Abara; and one daughter, called D. Sançina, or Sancha. They write this fable of D. Sancho, That the king going inconsiderately with his queene through

Nauarre and Arragon united

D. Fortun, second of that name, eighth King of Nauarre.

Nauarre.

42 THE Scepter of Nauarre, after the death of D. Garcia Iniguez (although that some haue written of an Interregnum of many yeares, whilest that D. Sancho was yet vnknowne, and bred vp in the house of Guenara) came without all doubt to his eldest sonne D. Fortun the second of that name, in the yeare 885; after whose decease there could be no Interregnum, seeing he had a daughter married to D. Ordono the second, of Ouiedo, who without doubt should haue succeeded her father: for the right of succession had euen then taken place, euen of women, about the election, which had been accustomed in all auncient time among those people. There is a testimonie of this king D. Fortun, in a Charter of donation which he made to the monasterie of Leyre, in the Ara 939, which comes to be the yeare 901. It is written in the remembrances of the house of S. Sauveur of Leyre, That when as the king D. Garcia his father was slaine, he was at Cordoua. Whereby it appears, that the Moores which slew him, were not of the league with the kings of Cordoua, but some thecues, or factious persons, as this nation had bene accustomed to liue in perpetuall diuision and quarels. D. Fortun being king of Nauarre, he was also earle of Arragon, by succession from his mother. There is not any notable thing written of this kings gets, but that he was verie deuout, and did cherish Monkes, and religious persons, to whom he gaue great gifts.

Barcelone.

43 In Cattelogne after the death of Cont Geoffrey, who was slaine in Auvergne, D. Salomon, earle of Cerdagne, who had bene his competitor, and enuied him, was made earle and gouernour. The Spaniards hold, that Cattelogne, and the countie of Barcelone, was then fallen to the Soueraigntie of Prouence and Bourgongne, whereof Charles, sonne to the Emperour Lothaire, and nephew to Lewis the Gentle, was king; by whose grant this earle of Cerdagne did for his life-time inioy that title and dignitie, whilest that the son of D. Geoffrey (who carried the fathers name, and was afterwards surnamed the Hairie) was bred vp in Flanders, in a knights house, to whom king Charles had recommended him. About the yeare 864 kings Charles died, and Prouence came to the hands of the Emperour Lewis the second, his brother, who also died in the yeare 876, and the empire fell to Charles the Bauld, his vnckle, king of France, and by consequence Prouence and Cattelogne, which depended thereon: during whose empire D. Geoffrey the Hairie, being now great, came to Barcelone, whereas the countesse Almira, his mother, yet liued, by whom he was knowne, and made knowne to the chiefe men of Barcelone, who had bene friends to his deceased father: who made no delay to conspire with D. Geoffrey, for the killing of the earle D. Salomon, the which they did presently effect in the place of Bercu in the yeare 877: and by that meanes D. Geoffrey the Hairie was restored to his fathers dignitie. VV. Whilest he was bred vp in the house of this Flemish knight, they say, he fell in loue with one of his daughters, with whom he contracted a secret marriage, the which notwithstanding came to the knowledge of the mother, who could well conceale it vntill a fit opportunitie. Finding himselfe settled in his estate and dignitie, at Barcelone, he sent for his wife, and conselt the marriage vnto his father in law, who was nothing displeased therewith; by whose meanes he obtained pardon for the murder which he had committed on the person of Cont Salomon, of the king of France, and Emperour Lewis the Stuttering, successor to Charles the Bauld, his father, by whom the Flemish knight was much fauoured. And the Spanish histories report, That the Emperour Lewis receiued good seruice from Geoffrey the Hairie, in the warres he had against the Normans, whither he led a goodly troupe of horse out of Barcelone, and shewed great proofes of his valour and conduct; so as he was greatly esteemed, and beloued. And as in a certaine defeat of the Normans he had bene wounded in diuers parts of his bodie, so as his Armes were all couered with bloud; shewing himselfe in this estate before the Emperour Lewis, he besought him to giue him Armes, which he and his posteritie might lawfully carrie. The Emperour being glad of his demand, stretching forth his foure fingers, he dippt them in the bloud which ran from the earls wounds, and made foure markes vpon a golden shield which he carried, being plaine, without any deuice; and said vnto him, Earle, hereafter those shall be your Armes. For the which he most humbly thanked the Emperour:

44 D. Geoffrey the hairie, first earle in proprietie of Barcelone.

A Emperour: so as euer since they haue carried foure bloudie strokes, which we call Guenales, in a field Or. This is the beginning of the earles of Barcelone, and since kings of Arragon, although that their beginning was from Cattelogne.

He did likewise serue king Charles the Grosse, who was Emperour after Lewis the third, in his warre against the Normans: but in his absence the Moores entred the territorie of Barcelone, and committed great spoyles. Whereof Cont Geoffrey being aduertised, he demanded leaue, and besought the king to grant him men and money, to repulse the Infidels out of his gouernement: but not able to obtaine it, by reason of the weaknesse of his affaires, he had a better condition: For in consideration of his valour and good seruice, king Charles gaue the countie of Barcelone in proprietie to him and to his heires for euer, in the yeare 884, reseruing onely the foueraigntie to the kings of France: the which continued vnto the time of Lewis the ninth. We will therefore place this earle for the first of them of Barcelone, for that he was a Proprietarie.

Returning to Barcelone with this grant, he brought with him many strange knights, with whose helpe he recovered all that which the Moores had vsurped vpon the territories of Barcelone, and Cattelogne. He is commended for his religion, for that he did build (to burie himselfe and his successors in) the monasterie of our Ladie of Ripol, where his eldest sonne Rodolphus made himselfe a Monke; who, they say, was borne in Flanders, before the mariage was published; and was Abbot of Ripol, and afterwards Bishop of Vergel. Others say, That this monasterie was founded by D. Geoffrey of Arria, his father. He had other children; this Flemish ladie, which was D. Geoffrey, who died of poison, being but young; D. Ar, who succeeded him in the earldome; D. Saner, or Seniofrid, who was earle of Vergel and one daughter. He was founder of the monasterie of Monferat, and did many such like workes.

Cattelogne granted in propriety to Geoffrey the first, under the suzerainie of France.

D. Ordono, second of that name, and 14 King of Ouiedo and Leon.

D 45 TO D. Garcia his brother D. Ordono had succeeded in the realme of Ouiedo, in the yeare 889. The bountie of this prince made the Spaniards thinke that his father D. Alphonso was risen againe, he did so well imitate his vertues in all the course of his life. His religion, after the manner of those times, is commended, for that hee caused Mondogredo to be made a Bishopricke, and did much good to churches. He was married first to D. Munia, whom others call D. Eluira, by whom hee had foure sonnes, D. Sancho, D. Alphonso, D. Ramir, D. Garcia, and one daughter, D. Ximena, whereof D. Alphonso and D. Ramir were kings of Ouiedo. For his second wife hee married D. Aragonde, or it may be, Radeonde of Galicia, whom he did repudiate for certaine causes. Lastly, he tooke to wife the Infanta of Nauarre and Arragon, D. Sancha, or Sanctina, daughter to king D. Garcia Inigo, and of D. Vrraca.

The first exploits of Armes he did, were in Galicia, when as he was but a pettic king or gouernour, ouerrunning the Moores country confining vpon him, euen vnto Andaloufia, and carried backe great spoyles, with the which he retired safely to Visco, which is at this time in Portugal.

At the same time Abderramen, the third of that name, came to bee king of the Moores; hee was surnamed Almanzor, and Ananzer Ladin Alla, which signifies, Defender of the Law of God. Some are of opinion, that he was the sonne of Mahomet the sonne of Abdalla, to whom hee succeeded: against whom D. Ordono raised an armie, and entring the territories of Toledo, came and besieged Talauera, which is now called de la Roine. Hee defeated the succours of Moores which Abderramen sent, tooke the Generall of this armie, and forced the place and sacked it. Wherewith Abderramen being much moued, meaning to reuenge it with assurance, hee demanded succours from Almotarab, king of Mauritania Tingitana, where the kingdomes of Fez and Marocco are at this present. And hauing by that meanes assembled a great armie of Moores, Moores, Abderramen Almanzor, a king of the Moors at Cordoua.

Moors defeated.

Moors, Africans, and Spaniards, he spoiled the Christians country, as farre as the river G of Duero, and the towne of S. Stephen de Gomus, where there was an encounter, and the Moores vanquished; and the Generalls and Lieutenants of the two kings, Abderramen and Almotaraph, layne; which incouraged D. Ordogno to proceed: so as in the year 894, hee entred the country called Elstremadura, crosing the rivers of Tayo and Guadiana, vnto Merida and Badaios, the territories of which townes he spoiled. The Moores inhabiting these townes, not daring to fallie forth, they purchased a truce of some monethes, for a great summe of money.

This losse tormented Abderramen, and inflamed him to reuenge; wherefore in the yere 895, he entred Galicia with a great power, where he committed infinit spoyle. In the end both armies being met, there was a bloudie battell, which continued almost a whole day, with vncertaintie which had the victorie. Abderramen being afterwards fortified with new succours from Affricke, he came againe to waitt the country of king D. Ordogno, and entered by the prouince of Alaua, into the territories of the king of Nauarre, which should be at that time D. Sancho Abacia, or rather his brother D. Fortun the second, and not D. Garcia Iniques, their father, who they hold died in the year 885: And then there was a great battell giuen in the vallie of Ionquera, in the which many braue Christian knights were slaine. The Mahumetists being victors, many townes and forts of Nauarre fell into the Infidells hands.

Battell of Ionquera lost by the Christians.

King Abderramen returned victor vnto Cordoua, leading with him many prisoners, and a rich bootie. In this troupe of prisoners were the Bishops of Salamanca and of Tuy. He of Tuy, called Hermogius, not able to endure the hardnesse of the prison, being old, laboured to get out, giuing for hostage of his ransom a nephew of his, called Pelagius, a goodly young youth, about fourteene yeares old, who had beene bred vp religiously, and in the feare of God. Being come into the Moores hands, king Almansar being thrust on with a detestable desire, would haue abused him at his pleasure, and haue persuaded him to follow Mahumet sect: the which this holy youth did virtuously resist. Wherefore the king being enraged, he caused him to be murdered with many torments, and to be cast into the river of Guadalquivir, where his bodie being found, it was buried by the Christians: Whole memorie, for his great vertues in so tender yeares, merits to liue for euer.

Pelagius a holy youth cruelly murdered.

Ouiedo and Leon.

King D. Ordogno desirous to repaire the losse which the Christians had receiued in the vallie of Ionquera, entred in the year 896, into the Moores country with great forces, where hee tooke and ruined many townes; and meeting no encounter, hee returned to Zamora. As for the religious deeds of this king, they make particular mention of the building of S. Maries church, in his owne royall Palace of Leon, which he made the Cathedrall church of that towne, and indowed it with reuenues, and many iewels; inducing the other noblemen, by his example, to doe the like. He caused himselfe to be crowned in this new Temple with great solemnitie, being the first of those kings which intituled himselfe king of Ouiedo and Leon: for vnto these times they hold, That these kings rearme themselves onely kings of Ouiedo, without any addition of Leon. Before the Cathedrall church of Leon, were those of Saint Peter and Saint Paule, without the circuit of the walls in those times, the which he did enlarge, and made the towne much bigger, enriching it with many buildings, exemptions, and priuiledges.

We haue said before, That there was a great error in the computation of the reignes of these kings of Ouiedo, and great confusion in conferring them with those that haue reigned in Nauarre, and the other Potentates of Spaine: for the Authors doe ill agree with the Charters and titles of priuiledges, donations, and foundations, which are found in the true stories of Monasteries, and other churches of Spaine: especially it is vncertaine what kings of Nauarre were in the time of king D. Ordogno, nor when he married his last wife D. Sandina, daughter to king D. Garcia Iniques the second, whether in his life time, or during the reigne of D. Fortun, and D. Sancho Abacia, his children: the fact is cleere, but the time is doubtfull. Some Authors write, That this king D. Ordogno, made this league with D. Sancho Abacia, king of Nauarre; and that hauing ioyned their forces together, they inuaded the country of Rioje, which the Moores held, and hauing forraged it, they returned with great spoyle, hauing found no resistance.

A 47 The worthie and memorable deeds of this king are blemished with the cruelties hee Castile used against the earles of Castille. We haue made mention of Cont D. Diego Porcello, or Lechon, in the Spanish tongue, who gouerned Castille in the time of king D. Alphonso the great: besides there is mention of other earles and gouernors of the country, the which for that it was great, and compassed in by the Moores country, had need of many heads and captains to defend the frontiers of Ouiedo and Leon, vnder whose soueraigntie Castille was. Among others, we find D. Nugno Fernandes, who it is likely was father in law to D. Garcia, king of Ouiedo, brother to this king D. Ordogno, D. Almondar le Blanc, D. Diego his sonne, D. Fernando Anzures: all these commaunded there, and were great noblemen in the said country of Castille, about the year 889, which they hold to be the first of D. Ordogno, king of Ouiedo and Leon. It is not verified vpon what subiect they fell in disgrace with this king, if it were not by reason of the practises of D. Nugno Fernandes, and D. Garcia, against king D. Alphonso the great; kings being alwayes iealous of their estates, and enemies to them that attempt against their Soueraigne Princes, the which in some is accompanied with an enuie of their glorie, whom (being their subiects) they know to be aduenturous, fit for great enterprizes, and to execute them happily. So it may be D. Ordogno fearing that these earles (who had been beloued, and respected of the people) should grow too great, to the prejudice of his royall Maiestie, he meant to murder them. He therefore called them vpon a safecondukt to a place called Regular, vpon the riuer of Carrion, making thew, that he would treat secretly with them of matters of great importance. Whither being come, he caused them to be apprehended, and carried with good guards to Leon, where some dayes after, without any formall proceeding, he caused them to be murdered in the prison. D. Diego Porcello, as some thinke, was of this number. D. Nugno Bellides married his daughter D. Salla, of whom were borne two sonnes, D. Nugno Nugnez, Razara, grandfather to the earle D. Fernand Gonfales, and the other was Iustus Gonfales, grandfather to the Lord of Lara.

A year after this tyranous action, the king D. Ordogno died, according to the common opinion, in the year of our saluation 897; but according to the letters and titles of donation of the abbeyes and churches of Spaine, he liued in the year 919, as Gariyba saith, who hath made a diligent search: Of the authoritie and truth of which charters we may iustly doubt. This king reigned eight yeares, and was buried at Leon, in the new Cathedrall church of Saint Marie the great, the first of those kings which had beene interred at Leon.

D. Froila, second of that name, and 15 King of Ouiedo and Leon.

A 48 After the death of D. Ordogno, the realme was held by his brother D. Froila, who succeeded it from his nephewes, D. Alphonso, and D. Ramir, sonnes to the deceased. He is not put in the catalogue of the kings of Ouiedo, it may be by reason of the shortnesse of his reigne, or in detestation of his cruelties, which purchased him the surname of Cruell; or for some other considerations. He had married a ladie called D. Alunina, or D. Nugna, by whom he had three sonnes, D. Alphonso, D. Ordogno, and D. Ramir; and by a concubine, a bastard called D. Fruela. Of this bastard issued D. Pelagius, called the Deacon, who married D. Alonso, grand child to D. Bernund the Goutie, whereof we will make mention. King D. Fruela was a tyrant, and therefore fearefull and suspicious, so as he vied great crueltie against the noblest personages in Spaine, he put some to death, banished many, and afflicted euerie estate. Among the rest he put to death the children of a noble knight, called D. Olmunde, or Dimunde, banished D. Frominio their brother, who was Bishop of Leon, and committed many other such outrages; yet couered with the cloke of iustice, as tyrants doe usually.

49 The people of Castille incensed at the crueltie vied against their earles by D. Ordogno, rebelled against the Crowne of Ouiedo and Leon, and made an Estate apart, chusing two

in Castille.

Gouernors or Judges among them, whereof the one should haue charge of the war, and the other should take knowledge of ciuile causes. These were Nugno Razura, and Flauin Calu his sonne in law. Nugno Razura was sonne to Nugno Bellides, a German knight, who they say was the first founder of the citie of Burgos, so called by him, of a German word, signifying a habitation of people. This knight coming into Spaine vpon deuotion, to visit S. Iaques sepulchre, was there married to D. Salla, daughter to D. Diego Porcello, and had by her this D. Nugno Razura, a knight, who was wise, valiant, and much esteemed, by reason of his modestie. He had one sonne and one daughter by his wife, D. Gonfalo Nugnes, and D. Eluira Nugnes, or else D. Theresa Nugnes, surnamed Bella, either for that she was exceeding faire, or to seeme to be so: for the custome of the auncest was to giue their children pleasing names and surnames, thinking they should thereby purchase fauour with men; and that a goodly name gaue some marke or impression to the person conformable to that which it did signifie. This ladie D. Bella was married by her father, to Flauin Caluo, a knight of Castille, lord of Biuar, by whom descended by five degrees, Gila, Ruys, Diaz, who was a wife and valiant knight. By these two Castille was gouerned without opposition: for that the king D. Fruela being hared, and ill obeyed, by reason of his tyranie, and tormented with continuall distrust, being also growne a leaper, could not bring any armie against them. Wherefore this manner of gouernement was seled among the Castilians, and the countrey was dismembred from the Crowne of Ouiedo, for a time; and the riuer of Pisorga diuided Castille the old from the kingdome of Leon. D. Nugnes determined of ciuile causes with great equitie and iustice. Flauin Caluo managed matters of state, and warre.

Mention is made in certain priuiledges given by the first kings of Castille, to certain towns of that countrey, of a volume of the Castilian Lawes, according to the which iustice should be administred, called the booke of Judges: the which was of great authoritie, vnto the time of king D. Alphonso the Wise, sonne to D. Fernand the third, that the Lawes of the seven parties were brought in, according to the which this realme was afterwards gouerned.

Ouiedo and Leon.

King D. Fruela, without rest among his subiects, without warre against the Moores and Infidels, without honour in any of his actions, and without health in his person, infected with leprosie, raigned onely foureteeen monethes, and was interred at Leon, in the chiefe church, in the year 898, according to the common opinion: but there are letters in the treasure of Saint Iaques, of a donation, of twelue miles of ground to this church, made by this king, dated the 28 of Iune 924, which Garihey faith he hath seene.

We haue apparent Arguments in this seventh Booke, of the religious disposition in auncient Princes, in the resolution which two Kings of this age tooke, the one of Navarre, the other of Leon, to leave their regall Scepters and become Monkes: A president which was not rare in that age, but was afterwards imitated by others. Whether this proceeded from zeale of Religion, grounded upon any certain knowledge, or from baseness, and want of courage, or from meere ignorance of their ranks and royall callings, they can best iudge, who know by good and bolie instructions, what ordinary occasions Kings, and other Soueraigne Magistrates, haue in their lawfull calling, to set themselves, and to be truly religious.

D. Sancho Abarca, second of that name, and ninth King of Navarre.

Navarre.

An. 901.

After the death of King D. Garcia Inigues, his sonne D. Fortun being come to the Crowne in Navarre and Arragon, about the yere 885, as we haue said in the former Booke, hauing reigned some years, being moued with deuotion, and seeing himselfe without children, and old, he became a Monke in the monasterie of S. Sauueur at Leyre, the which he hold was in the yere 901, leaving the realme of Navarre, and the earldome of Arragon, to D. Sancho Abarca, his brother, so called by reason of a certaine kind of breech which he ware: Who, they say, being come with the queene D. Toda his wife, to the said monasterie of Leyre, receiued the blessing of his brother D. Fortun, from whom also they receiued a Crowne, with many other precious jewels.

The king D. Sancho had by this wife a sonne called D. Garcia Sanches, bearing his grandfather's and fathers names together: some giue him three sonnes more, D. Ramir, D. Gonsal, and D. Ferdinand. He had five daughters by her, whereof the eldest, called D. Vrraca Ximenes, was wife to D. Alphonso the fourth of that name, king of Ouiedo and Leon: the second, D. Maria, Countesse of Barcelone, being married to D. Seniofrid, the fifth Earle: the third, D. Therefa, who was married to D. Ramir, king of Ouiedo, brother to D. Alphonso: the fourth, D. Sancho, Countesse of Castille, the second wife of D. Fernand Gonsales: and the youngest was D. Blanche Velsque, whose marriage is vncertaine. This was a generous and worthie king, and in continuall warres against the Moores raising in Alaua, and vpon the confines of Navarre, whose lands he did often ouerrun, razed many places, and built others: the particularities whereof are vncertaine, by reason of the negligence or defect of writers of those times: but in generall they hold, that he did subject vnto his Crowne of either side, all the people which were betwixt his confines and the mountaines of Oca, of each side, following the course of Ebro vnto Tudele, and from the mountaine where Huefca: yea, passing the Pyrenes, he conquered from the French that part of Gascoine where the Basques are, which is at the foot of the mountaines: but whilest he was thus busied, the Moores came and besieged Pampelone, thinking to take it before that the king D. Sancho should come to succour it; but it happened otherwise: for the besieged were not onely relieued, but the Moores chased away, and pursued farre into their cuntry, with great losse of their men. In these warres the vertue and prowess of them of Sobrarbre and Ribagorfa was great, especially of a captaine called Centullo.

The auncient confines of Navarre.

D. Alphonso, fourth of that name, and 16 King of Ouiedo and Leon.

By the death of king D. Fruela, the kingdome of Ouiedo and Leon came to the children of D. Ordogno, and Alphonso the fourth, called the Monke and the blind, reigned: who hauing held the Crowne little about five yeares, and had had a sonne by D. Vrraca Ximenes his wife, which he called D. Ordogno, afterwards surnamed the bad, had a desire to become a Monke, and for want of courage to passe his life in idleness, leauing the charge which God had giuen him, to rule and gouerne the Christian people preferred in Spaine: wherefore he gaue his brother D. Ramir to vnderstand thereof, who was then resident at Viso, one of the frontiers of the Moores cuntry, persuaading him to come vnto him, meaning to resigne the Scepter of Ouiedo and Leon. These newes were not a little pleasing vnto D. Ramir, who presently came to Zamora, where king D. Alphonso remained, and was there seated by him in the royall throne. D. Alphonso retired himselfe into a Monasterie called Dominus Sanctus, at this day Sahagun, vpon the riuer Cea, a house built by king D. Alphonso the great, the third of that name.

Ouiedo and Leon.

D. Ramir the second, and 17 King of Ouiedo and Leon.

Thus D. Ramir became king beyond his expectation, in the yere 904, of Ouiedo and Leon. From that time the royall title was attributed to the citie of Leon, suppressing Ouiedo, for that it was the greatest towne, and best peopled of all this kings Estate. D. Ramir had by his wife D. Therefa, daughter to king D. Sancho Abarca of Navarre, three sonnes, D. Bernund, D. Ordogno, and D. Sancho; and one daughter D. Eluira, who was professed a Nunne in the Monasterie of S. Sauueur, in the citie of Leon, built by the king her father for her sake. The warres betwixt the Christians and the Moores, which had lyeu long dead, were now reuiued at the coming of this king, for the which he prepared himselfe. D. Alphonso (soone

The children of king Froila, by reason of the warres betwixt the two brethren, did rise in Asturia, and the eldest, whose name was Alphonso, caused himselfe to be called King: the rest, with most part of the Asturians, did honour and reuerence him as their king. The confederates of this Alphonso, sonne to Froila, desirous to surprize king D. Ramir, gaue him to vnderstand, That if hee came with a small traine, they would turne to him: but D. Ramir considering wisely what was most profitable and safe, would not goe without great forces, with the which he vanquished the Asturians, and tooke the children of king Froila, the which he sent prisoners to Leon, with his brother D. Alphonso, whereas soone after he caused all their eyes to be put out, then (as if he had repented him of this rigour) he drew them out of prison, and confined them into the Monasterie of S. Iulien, not farre from the citie of Leon, the which he caused to be built for them, and there entreated them honourably, during their liues; where they were buried, with D. Vrraca Ximena, wife to king Alphonso.

4 These diuisions did the more assure the reuolt of Castille, and the new Estate of that countrey, vnder Iudges elected, whereof the two first being dead in the time of D. Alphonso the Monke, D. Gonsalo Nuges had succeeded in the gouernment of Castille. This knight was bred vp in all vertue, ciuilitie, and good behauiour, by the care of D. Xugno Razara his father, who being wife and vertuous, was carefull to giue him good masters, in all commendable exercises, worthe of a child issued from a noble familie: and moreover, had made all the best families of the countrey parakers of this happinesse, causing the gentlemen's sonnes of Castille to be bred vp with his sonne in the same discipline; so as in a short time the Court of Castille was furnished with as many gallant young gentlemen as any countrey in the world. Thereof grew a great loue and respect of the noblemen and knights, both fathers and sonnes, vnto their Gouernour, proceeding from the bond they had, to haue receiued by his meanes so good education and instruction; a benefit, which to speake truth doth exceed all the gifts and fauours a Prince can doe vnto his subjects. Scories are defective in relating the particular acts of these Earles or Iudges of Castille, although it be most certaine, that they wanted no subject of warre to defend themselues as well against the Moores, as against them of Leon and Ouedo. Their residence and iudiciall seat was at Bourgos, and in another towne of Castille the old, called in respect of them Vjuefes. D. Gonsalo Nuges had to wife D. Ximena, daughter to Cont D. Xugno Fernandes, who was slaine in prison, with the rest, by king D. Ordogno, and of them was borne the Earle D. Fernand Gonfalo, first proprietor of Castille, one of the discreetest and best accomplished knights of his age, who succeeded his deceased father, about the yeare 910, who for his interment caused the Monasterie of Arlanfa to be built, as the Monkes of that place report, who shew many marks and refulonies of this Earle or Gouernour D. Gonsalo, and of his wife D. Ximena, but ill agreeing with the computation of times, and the truth of the Histories. D. Fernand Gonfalo being established Earle and Iudge of Castille, during the time that king D. Ramir was at strife with his brother, and the children of king D. Fruela, he gouerned the estate of that Prouince in such sort, as peace and abundance lodged there, and the people held themselues most happie to haue such a Commandour. He did wonderfully affect religion, according to the time, and hauing no better instruction from the Pastors in those dayes, then it is to be presumed, he gaue himselfe superfluously to the works of pietie of that age, which was wholly imployed to build Churches, and to giue reuenues, for the entertainment of Priests and Monkes, and of their ceremonies. He had a particular deuotion to S. Peter and S. Emilian, whom the Castilians had chosen for their Patron and Protector of their countrey, as they of the kingdome of Leon did bye to S. Jaques. The Monasterie of S. Peter of Cardegna was his worke. He was just of his word, faithfull in his promises, and endowed with manie other

A other good gifts, which purchased him the fauour and loue of all men, and aduanced him to the dignitie of soueraigne Earle of Castille. He married twice: his first wife was D. Vrraca, by whom he had one daughter of that name: after whose decease, he tooke to wife D. Sancho, Infanta of Nauarre, daughter to king D. Sancho Abaca: he had many sons, but it is vncertaine by which of these 2 wiues they were borne, there remaining in a manner no other memorie of them, but the inscriptions of their tombes obserued by writers, at S. Peters of Cardegna: the names of his sons are, D. Gonsalo Fernandes, D. Sancho Fernandes, D. Garcia Fernandes, who was Earle after the father, it may be by the death of the two elder, D. Pedro, who had two sons, as it appears by the tombes at S. Peter of Cardegna, D. Gonsalo Nuges, and D. Fernand Gonfalo.

B sales, and for the last D. Baldwin. Now this Earle D. Fernand Gonfalo began to carrie himselfe as a companion in armes, and no more subject to the kings of Leon: yet king D. Ramir hauing (after that he had subdued his rebellious kinsmen) led his armie into the territories of Toledo, taken the towne of Madril from the Moores, of whom (as we haue said) Abderramen was Miralumin and king at Cordoua, and razed the walls thereof, the Moores being desirous to be reuenged of the Christians for this affront, being entred with a great armie into the territorie of Castille, which was neere vnto them, and there done exceeding great harme, the Earle D. Fernand Gonfalo was forced to entreat K. Ramir to ioyne his forces with them of Castille, and to oppose them against the common enemy: the which he did, and hauing encountered the Moores neere to the towne of Olme, these two Princes gaue them battaile, and woon it, with great slaughter of the Infidels. Aben-Aya reigned at Saragosse, vnder Abderramen Almanzor, and was assailed by the victorious Christian armie, and forced to come to composition with king D. Ramir, by the which he made himselfe his vassale, and all his subjects, in the yeare 912: whereof some refusing to submit themselues to the Christians yoke, and rebelling against Aben-Aya, were forced to obedience by the Kings and Earles armie, who were no sooner retyred into their countries, but Abderramen incited at the reuolt of Aben-Aya, ran vpon him with all his power: but the Moore, who had not yielded vnto the Christians, but to avoid the present danger, submitted himselfe presently to the Miralumin, and returned to his seruice and obedience as before: then both together, with a mightie armie, entred the country of K. Ramir, spoyling it as farre as the towne of Simancas, whereas the Christians armie presented selfe in battaile, the which was one of the most memorabell that hath beene in Spaine, betwixt the Christians and the Mahumetists, where the Moores were defeated, and so great a number of them slaine, as many Authors affirme, they exceeded 80000. Aben-Aya was prisoner, and Abderramen forced to saue himselfe by flight with twentie horses onely. They hold, that it was in the yeare of our Lord 914, but there are letters of priuiledge and donation, which they call vow, made by Cont D. Fernand Gonfalo, in the Monasterie of S. Emilian, for this & other victories dated in the yeare 934, where it appears, that king D. Ramir was alone in this first battell, without the Castilians, and that he hauing put to rout a part of the Moores armie, the rest which retyred by Castille, were encountered by this Earle and his armie, who wholly defeated them; and then was the vow to S. Emilian accomplished, which seemes had beene made in the beginning of this warre, by all the Christian Princes raiguing in Spaine, for there is a confirmation thereof made by D. Garcia Sanchez, king of Nauarre. Eucric familie in Castille payed vnto the said Monasterie, by reason of this vow, some sheepe, some oxen, come, oates, wine, oyle, fish, waxe, cheefe, flax, yron, lead, and other things contained in their letters, from the riuer of Arga, which is in Nauarre, vnto that of Carrion, and from the mountaine of Araboya vnto the Biscane sea; whereby it appears, that that yeare 934 the country of Guisepusa was vnto the countie of Castille, being withdrawne from the realme of Nauarre, to the which it was afterwards annexed againe. The yeare of this battaile of Simancas, the Sunne was darkened for the space of an houre, and the starres were scene glittering, and as it were mouing in the firmament.

F King D. Ramir after this victorie retyred into his countrey, carrying with him Aben-Aya, and a great number of other prisoners, with rich spoyles, but soone after he found himselfe engaged in a new warre by the practices of some knights of Leon, ill affected vnto the king, or ill rewarded by him: whatsoeuer the subject were, they conspired with a captain of the Moores, called Acipha, who entring into the countrey by the riuer of Tomes, spoyled all the territories of Salamanca and Ledesma; Garribay calls these knights which

The children of king Froila, by reason of the warres betwixt the two brethren, did rise in Asturia, and the eldest, whose name was Alphonso, caused himselfe to be called King: the rest, with most part of the Asturians, did honour and reuerence him as their king. The confederates of this Alphonso, sonne to Froila, desirous to surprize king D. Ramir, gaue him to vnderstand, That if hee came with a small traine, they would turne to him: but D. Ramir considering wisely what was most profitable and safe, would not goe without great forces, with the which he vanquished the Asturians, and tooke the children of king Froila, the which he sent prisoners to Leon, with his brother D. Alphonso, whereas soone after he caused all their eyes to be put out, then (as if he had repented him of this rigour) he drew them out of prison, and confined them into the Monasterie of S. Iulien, not farre from the citie of Leon, the which he caused to be built for them, and there entreated them honourably, during their liues; where they were buried, with D. Vrraca Ximena, wife to king Alphonso.

4 These diuisions did the more assure the reuolt of Castille, and the new Estate of that country, vnder Iudges elected, whereof the two first being dead in the time of D. Alphonso the Monke, D. Gonfalo Nugnes had succeeded in the gouernment of Castille. This knight was bred vp in all vertue, ciuilitie, and good behaviour, by the care of D. Nugno Razura his father, who being wise and vertuous, was careful to giue him good masters, in all commendable exercises, worthe of a child issued from a noble familie: and moreover, had made all the best families of the country partakers of this happineffe, causing the gentlemens sonnes of Castille to be bred vp with his sonne in the same discipline; so as in a short time the Court of Castille was furnished with as many gallant young gentlemen as any country in the world. Thereof grew a great loue and respect of the noblemen and knights, both fathers and sonnes, vnto their Gouernour, proceeding from the bond they had, to haue received by his meanes so good education and instruction; a benefit, which to speake truth doth exceed all the gifts and fauours a Prince can doe vnto his subjects. Stories are defective in relating the particular acts of these Earles or Iudges of Castille, although it be most certaine, that they wanted no subject of warre to defend themselves as well against the Moores, as against them of Leon and Ouedo. Their residence and iudiciall seat was at Bourgois, and in another towne of Castille the old, called in respect of them Vijuefes. D. Gonfalo Nugnes had to wife D. Ximena, daughter to Cont D. Nugno Fernandez, who was slaine in prison, with the rest, by king D. Ordogno, and of them was borne the Earle D. Fernand Gonfales, first proprietarie of Castille, one of the discreetest and best accomplished knights of his age, who succeeded his deceased father, about the yeare 910, who for his interment caused the Monasterie of Arlanfa to be built, as the Monkes of that place report, who shew many marks and rellunomies of this Earle or Gouernour D. Gonfalo, and of his wife D. Ximena, but ill agreeing with the computation of times, and the truth of the Histories. D. Fernand Gonfales being established Earle and Iudge of Castille, during the time that king D. Ramir was at strife with his brother, and the children of king D. Fruela, he gouerned the estate of that Province in such sort, as peace and abundance lodged there, and the people held themselves most happie to haue such a Commander. He did wonderfully affect religion, according to the time, and hauing no better instruction from the Pastors in those dayes, then it is to be presumed, he gaue himselfe superfluously to the works of pietie of that age, which was wholly employed to build Churches, and to giue reuenues, for the entertainment of Priests and Monkes, and of their ceremonies. He had a particular deuotion to S. Peter and S. Emilian, whom the Castilians had chosen for their Patron and Protector of their country, as they of the kingdom of Leon did to S. Iuques. The Monasterie of S. Peter of Cardega was his worke. He was just of his word, faithfull in his promises, and endowed with manie other good gifts, which purchased him the fauour and loue of all men, and aduanced him to the dignitie of soueraigne Earle of Castille. He married twice: his first wife was D. Vrraca, by whom he had one daughter of that name: after whose deceasse, he tooke to wife D. Sancha, Infanta of Nauarre, daughter to king D. Sancho Abarca: he had many sons, but it is vncertaine by which of these 2 wiues they were borne, there remaining in a manner no other memorie of them, but the inscriptions of their tombes obserued by writers, at S. Peters of Cardega: the Earle after the father, it may be by the death of the two elder, D. Pedro, who had two sons, as it appears by the tombes at S. Peter of Cardega. D. Gonfalo Nugnes, and D. Fernando Gonfales, and for the last D. Baldwin. Now this Earle D. Fernand Gonfales began to carrie himselfe as a companion in armes, and no more subject to the kings of Leon: yet king D. Ramir hauing (after that he had subdued his rebellious kinsmen) led his armie into the territories of Toledo, (taken the towne of Madril from the Moores, of whom (as we haue said) Abderramen was Miralumin and king at Cordoua, and razed the walls thereof, the Moores being desirous to the reuenged of the Christians for this affront, being entred with a great armie into the territorie of Castille, which was neere vnto them, and there done exceeding great harme, the Earle D. Fernand Gonfales was forced to entreat K. Ramir to ioyne his forces with them of Castille, and to oppose them against the common enemy: the which he did, and hauing encountered the Moores neere to the towne of Olme, these two Princes gaue them battaile, and won it, with great slaughter of the Infidels. Aben-Aya reigned at Saragoffe, vnder Abderramen Almanzor, and was assailed by the victorious Christian armie, and forced to come to composition with king D. Ramir, by the which he made himselfe his vassale, and all his subjects, in the yeare 912: whereof some refusing to submit themselves to the Christians yoke, and rebelling against Aben-Aya, were forced to obedience by the Kings and Earles armie, who were no sooner retyred into their countries, but Abderramen incited at the reuolt of Aben-Aya, ran vpon him with all his power: but the Moore, who had not yielded vnto the Christians, but to auoid the present danger, submitted himselfe presently to the Miralumin, and returned to his seruice and obedience as before: then both together, with a mightie armie, entred the country of K.

D. Ramir, spoyling it as farre as the towne of Simancas, whereas the Christians armie presented it selfe in battaile, the which was one of the most memorable that hath bene in Spaine, betwixt the Christians and the Mahumetists, where the Moores were defeated, and so great a number of them slaine, as many Authors asseure, they exceeded 80000. Aben-Aya was prisoner, and Abderramen forced to saue himselfe by flight with twentie horses onely. They held, that it was in the yeare of our Lord 914, but there are letters of priuiledge and donation, which they call vow, made by Cont D. Fernand Gonfales, in the Monasterie of S. Emilian, for this & other victories dated in the yeare 914, where it appears, that king D. Ramir was alone in this first battell, without the Castilians, and that he hauing put to rout a part of the Moores armie, the rest which retyred by Castille, were encountered by this Earle and his armie, who wholly defeated them; and then was the vow to S. Emilian accomplished, which seemes had beene made in the beginning of this warre, by all the Christian Princes reigning in Spaine, for there is a confirmation thereof made by D. Garcia Sanchez, king of Nauarre. Euerie familie in Castille payed vnto the said Monasterie, by reason of this vow, some sheepe, some oxen, come, oates, wine, oyle, fish, waxe, cheefe, flax, yron, lead, and other things contained in their letters, from the riuier of Arga, which is in Nauarre, vnto that of Carrion, and from the mountain of Araboya vnto the Bilcane sea; whereby it appears, that that yeare 914 the country of Guipuscoa was vnto the countie of Castille, being withdrawne from the realme of Nauarre, to the which it was afterwards annexed againe. The yeare of this battaile of Simancas, the Sunne was darkened for the space of an houre, and the starres were seene glittering, and as it were mouing in the firmament.

F King D. Ramir after this victorie retyred into his country, carrying with him Aben-Aya, and a great number of other prisoners, with rich spoiles; but soone after he found himselfe ingaged in a new warre by the praides of some knights of Leon, ill affected vnto the king, or ill rewarded by him: whatsoeuer the subject were, they conspired with a captain of the Moores, called Acipha, who entring into the country by the riuier of Tornes, spoyled all the territories of Salamanca and Ledesma: Garribay calls these knights which which had conspired against their king, D. Fernand Gonçales, D. Diego Xepages, and D. Rodrigo, who did great harme with their owne forces, in the Affaires; but king D. Ramir (although it may be he had giuen subject of the rebellions, by his austieritie, or ingratitude) surmounted them: being often scene, that God doth most commonly fauor and support the royall Majestie against rebellious subjects, how iust fouer their cause be, referring to himselfe the immediate punishment of tyrants. Wherefore the Moores were not only repulsed, but also these knights were taken and brought to Leon, and to the castle of Gordon, from whence notwithstanding the king freed them within few dayes after, without any other punishment, than their promises and oathes, to continue loyall and faithfull. So as having been too rigorous against his owne blood, he was too mild and remisse to these, who had conspired with the Mahumetists, enemies of the Christian religion. These things paſt in the year 915.

King Abderramen grieved, that the warre againſt the Chriſtians ſucceeded not well for the good of his Eſtate, he began to perfecute the Chriſtians which lived vnder his commaund, yet ſome attribute this perfecution to his ſonne and ſucceſſor Halihatan.

The generall Historie of Spaine makes mention of a warre betwixt D. Sancho Arias of Nauarre, and D. Fernand Gonçales, Earle of Castille, grounded vpon the reparation of many damages done by the Nauarrois, passing and repassing through the countrey of Castille, vnder colour of making warre against the Moores: with whom the king D. Sancho made a peace, to the prejudice of the Castillans and others their neighbors; the which did much discontent them. Wherefore the Earle D. Fernand demanded restitution of the spoyle and excheff which had been committed in his countrey: but his messengers were sent back with injurious words and disgrace; by reason whereof they came to armes, and there was a

A sharpe encounter of two armies, in a place called Era de Gollanda, where there was much bloud spilt. The two Princes D. Sancho and D. Fernandes encountering during the fight, they ran one at another with such animosities, as both horse and men were overthrowne to the ground. The king D. Sancho was found dead with the charge of a lance, and D. Fernandes was wounded. This misfortune being knowne in the Nauarrois armie, daunted their courage.

ges, so as the Castellans went the field. The firme general Historie reports, that an Earle of Tolouse being come with a great armie to succour the king D. Sancho, being desirous to retouche the death of his friend and allie, and having joyned with the remainders of the forces of Nauarre, he was againe fought withall, vanquished, and flaine by D. Fernand, who deliuered the bodies of these Princes thus flaine to their subjects to burie them. Of the time of this defeat, or of the manner of D. San. Abreca death, there is no great certainte in that which is related in this general Historie, yett their conjecture it was about the year 920. It is without all question, that he was a valiant and courageous Prince, and so famous, that even at this day there is not so poore a woman in the kingdome of Nauarre, nor any other person (although he be ignorant of the name of other kings) which knows not that of D. Sancho Abreca: all which please and make an honourable mention of him, as of a wife and vertuous Prince. He did defende the limits of Nauarre, conquering much on euerie side from the Moores, euen along the riuer of Ebro, whereof a castlle nere unto Saragoße doth beare witness, which carries his name vnto this day. There are many other markes found of him in Spaine: the castlle of Ses, and that of Arrafate (since called Mondragon) in Guipufcoa, (but ruined at this day) are his workes. They hold, that he did people the towne of Logroño in Rioje, and walled it about. There is ample mention made of him in a Charter of priuilege and donation, of the places of S. Vincent and Ledena, to the Monasterie of S. Saluator de Leyre, dated in the year 919, whereby many things which are written doubtfully of this king, are made plain and confirmed: among others, it appears thereby, that he was sonne to D. Garcia Iniguez, brother to D. Fortun, and husband to D. Toda.

About this time, king D. Ramir desirous to enlarge his kingdom, and to diminish the power of the Moores in Spaine, led a mightie armie into the countrey of Toledo, so as in the year 923 he befieged Talavera, called at this present, La Roïna: and as the Moores came to succour it, he gaue them battaile, where he slew twelue thousand, and tooke feneuen thousand prisoners. This was the last exploit of warre which this king did. A litle before he had married his sonne D. Ordoño to D. Fruca, daughter to the Earle of Castille, D. Fern...

The rest of his dayes, which were but short, he employed in religious works, according to those times, and as he was persuaded by the Pastors and Bishops. This king caused the Monasterie of S. Sauveur of Leon to be built, there to lodge his daughter D. Elmira. Moreover, he founded a Monasterie to S. Andrew; one of S. Christopher, vpon the river Ca; one of the virgin Marie vpon Duero; one of S. Michel called Desfrinca, in the valley of Or- ne; in which things he was diligent and prodigall, and alwaies assisted by D. Theresa the queen his wife. He died in the year 924 of his natural death at Leon, where he was buried
An. 924.

6 In this kings raigne, Cont Geoffrey the haire died at Barcelone, hauing enjoyed the Principalltie of Cattelgne (since the renoumiation made vnto him of thole lands in propriety, by Charles the Groffe, Emperour and King of France) thirtie yeares, and lyes at S. Pabulo. After him, his sonne D. Mir was Earle, in the yeare 914, of whom we read no memorable thing. He married somewhat late, and begat three children, the first was called D. Seniofrid, who was Earle of Barcelone after his father, the second D. Olban, he was surnamed Cheurette, by reason of a bodily infirmite, whereunto he was subject; for when he would speake, he must of force scrape the earth, before he could pronounce a word, he had such an impediment in his speech: he had for his portion the Countie of Cerdagne and Besalu, after the decease of his father. The third called D. Mir, was Earle and Bishop of Gironne. All his children were young at the decease of the Earle their father, who made D. Seniofrid, Earle of Vrgel, his brother, executor, to order his childrens portions: he ruled Cattelogne fifteene yeares, and lyes in the Monastier of Ripol.

D. Ordogno the third, and 18 King of Leon.

7 <sup>LEVI.</sup> TOD. Ramir of Leon succeeded D. Ordogno his second sonne, in the year 924, but the titles and letters of Monasteries and Churches of Spaine, as of S. Iaques of Compostella, of S. Emilian of Cogolla, of S. Felix of Oca, of priuiledges, donations, and confirmations granted vnto them by king D. Ramir, and other noblemen of his time, shew, that he was yet living in the year 934: but there is little certaintie in the computation of these kings reignes, nor in the charters which are produced by men of our time. This Prince D. Ordogno is commended by the Spaniards to have bene mild and courteous, so as he was generally beloued of his subjects. He had some croffes in the beginning of his reign, by the flatterers and corruptors of young Princes (an ordinarie plague in Courts) who debaucht his younger brother D. Sancho, and perswaded him to rebell against him, who fled into Nauarre, to be assisted with the forces of that kingdom to execute his designe. <sup>Flatterers make Kings rebell against their kingdome brother.</sup>

D. Garcia Sanches, fourth of that name, and tenth King of Navarre.

8 THere are some errors which are remarkable in this place in stories; that is, who reigned at that time in Navarre: for some hold, that the young Prince D. Sancho had recourse unto king D. Sancho Abasca, his grandfather by the mothers side: others say, it was to his sonne Garcia Sanches, the which is more probable, the most diligent Authors affirming, that the king D. Sancho Abasca died during the reign of D. Ramir, father to this king D. Ordoño, about the year 920, having reigned twentie years or little lesse over his subjects, and valiantly repulld the Infidell Moores, gouerning in Alaua, and elsewhere in his contries, to whom his sonne D. Garcia Sanches succeeded in the realme of Navarre and Countie of Arragon. Wherefore without all doubt Prince D. Sancho, brother to D. Ordoño of Leon, had recourse unto him, and by his meanes was also fauoured by Cont D. Fernand of Castille, the warres being pacified betwixt the Castillans and the Nauarros: of which nations having raised a great armie, these three Princes entred the territories of king D. Ordoño, and marcht as farre as the royall citie of Leon: but king D. Ordoño had so wisely prouprovided for his affaires, as they were forced to returne, and to abandon their enterprise, reaping nothing for their paine, but the hatred of the king of Leon; the which did so incense him, as he put away his wife D. Vrraca, daughter to the Earle D. Fernand Gonçales, and married a Ladie called D. Eluira, by whom he had a sonne, called D. Bernard, which came to the Crowne of Leon. By reason of these troubles, the Gallegos, or they of Galicia rebelled against king D. Ordono; but he soon reduced them to their obedience by armes: and being encouraged by this happy successe, he entered into the Moores country, and passed the riuers of Duero and Minio, wasting the country with fire and sword, euen vnto Lisbonne, finding not any one to make head against him, so as he returned safe with his armie, laden with great spoyle; and without any great stay being incensed with the iniurie which he had received from Fernand Earle of Castille, who had fauored and succoured D. Sancho his brother, who was rebelled, marcht with his forces towards Castille, with an intent to doe him all the harme he could.

Castille.

The wisdome and dexteritie of D. Fernand was such, as of an enimie he made him a friend, so as he returned into his country well satisfied, and after that time they joyned their forces together to annoy the Moores: whose king Abderramen residing at Cordoua, desirous to reuenge the outrages which the Christians and their king D. Ordono had done in the territories of Lisbonne, and others of those marches, hauing also a new subiect by the taking of his castle of Catranso, by the Earle D. Fernand, he rayfed a mightie armie of Moores, in the which they say was about 80000 fighting men: and hauing giuen charge thereof to a Moorish knight much esteemed, whom they called Alhagib Almanzor, he sent him into the territories of Castille, the which did much trouble D. Fernand, for that all his forces of Castille were small to oppose against so mightie a power as that of the Moores, wherefore he demanded succours, and obtained them from king D. Ordono; yet Castille was overrun by the Moores armie, from S. Steuen of Gormas vnto Burgos. In the end, D. Fernand did so pursue them, as hee forced them to fight, neere vnto a place called Dozio, where the Moores were defeated, with great slaughter of their men. The Spaniards report, That D. Fernand was foretold of this defeat of the Moores by a holie hermit, dwelling neere to Lara, called Pelagus, and that the armie being farre one from the other, D. Fernand being encamped in that place, he had a desire to hunt, and hauing rowzed a Boare, he pursued him to the hermits cell, where he shut him vp. There was a Chappell and an Altar dedicated to S. Peter, for the reuerence whereof the Earle would doe no harme vnto this beast. Whilest he layed there, the hermit arriued, who entreated the Earle to lodge that night with him and his religious, being late, the which he did. In the morning the hermit Pelagus revealed vnto the Earle, that he should be victor ouer this great armie of Moores, exhorting him to take courage, and to trust in God, and aboue all to remember the poore Friets, when he had gotten this victorie. So the Earle returned to his armie so full of hope, as no counsell could dissuade him from the Moores armie, being great and mightie, with a handfull of men; and he had the victorie, as we haue said. Returning to Burgos, he remembered the religious, whom he made partakers of the spoyle, and in time build a Monastie for them to S. Peter, L vpon the riuer of Arlance, and gaue it good revenues, where this Earle and his successours were afterwards buried. The Moores hauing leuied new troupes, returned into Castille, and were againe vanquished by the Castilians and Nauarros, about the yeare 927, and neere vnto the towne of S. Steuens, vpon the riuer of Duero.

The king D. Ordono hauing rayfed a new armie a little before, to invade the Moores, he was surprisid with sicknesse in the towne of Zamora, where he died the fift yere of his raigne, and of our redemption 929, which opinion is not verie certaine.

A he was more carefull to pamper his bodie, then to attempt any great actions: and for that in those dayes the Arabians had the fame to be verie expert in the art of Philicke; and that the towne of Cordoua was full of such people, especially the Court of king Abderramen, he entertained friendship with this king, and went to Cordoua, that he might haue aduice and helpe for his indisposition; wherein Abderramen shewed himselfe courteous and faithfull, receiving him with all the honour fit for such a king, and furnishing him with the best Physicians of his Court, by whose diligence and iudgement he was freed from the infirmities which had long troubled him.

Arabian Physicians in great request.

Whilest that D. Sancho was in the Physicians hands at Cordoua, the Leonois conspired against him, and did aduance to the royall throne D. Ordono, surnamed the bad, sonne to D. Alphonso the Mouke, whereunto they were sollicitid by D. Fernand Gonçales, Earle of Castille, whose daughter D. Vrraca, who had bene rejected by D. Ordono last deceased, they caused this other Ordono to marrie: but D. Sancho being aduertised of these newes at Cordoua, he entreated king Abderramen to continue him his fauour and friendship, and as he had bene the meanes for the recouerie of his bodily health, so he would also assist him to maintaine his estate and dignitie: Whereunto the king did verie kindly consent, and gaue him great troupes of his nation and sect, with the which he marched towards his country, the which he recovered without any great difficultie, for that the conspirators of the country could not of themselves resist so great forces. And as for the Earle D. Fernand, he had toke worke ynough in his owne country, whereas a nobleman, called D. Bela de Nagera, had put all in trouble and sedition during his absence, in laying the plot against the king D. Sancho, with them of Leon; who being vnprovided of force and counsell, retired with D. Ordono into the Asturias, to liue there in the mountaines and places of strength: but D. Ordono not finding himselfe safe ynough in those parts, he fled into Castille, to his father in law, who observed in that, and other actions of his, a notable cowardise: whereat, he was so incensed, as he tooke his daughter Vrraca from him, and chased him out of his country. So D. Ordono not knowing whither to flye, went vnto the Moores, but he was slaine neere vnto Cordoua.

This partie of the Moores had bene embraced with better successe, a little before, by D. Castille. D. Bela de Nagera, who had rebelled against the Earle D. Fernand, and was expelled by him; who it may be perswaded the expedition which was made into Castille, in the yeare 931, by king Abderramen, vnder the commaund of Alhagib Almanzor, who had alreadie (to his losse) tryed the force of the Christians, as we haue said: against whom, D. Fernand hauing fortified himselfe with the succours of the Biscaines, and of their Lord D. Lope Diaz, who was grandchild to D. Suria, and sonne to D. Inigo, surnamed Esguerra, which signifieth deafe in the country language, and with other friends his neighbors, he presented himselfe in bataille neere to Hazines, where they fought three severall daies, with great obstinacie on either side: but in the end the Moores were vanquished, and lost more men than they had done in the former battles. The Spanish writers make mention here of another apparition of S. Iaques, fighting for the Christians against the Infidels, to whom they attribute the honor of this victorie.

E for the Christians against the Infidels, to whom they attribute the honor of this victorie. The king D. Sancho being restored, he married D. Theresa, and hauing punished some confederats of this rebellion, he made a generall assemblie of noblemen; both of his subiects and allies, at Leon. D. Fernand Gonçales could not well excuse himselfe, wherefore he went well accompanied, and was notwithstanding verie honourably entertained by the king. They reported, That among other exquisite things which D. Fernand brought out of Castille, to make shew of in that Court, he had a goodly horse, and one of the best Goshawkes that could be fene, whereof the king was wonderfully desirous, causing some to entreat the Earle to sell them to him, and that he should aske what price he pleased. The Earle answered, That he would willingly giue them vnto the king, but he would not sell them: but the king would not receive them of gift, but made such meanes by his friends to buy them, as in the end there was a price set, which was to be payed at a certaine time, vpon condition, That if the king failed at the day of payment, the summe agreed vpon should be doubled, to the benefit of the creditor: of which accord there were letters drawne and signed. The rest of the time which D. Fernand remained in the king D. Sancho his Court, was spent in pleasure.

In the end of the Affenbly, there was a particular treatie of the marriage of D. Fernand, a widower, with D. Sancho the Infanta of Nauarre, daughter to D. Sancho Abasco, and sister to D. Garcia, then reigning in Nauarre, and Arragon. This marriage was propounded by the Queene D. Theresa, mother to the king D. Sancho Garço, and sister to D. Sancho; not for any loue she bare to the Earle of Castille, but to intap him in the snare which she had prepared for him, in hatred and reuenge of the death of king Sancho Abasco her father, whom he had slaine in warre, as we haue said before. The Earle consented to this marriage, and tooke his leaue of the King and Queene, and of the Noblemen of the Court, and went into Castille, to prepare himselfe for his future marriage: but he found, that during his absence the Nauarrois had spoiled his country, and done many acts of hostilitie against his subjects; whereof he complained first by embassages and messages, and demanded restitution of that which had beene taken, but it was in vaine: Wherefore being a Prince full of courage, he went presently to armes, and entred into the territories of Nauarre, where he encountered an armie of Nauarrois, and defeated it, and so righted himselfe.

Nauarre.

The treatie of marriage was still continued, by the meanes of the Queene mother of Leon, sister to D. Sancho, Infanta of Nauarre, who had plotted with the king D. Garcia Sanchez, her brother, to entrap the Earle vnder this colour of marriage, and to be reuenged of him at their pleasures. There was such sending on either part, as in the end the Earle was persuaded to goe into Nauarre to conclude this marriage, and hauing agreed with D. Garcia, king of Nauarre. That their interview should be at a place called Circuega, either of them accompanied with fise knights only. The Earle being arriued, the king came with fise and thirtie horsemen: wherefore the Earle seeing himselfe thus surprisid, thought to saue himselfe in an hermitage neere adioyning, but the holiness of the place could not defend him, but he was besieged, and forced to yeeld, vpon condition they should not put him to death. Being taken, he was shut vp in a fort called Chasteau Vieil, or the old castle, and but hardly entreated. A while after, an Italian knight of Lumbardie, going in pilgrimage to Saint Iagues of Compostella, that way, and hearing that the Earle D. Fernand was detained prisoner there, he was verie desirous to see him, for that he had heard so much fame of his vertues and valour, and at length found meanes to speake with him. At his departure from thence, this knight went to the Infanta D. Sancho, who was both faire and Iouelie, whose heart he did so mollifie with good words, as she began to loue, and to desire D. Fernand's libertie and companie. This Ladie moued with this affection, wrought in such sort, as one night she deliuered him out of prison, hauing plighted their faithes, and promised marriage one vnto the other, without the priuie of the king D. Garcia Sanchez, and together tooke their way to Castille, where they had scarce entred the limits, but they met with great troupes of souldiours. These were the Earles subjects, who vpon the newes of his imprisonment had assembled themselves together in armes, and hauing made an Image like vnto their Lord, they had all taken a solemne oath before it, That not any one of them should returne vnto his house, vntill the Earle were deliuered, and that whosoever should doe otherwise, should be held for a traitor. Being thus resolu'd, they came into Nauarre, when as they had this happie encounter of the Earle D. Fernand, and the Countesse D. Sancho his spouse, whom they receiued with all the honour and signes of joy, that the place and their furniture would permit.

The king D. Garcia Sanchez being aduertised of his sisters flight, and the Earles deluerie, was wonderfully incensed; he leued an armie, and entred into the territories of Castille, whereas the Earle came to encounter him with a great power, and gaue him battaile, in the which the Nauarrois were defeated, and the king D. Garcia taken prisoner, being overthrown with the blow of a lance, by the Earle himselfe, who had fought for him, and encountered him in the fight. So he was led to Burgos, and there remained thirteene moneths in safe keeping. Then at the entreatie of the Countesse D. Sancho he was set at libertie, and sent into his country honourably attended. Yet for all this, the quarrels betwixt Castille and Nauarre were not ended: for a while after, the Earle D. Fernand being gone to Leon, the

A the king of Nauarre came againe with an armie, by the mountaines of Oca and Bureua, and ran as farre as Burgos, doing what he could to persuaide the Countesse D. Sancho to goe away with him, but she would giue no eare to him; wherefore he returned with a great bootie, hauing much spoiled the country. The Earle at his returne being informed of all which the king of Nauarre had attempted, complained first by embassages, and demanded reparation of damages which his subjects had endured, and hauing no reason done him, nor any good answer made, he tooke the course of armes, and led an arriere into Nauarre, where he gaue battaile vnto his enemies on the plaines of Valpierre, neere to Nagera and Brion, where the Nauarrois were manie in number, and well appointed. Those of Castille were in great danger, yet the equitie of their quarrell gaue them force and courage, so as they remained victors, and the Earle had full satisfaction of the wrongs and injuries which the king of Nauarre had done him. Such were the occasions, progresse, and end of the quarrels, betwixt Nauarre and Castille, according to the Spanish Chronicles, to the year of our Lord 934. After this, the country of Castille was in peace for a time, and the Earle D. Fernand had no other care, but to gouerne his subjects well, vnder good lawes, when as in Leon there was great trecherie practised against him, by the king D. Sancho, who was sorrie that the designs of Nauarre had not succeeded as he desired.

An. 934.

This king made an Assembly of all the Earles and Noblemen, and appointed his Court in the cite of Leon, whither the Earle of Castille was also called: who although he were sufficiently informed, whence all the wrongs came that were done him, and of the little good they wist him in that Court, yet could he find no meanes to excuse himselfe, and (which was worse) there were verie few of his friends. Being come to the gates of the cite, he might easily perceiue that he was not welcome, for that no man came to meet him, as they had done at other times; wherefore he entred into the cite like a private man, and of meane estate. Comming to kisse the kings hands, he was receiued with a frowning countenance, and sower speeches, telling him, that he detained the Earle of Castille from him: Whereupon the Earle seeking to satisfie the king with good reasons, hee was not heard, but put in sure gard, and kept in the cite of Leon, in the year 936.

An. 936.

The newes of his restraint did much trouble all Castille, but especially the Countesse, whom the good and well affected knights of Castille fought by all meanes they could to comfort, promising all their meanes for the Earles deliuerie. This Ladie being of a noble courage, and confirmed by the loyaltie she found in his subjects, put her selfe presently vpon the way, being accompanied by the chiefe of the nobilitie of the country, and going by secret and vnknowne passages, shee came neere vnto the cite of Leon; where shee left her troupes in ambush, and taking the habit of a pilgrime, pretending to goe and see the sepulchre of S. Iagues, shee entred into the cite, being accompanied onely with two men. The king being presently aduertised of the Countesses arriuall, he came vnto her, and desirous to doe her honour, being his aunt, he suffered her to see her husband who was prisoner, and to remaine that night with him, and commanded for her sake, that they should take off his yrons, wherewith he was bound. These two lours passed that little time which was allowed them to be together, in comforting one another, and in praying vnto God; and hauing concluded betwixt themselves what was to be done, this vertuous Princess D. Sancho gaue an example to all her sex, of what power conjugall loue is in a generous heart: for the attyred her husband so handsomely in her pilgrimes weed, as the keepers of the prison being deceived therewith, let him goe, thinking it had beene shee. The Countesse in the meane time remained prisoner: so as before they could discover the fraud, D. Fernand had meanes to get out of the towne, and to come vnto the knights, which lay in ambush, by whom hee was conducted into his country. This fact of the Countesse being reported vnto the king, he was so farre from blaming her, as admiring the force of so holie a loue, he deliuered her, honoured her, and sent her home to her husband, with a traine fit for her calling, although he were verie sorrie that the Earle had so elaped.

The king D. Sancho was still a debtor to the Earle of Castille, not onely for the price of his horse and hawke, but also for the multiplication thereof, the day of payment being long before expired: wherefore the Earle sent to demand his money of the king: and hauling neither payment, nor good wordes, he began to spoyle the territories of Leon: whereupon the king commanded his Treasurers to verifie this debt, and to seeke for meanes to discharge it. The summe was so often doubled and multiplied, from day to day, after the terme prefixed; as they reported vnto the king, That all the wealth of the kingdom of Leon would not be sufficient to pay that which was due vnto the Earle of Castille: wherefore after manie consultations and messages sent on either part, the king D. Sancho and the Earle D. Fernand fell to an agreement, That the king to be freed of this excessive summe of money, did remit vnto the Earle D. Fernand the lands and seigniorities of Castille, to enjoy them absolutely, without any reservation of fealtie, homage, nor vassallage to the Crowne of Leon, but freely and as Soueraignes, he, and his in perpetuities, whereof letters were passed in the year 939. Moors.

This Arabian king, for his last exploit of warre, had sent an armie of Moores into the territories of Leon, which layed siege before the citie, from whence notwithstanding they were forced to retire, by the vertue and good gouernment of those that were within it, as well fouldiors as citizens. Soone after this king died, the which, according vnto some, was about the year nine hundred thirtie nine, and of the Arabians raigne three hundred twentie two, hauing raigned fiftie yeares in Spaine. Hee was a lover of learning, so as in his time, Philosophie, Phisicke, and all other Arts, did flourish at Cordoua.

Leon.
 Sedition in Galicia.

During this time, there arose a great tumult and sedition in Galicia, vpon certaine priuate mens quarrells, who slew one another cruelly, without any respect vnto the king nor iustice: Wherefore the king D. Sancho was forced to lead an armie thither, with the which he did punish some of the mutines, and did force some of the rest to leaue the country. They passed the riuer of Duero, and yet retired into a country which did belong vnto the iurisdiction of Leon, in that quarter, the which was gouerned by an Earle, or Gouernor, called D. Gonsales, vnder the king D. Sancho. This bad vassale, in stead of supporting the kings iustice against these mutines, tooke armes in their fauour, and was so rash as to oppose himselfe against the kings forces, which pursued them into his gouernment: but remembering his owne follie in time, he had recourse to the the kings clemencie, who pardoned him, making him onely to confesse his fault, and to take a new oath of fealtie: yet this trecherous and ingratefull wretch, smothering in his breast the venome of treason, within few dayes after poysoned his king and naturall Prince with an apple which he gaue him. The king, who distrusted nothing, did presently bite of it, but his heart being suddainely infected with the poyson, he began to shake, and to shew other signes that he was stricken with death; wherefore he made hast to returne to Leon, but he died vpon the way, in the twelfth year of his raigne, and of our redemption 941, and lyes at S. Sauours in Leon. He had by his wife D. Theresa one sonne, called
 D. Ramir,

D. Ramir, who succeeded him in the realme of Leon. They find it written, That a little before his death there were great flames of fire seene rise out of the Ocean, the which being carried vp into Spaine, burnt a great country, and manie villages, as farre as Zamora.

 B Barcelon and Cattelogne was gouerned by him in qualitie of tutor, for the space of twenty yeares.

The religion of Spaine in those times was wholly reduced to the seeking out of Mar-Religio in tyrs bones, and other reliques. The building of Monasteries, gifts, and foundations, were held molt meritorious, as well for the liuing as for the dead. The inuocation of Saints deceased, whose victories, peace, and other prosperities, well knowne to the world, were then in credit. Most of the Bishops and Pastors were either verie prophane, or exceeding superstitious and ignorant.

In the raigne of D. Ramir, Ordogno the third, and Sancho the far, there had bene Bishops of Compotella, after Sisenand the fourth, Gundesin, who was much vnlike vnto his predecessor in holinesse of life, whose health was obtained by the prayers which his mo-C ther (a verie deuout woman) made continually (as the Spaniards say) before S. Iagues Sepulchre, which the Angelicall voices (heard at the Bishops decease) did witnesse; after whom, Hermigila was chosen, a very prophane man: then came Sisenand, as bad as the other.
 You may conjecture, that the other Bishoppicks were no better furnished then that of Compotella. These kings made foundations, and gaue infinite priuiledges to Abbots and other Clergie men, for the redemption of their soules, and of their predecessors, as their letters aboue mentioned containe.

D. Garcia Sanchez, king of Nauarre, did also confirme the vow of S. Emilian in his country, by letters dated in the year nine hundred thirtie foure. The Bishops did the D like for their parts. Galinde Bishop of Pampelone, for the great deuotion which he had vnto the Couent of S. Sauour of Leyra (where sometimes had bene the Episcopall seat of Pampelone) gaue vnto the Abbot and religious of that place all the titles of the Archprebirene of the valley of Onfella, by an Instrument dated nine hundred thirtie eight. The king D. Garcia, and D. Theresa his wife, gaue Villar de la Tour, neere vnto Nagera, with all the territorie and iurisdiction, to the same Monasterie, in the year nine hundred fortie three. Moreouer, by other letters, dated in the year nine hundred fortie foure, D. Garcia, and the Queene his wife, and D. Galinde the Bishop, (who is there called by the King, his lord and master) confirme the donation of part of the titles belonging to the Bishop, of the places aboue mentioned: And besides, there is another donation made of all that the king E of Nauarre should conquer from the Moores, Infidels, and Barbarians.

D. Ramir, the third of that name, and twentieth King of Leon.

12 IN the year nine hundred fortie one, D. Ramir was settled king at Leon: at whose comming the Norman pyrats did much annoy the coast of Galicia. This king being verie young, he was gouerned by the Queene D. Theresa his mother, and by D. Elura, F filter to the deceased king his father, being a religious woman. The peace which had bene treated with Hali Hatan, was confirmed by the mediation of the Bishop D. Velasco, who was at Cordoua, at the death of D. Sancho, and had brought with him the bodie of the infant Pelagius, the which was layed in a Monasterie built to that end by the decased king.

The

The Normanes which came into Galicia, being led by a capitaine called Gundred, spoyled all along the sea shore; and entering into the maine land, they burnt townes, villages, and castles, spoyling and putting all to the sword they encountered, holding as it werethe possession of Galicia for the space of two whole yeares, the which the king D. Ramir had no meanes to resist, by reason of his onage: yet in the end he was perswaded to send some troupes of souldiours, vnder the command of an Earle called D. Gonfalo Sanchez, who watched his opportunitie so well, as he defeated the Normanes, slew their capitaine Gundred, and burnt their shippes. D. Sisenand second Bishop of Compostella, had bene slaine by these pyrates: he was a turbulent man, and an vnworthie Prelate, of whom Histories report, that for his vices, prodigalitie, and lewd life, the king D. Sancho the fat had caused him to be put in prison; in whose place Rodofinde was chosen, a holie man and of good fame, a Monke of the Order of S. Benet: but after the death of D. Sancho, Sisenana being gotten out of prison, he came with force to enter his Bishopricke, being resolved to kill Rodofinde: the which he had effected, if this holie man had not willingly quit the place, returning to his Monasterie, where he ended the rest of his dayes. Afterwards, Sisenand pursuing the Normanes, being more fit to commaund souldiours then to gouerne the Church of Christ, hee was slaine with an arrow neere vnto Fomellos. Such were the Bishops for the most part in those times. The Estate of Leon was by this meanes peaceable, both within it selfe, and in regard of enemies abroad, hauing peace with the Moores.

King Hali Hatan being loth that the beginning of his raigne should passe without some famous exploit, being also solicited by D. Bela of Nagera, a knight of Alaua, who (as we haue said) had bene expelled by D. Fernand, Earle of Castille, and was retired to the Moores Court at Cordoua, hee rayled a mightie armie, the which hee sent to ruine the Earle of Castille (against whom he had a spleene, for the former warres) and tooke from him Sepuluedas, S. Estienne of Gormas, and other places, about the year 942, the which the Earle of Castille could not suddenly preuent, whereat he was so much discontented, as within few dayes after he died in Burgos, to the great griefe of all the people of Castille, and was interred in the Monasterie of Arlanfa, which hee founded. There is some reason to doubt of the yeare of his death, for that there is found in the Instruments and Titles of donation made by him, to the Monasterie of S. Emylian, of the towne of Saint Marie de Pezuegos, dated in the year 944; to the Church of S. Martin of Granon, the year 945; of certaine houses in the towne of Salines; of the Church of S. Stephen of Sabredo, dated 947, to the same Monasterie: of the Church of S. John Baptist of Ciguri, upon the river of Tiron, the which runnes into the river Ebro, neere vnto the towne of Haro: where it is expressly said, that the Earle D. Fernand and D. Sancho his wife make this donation to the Abbot and religious of the said Monasterie, and to their successors, for the loue of the glorious Confessor S. Emylian, that at the dreadfull day of judgement they might deserve to heare that comfortable voice of the Lord, Come ye blessed of my father, &c. In these letters D. Ferdinand did intitle himselfe Earle of Castille, of Alaua, and of Nagera.

There are registers and memorials found also in the Monasterie of S. Emylian, making mention of the Earle D. Fernand and of D. Vrraca his first wife, of the year 964, the which without doubt is false and counterfeit, as in truth there is no great certaintie in anything which the Monkes produce of their priuiledges, donations, exemptions, and other graunts of ancient kings. It is to be seene vpon the tombe of D. Sancho, Countesse of Castille, in the great Chappell of S. Peter of Arlanfa, that she died that year 964; and in the Era 1002, to Cont Fernand Gonfalo succeeded his third sonne D. Garcia Fernandes, the first of that name in the Earldome of Castille, and other places about mentioned, in the yeare, according to the common opinion, 942.

13 The Moores being masters of the field in Castille, there being no forces together to withstand them, being putt vp with successe, they entred the territories of Leon, breaking the peace which they had with the king D. Ramir, without any subiect, and came and besieged the towne of Zamora, the which they tooke, and ruined. whom they called for that respect Musaraber, had remained in great tranquillitie and peace, without forcing them in their religion in any sort whatsoever: Moreouer, they had iustice duly administred, paying the pensions and tributes which were imposed vpon them, whereby they were assured from all violence. But Hali Hatan being come to the Crowne, he was so zealous in his religion, and conceiued so great a hatred against that of the Christians, as he published an edict, by the which all Christians dwelling vnder his iurisdiction, were commanded to abiure the religion of Iesus Christ, and causing themselves to be circumcised, to imbrace that of Mahomet, vpon paine of death. Then did the spirit of God quicken in the hearts of many, the fire which had bene smothered by the humane traditions; and instructing them inwardly (seeing that the true religion hath no better meanes of propagation, than persecution: for loue and charitie surmount nature, making the dull quicke witted, causing them which were in a manner dumbe to speake, and giuing force and courage to the simple and weake. Many Christians of all sexes and ages, did virtuously confesse the saluation we haue in Iesus Christ, by his onely merit and satisfaction, before the Inquisitors and Iudges, which were sent by this barbarous king. The names of which holie martyrs are worthe of memorie, to be a president to all the faithfull; but we haue too few of them. In the citie of Cordoua there were put to death, for the testimonie of Christs truth, Aurelius, Gregorius, and Felix, with their wives, Natalia, Crescentia, and Liliosa. In the territorie of Rioje, Pellor, borne at Cerezo (who had long defended his fellow citizens from the violence of the Moores) was beheaded. At Bosca, neere to Nagera, Nunilla and Allodia, two holy sisters, suffered death: Yet by the letters and priuiledges of the kings of Nauarre, giuen to S. Sanjour in Leyre (where they say they were buried) it seemes their death was long before this persecution. In Arragon, in the towne of Iaca, the holie virgin Eurofa suffered: and many others in diuers parts of Spaine, where the Moores commaunded. Thus were the Christians afflicted both in peace and warre, by armes, and by vnjust proceedings.

The Authors of the Spanish Historie make no mention, that the king D. Ramir had any great care to suppress the insolencie of these Arabian Infidels, nor to be reuenged for the breach of peace, and the ruine and euersion of such a towne as Morata was: but they onely say, That about the year 955, being of full age, he married with a ladie called D. Vrraca, by whom it is not found that he had any children: and abandoning himselfe to a voluptuous life, he contemned all good counsell: so as the earles and noblemen of Galicia, seeing his follie, and discontented with his vices, they scorned him, and would no more acknowledge him for their king. Whereupon they did chuse D. Bermund, sonne to the last king D. Ordono, and intituled him King of Galicia: which title and countrey he enioyed ten yeares, notwithstanding all the attempts of D. Ramir, who made warre there two whole yeares, with great losse of his best men.

D. Garcia Fernandes new Earle of Castille, resisted the Moores valiantly, and being also invited by the baseness of king D. Ramir, and it may be by the remembrance of the injuries done by the king D. Sancho to the Earle D. Ramir, and the wrongs done by him also vnto the Earle D. Fernand his father, he entred the territories of Leon, and withdrew some places from him, so as falling to an accord, the river of Carrion was made the bounds betwixt the Estates of Leon and Castille. They hold, That this earle D. Garcia Fernandes, did build in Curuas Rubias, the monasterie of S. Cosme and Damian, and indowed it with great priuiledges, lands and possessions: retaining such a right of patronage, That if any gentlemene of his familie should want meanes to marie them according to their estates, or would liue vnmarried, they should be provided for, and entertained: leaving to the religious which serue in the monasterie, a competent pension to nourish them. This earle did augment the number of horsemen in Castille to six hundred, which at his fathers death were but two hundred. He married twice to French ladies, but vnfortunately: his first wife was called D. Argentiua, daughter to a French earle, with whom hee fell in loue, when as in the companie of her father and mother, she past through Castille, in pilgrimage to S. Iagues of Compostella, and demanded her of her father: but the proud vnchast, abandoning her selfe to a French knight, who came from S. Iagues, and carried her away into France, the earle being sicke in bed, six yeares after their mariage. The Spaniards report, That being cured, and much incensed at the

the wrong this knight had done him, he went out of Castille, and left the gouernement of his countries to Gilperez of Bauardillo, and Fernand Petes, two of his vassalls; and went into France in a disguised habit, where as this knight dwelt, and enjoyed D. Argemina: where he wrought in such sort, as he won the fauour of his daughter, called D. Sancho, or according vnto some, D. Ogra, with whom he laid a plot (vpon promise that he should take her to wife) That one night he should giue him entrance into her fathers house to reuenge his wrongs: Where as the earle slue those two adulterers in their bed, and so returned into Castille, carrying with him D. Sancho, or Ogra, his new spouse, whom he married in the cite of Bourgos. The name of this second wife is diuersly set downe by Spanish writers; some call her Sancha, others Ogra: the inscriptions of S. Peter of Arlanca, name her Abba. D. Garcia Fernandez the earle, had one sonne by her, called D. Garcia Roldanis, who died young, as it appeares by the inscriptions of the said monasterie. Moreouer, he had another sonne, called D. Sancho Garcia, who was earle. In the inscriptions of Saint Peter of Cardegna (where she was buried with her husband) it is said, that she was neece to the Emperour Henrie: and in all places called Abba, or Ogra. Besides these two sonnes, shee had one daughter called D. Praca, who was professe in the monasterie of S. Cosme and Damian, about Arlanca. During the time the earle was in France to seeke meane to be reuenged, and to get his new wife, the Moores entred into Castille, and spoyle all the countrey euen vnto Bourgos: and they wrote, That in the way they forced the monasterie of Saint Peter of Cardegna, and slue the Abbot and three hundred Monkes; some Authors write but two hundred, and that the destruction of this monasterie was some yeare before. But this place was redified by the earle D. Garcia Fernandes, and enriched with rents and jewels more then before. This happened during the time that D. Ramir king of Leon made warre against his rebellious subjects in Galicia.

Moors.
Anno 956.

Moors drawn into Galicia by the faction of a Bishop.

14 About the yeare 956 died that cruell enemie of the Christian Religion, Hali Hatan, king of the Arabians at Cordoua, the sixteenth yeare of his raigne, and 339 of the Arabians: to whom succeeded Hizen his sonne, the second of that name, called by others Izica. The forces of this king of the Moores, were drawne into Galicia, by the factions of a Bishop of Compostella, who had bene depose for his vices. The zeale of their ambition was such, as they made no conscience to expose Christians to the crueltie of Arabian Mahumetists. It is written in the Spanish Historicks, that D. Bermond raigning in Galicia, by an accord made with D. Ramir king of Leon, and making his ordinarie residence in the towne of S. Iaques, there came to the Episcopall dignitie of that place, D. Pelagius, Bishop of Lugo, sonne to Cont Roderigo Velasques: who shewing himselfe a prophane man, and disposing of Ecclesiasticall dignities to vnworthie men, deserued to be expelled, by the king D. Bermond, who advanced in his place a Monke of Saint Benoit, called D. Pedro of Monforio, of a reasonable good life. Cont Roderigo and his followers being incensed at this disgrace done vnto his sonne, called the Moores into Galicia, to be reuenged of the king D. Bermond. King Hizen was verie young at the decease of his father Hali Hatan; wherefore a nobleman among the Moores, valiant, and verie famous, called Abraham ibne, Aben Hamur, and by surname Alhabib Almanfor, took vpon him the gouernement of the realme of Cordoua, and of all Spaine vnder the Moores iurisdiction, the which he held fise and twentie yeares: and they report, that during his life, they entred two and fiftie times into the Christians countrey; and that he was of such credit among the Moores, as all was done by his aduice and counsell, Hizen hauing nothing but the bare name. Considering the name and surname of this great capitaine, it is to be presumed he had bene sent out of Affricke, by Manfor, Miraluminus of Maroc, then raigning, to gouerne Spaine during the minority of the king of Cordoua: for Alhabib Almanfor, is interpreted, Captaine, or protector and defender of his king Almanfor: Almanfor signifies victorious. The proper name of the Miraluminus was Baharabo. The Moores in Spaine drew great succours from Affricke, in manner of a Croisade, and vnder the title of religion. The first passage of the Moores into the Christians countrey, in the raigne of this king, was in the yeare 963, at the instance of Roderigo Velasques, into Galicia, where he committed infinit spoyle, and ruined part of S. Iaques church. But the plague being in his campe, he was forced to retire, and could not wholly ruine the countrey, as he had intended.

The

The king D. Bermond, and the noblemen of Galicia, after the Moores retreat, repaired the Leon. spoyle which they had made, as well as they could. In the meane time the king D. Ramir died without children, in the yeare 965: so as the kingdome of Leon came to the king D. Bermond. D. Ramir was interred at Deftiana, a monasterie, of a royall foundation, and a long time after transported to Athorga. S. Iaques church being repaired, and newly consecrated, D. Pedro of Manforio, the Bishop, died; and in his place D. Pelagius Diaz was chosen, a lewd man, and a contemner of all religion: wherefore he was iustly expelled, and Vimane his brother advanced in his stead, who for his vices deserued by a iust judgement of God, to be drowned in the riuer of Mioio. There was another substituted to him of as bad a life, the which was put in prison by the king D. Bermond. Thus was the church of S. Iaques still furnished with bad Pastors.

D. Bermond, second of that name, 21 King of Leon, called the Goutie.

15 Don Bermond, or Vermond, or Bermond, sonne to king D. Ordoño the third, vnto the Leon. Anno 965. two realms of Leon and Galicia, being receiued after the death of D. Ramir, without any difficultie.

In the beginning of his raigne, or thereabouts, Alcorrex was famous: hee was the first Moore (of whom any mention is made) that was called King of Seuille, since the Monarchie of the Arabians in Spaine: who spoyle all that part of Galicia which now belongs to Portugal, and lyes betwixt the riuers of Duero and Minio; and passing on he wasted all the countrey vnto S. Iaques, the which he sacked, and ruined. His armie was infected with the plague, as that of Almanfor, or Abraham ibne, Aben Hamur, had bene; who returned into the territories of Leon, and that knight of Alaua, aboue mentioned, marching with him, accompanied with a band of Christians his friends and partisans, he defeated the king D. Bermond in battell, at the riuer of Estolle, beyond Duero, and besieged the cite of Leon, from whence he was forced to raise his siege, by reason of the waters and winter. In the Spring he returned to this siege, into the which the king had put an earle, called Don Guillen Gonfalez, gouernour of Galicia, who did his best endeour to defend it: for being sicke in his bed, he caused himselfe to be carried in a litter, to the place where as the Moores made their greatest attempt, and defended it three dayes: but in the end, not able to resist to great a power, the towne was taken, D. Guillen, and many other braue men, were slaine, and the sacke giuen to the fouldiers. D. Bermond had bene carefull to retire the bodies of kings his predecessors, and especially the reliques and other jewels of the temple, the which he caused to be transported to Ouiedo. This calamitie happened in the yeare 968, the which fell also vpon Athorga, Valence de Campo, Sahagun, Gordon, Albe, Lune, and other townes which were ruined. Then the Moores entring Castille, they tooke and sacke the townes of Olma, Berlanga, Atienza, and other places, whereof some were ruined and some made tributarie. And with this successe they returned with their victorious armie to Cordoua, with great spoyle, and (which was most lamentable) a great number of poore Christian slaues of all sexes and ages: and to increase their miseries (and to aggravate their guilt, they were for the most part so carelesse of God and all religion, as they betrayed their brethren and companions vnto the Moores, without respect of blood, countrey, profession, or honour.

In Castille there was a knight called D. Ray Velasques, lord of Villaren, whose sister D. Sancha was married to D. Gonfal Iuste, sonne to that Iuste Gonfalez who was issued from a daughter of D. Diego Porcellos; and who enjoyed the Seigniories of Salas and of Lara. D. Gonfal Iuste, and D. Sancha his wife, had seuen sonnes, whom they commonly called the children of Lara, or of Salas, bred vp in all vertue, by a discrete knight, called Nazmo Salido, who was valiant and hardie; all which were made knights in one day, by the earle D. Garcia Fernandes, vnto whom they were allied: It happened, that D. Ray de Velasques, their vncle by the mothers side, married a ladie borne in Bureua, the chiefe towne of which countrey is Bibiesca: her name was D. Lembera, allied also to the earle D. Garcia Fernandes: she was young, indifereet, proud, and high minded. Whose mariage was celebrated with great pompe in the cite of Bourgos, whiwhither came many knights from Castille, Leon, Nauarre, and other places, and among others, D. Gonsal Iuste, and his wife D. Sancho, with their seuen sonnes assisted. During the solemnity of this marriage, which continued five weekes, the younger brother of the seuen had some vnkind speeches with D. Alvaro Sanchez, cousin to D. Lambra the Bride, who were for that time reconciled by the means of the earle D. Garcia, and of D. Gonsal Iuste, father to one of the contendants. But the new married wife was so incensed for this breach with her cousin, as she conceived a deadly hatred against all the house of Lara. The marriage being ended, D. Sancho went with her seuen sonnes, to accompanie the married couple to their house at Barbadillo, whereas D. Lambra epying one day the younger brother (which had the quarrell with her cousin) in an orchard, bathing a Goshawke, he commaunded a groom to call a fithie Cucumber at him, to doe him a despite: wherewith the knight, and his brethren, who were present, being moued, they pursued this groom in such a rage, as thinking to saue himselfe by the fauour of his ladie, he was slaine nere vnto her, who could not saue him.

At the same time neither D. Ruy Velasquez, nor D. Gonsal Iuste, were with their wives, for they did accompanie the earle D. Garcia, who presently after this marriage, went to visit his country, and the sorts of Castille: but when as they were returned to Barbadillo, they vnderstood (to their great griefe) of this outrage. Euerie one retires to his own house, D. Lambra mad with rage & impatiencie, wept, & exclaimed continually, saying vnto her husband, That if he did not revenge this affront done vnto her selfe, he should neuer liue contented. And such was the importunitie of this woman to her indiscreet & ill aduised husband, as, to satisfie her, he resolved to commit an act, unworthie not onely of a Christian knight, but of any one that carried but the shape of a man: For he had secret intelligence with Almanzor, Countable of Cordoua, vterly to ruine this familie of Lara. Making thence therefore to haue some businesse of importance with this Moore, and his king Elzen, he intreated his brother in law D. Gonsal Iuste, to goe to Cordoua, with letters which he gaue him; whereunto he offered himselfe willingly. In the meane time the traitor Velasquez had written to Hizen and Almanzor, That they should put him to death; & moreover, that if he sent any one with a good troupe into Castille, he would deliuer the seuen sonnes vnto him, which were the most redoubted knights, and the greatest enemies to the Arabians, that the earle of Castille had in his Court. D. Gonsal Iuste being arrived at Cordoua, and hauing presented his letters vnto the king, he was presently put in prison: for the king being wise, although an Infidell, would not altogether countenance so great a treason. Wherefore he kept this embassadour aliae; yet he sent presently towards the country of Almanzor (where these brethren should be deliuered vnto him) a capitaine with a great troupe of souldiers, where (as they write) D. Ruy de Velasquez gaue such order, as the seuen brethren fell into an ambush of Moores, being accompanied onely with two hundred horse, which made resistance: but the enemies were so many as one of the brethren called Fernand Gonsales, and all the two hundred, with Nugno Salido, were slaine vpon the place: the other six escaped, and hauing drawne together three hundred horse more, and returned to the combat, they were againe defeated, and taken by the Moores, who cut off their heads, and sent them all to Cordoua, as well those of the seuen brethren, as that of their Gouernour Nugno Salido.

The king was verie glad to see himselfe freed from such redoubted enemies; and to afflicte the father, who was prisoner, he caused these heads to be shewed vnto him: who knew them, and was so opprest with griefe, as he fell downe dead vpon the place. Being taken vp, and reuiued, he made such pittifull lamentations, as euen the barbarous king himselfe was much moued, and thought euen then to set him at libertie, detesting the wickednesse of that traitorous Christian D. Ruy de Velasquez.

They say, That whilst D. Gonsal Iuste was detained in prison, but not verie straitly, being often visited by noblemen and ladies, that were Moores, there grew so great familiarity betwixt him & one of the chief ladies of the kings house, which, some say, was his sister, as he got her with child: which perceiving about the time of his deliuerie, they tooke good order for the infant, when it should be borne. It was a sonne, whom they called Madarra Gonsales: who reuenged the treason of D. Ruy Velasquez, committed against his father and brethren. D. Gonsal Iuste returned to Salas, with gifts from the Moorish king. As for the bodies of the dead, they were interred, but no man knowes where; for there is some question about it, betwixt the the Monkes of S. Peter of Arlanza, and those of S. Emilian of Cogolla; the which we cannot decide, either of them maintaining to haue in their churches and conuents, the tombes of these seuen brethren, their father, and Gouernour, without any great proofe of their assertions, as in other things. Such was the disposition and affection of men of that age, who called themselves Christians. They hold, that these things happened in the yeare 969; some say it was some yeares before, but euerie one to reuenge his priuate quarels, did hazard the publick: and not able to oppresse their enemies by open force, they vied vnlawfull and damnable meanes, to wrong one another, making way for the Moores, or rather insulting them, to invade the Christians country.

In the yeare 975 a great armie of Moores, both Spaniards and Affricanes, led by that famous capitaine Albabit Almanzor, invaded the country betwixt Duero and Minio; and from thence into Galicia: so as the towne and church of S. Iaques was taken by them, sackt and ruined. Yet the Spaniards say, That the Apostles sepulchre could not be violated, being terrified with a great light which came out of it: but they onely tooke the little bells in the steeple, and carried them away with the rest of the prey to Cordoua, where they made them serue for lampes to their great Mosque. In the meane time (as Authors write) the Moores armie was so afflicted with the plague, and bloudie flux, as being forced to disperse themselves, they were cut in peeces by D. *Bernard*s troups, which he had sent to follow them in their retreat: So God by his power did supplie the defects of indifereet and cowardly Christian Princes.

The king D. Bernard, as the Spanish Historiess write, was wise, but withall had great defects. He was light of beleefe, and soone incensed; and withall, so much giuen to his delights and pleasures, as he had both bodie and mind corrupted. He did incestuously entertaine two and his concubines, before he married; by the one of which he had a sonne called D. Orogno; by the other a daughter named D. Eluira. After which he married D. Velasquita, whom he put away after that he had had a daughter by her, called D. Christina. To his second wife he married a ladie called D. Eluira, by whom he had D. Alphonso, who was king after him, and one daughter called D. Theresa, who was profest a Nunne, and was borne before her brother D. Alphonso. He became full of the gout, by reason of his excessse, so as he was lame of his limmes, and therefore was called the Goutie.

D. Sancho Garces, third of that name, and eleuenth King of Nauarre.

There is no great certaintie of the exploits of the kings of Nauarre in these times, either through the negligence of Historians, or the losse of their writings. They coniecture, that the king D. Sancho Garces liued vnto the yeare 969; and that he was inttered in the monasterie of S. Sauicour of Leyre: to whom succeeded his sonne D. Sancho Garces; whom he had by D. Theresa, by whom he had also D. Ramir his second sonne, who gouerned the province called Vicaria. He had daughters, D. Vrraca, Ermesilda, and Eximena. The king had to wife a ladie called D. Vrraca Fernandez, by whom he had three sonnes, D. Garcia, D. Gonsales, and D. Ramir.

This king D. Sancho Garces, the third of that name, raigning; the king D. Bernard seeing the great miseries which fell daily vpon the Christians, by reason of their diuisions, whereof the Infidell Moores made their profit, he sought by all meanes possible to make a good vnion betwixt Leon, Nauarre, and Castille: the which tooke good effect, for all the Princes and Lords of these Estates, shewing themselves readie, and desirous to be reuenged of the wrong which the Moores had done in Galicia, Castille, and elsewhere, they vnted their forces, and came to encounter the Moores with a goodly armie (theirs being not lesse) at a place called Calcanasor, an Arabian word, which signifies yoke: where there was a memorable battell, and great effusion of blood, especially of the Moores: and yet the fight hauing continued a whole day, the victorie seemed doubtfull. But Albabit the Arabian hauing gathered his forces together, and viewed his great losse, he dislodged in the night, with his great griefe, as he did within few dayes after, at a place called Begalcoraxor, or Borgecorax. The Christians at the break nourable traine of noblemen and knights from the king, he came to Salas, where the father and the sonne had meanes to know and aduow one another, to their great joy and content: and soone after Mudarra, hauing left the law of Mahomet, was baptized, and made a Christian. Then he came in companie with his father to Burgos, to kille the hands of the earle D. Garcia, and to watch an opportunitie to kill his vnkle D. Ruiz Velazquez, and to reuenge the death of his house brethren; the which he did execute in time, as D. Ruiz went from Burgos to his house of Barbadillo: and finally, hee found meanes to get D. Lambra into his power, whom he caused to be hung vp, and then burnt her bodie: but it was after the death of D. Garcia, earle of Castille, to whom shee was allied. And for that he was verie like to the youngest of the seuen sonnes of D. Sancho his mother in law, she did loue him as deere as if she had beene his owne mother.

The Monkes of Saint Peter of Arlansa shew a tombe in their church, without any inscription, the which, they say, is the tombe of that knight D. Mudarra: of whom they make this Genealogie, or descent; which is, That he had one sonne, named D. Ordago de Lara, from whom issued D. Diego Ordago de Lara, who did fight a combat at Zamora, against D. Arias Gonzales: from D. Diego Ordago descended D. Pedro de Lara, and from him the earle D. Almarie of Lara, whom others call Mabrique, or Manrique, who was lord of Molina des Comtes: and from him, they say, are descended, the Manriques of Lara in Castille. This earle D. Almarie, or Manrique of Lara, had one daughter, called D. Malfada Manrique, who was the first queene of Portugal, wife to D. Alphonsus Henrie, king of Portugal, of whom we will speake hereafter.

About the yeare 982, when as king D. Alphonsus came to the Crowne of Leon, there were great alterations in Castille; for that D. Sancho Garcia, sonne and heire to the earle D. Garcia Fernandes, rebelled against his father, and put Castille into factions. Whereupon the Moores failed not to enter the countrey of Castille, destroyed the citie of A. nula, tooke Saint Estienne de Gormas, and Crugna in the bishopricke of Olma, slew, spoyle, and burnt all where they past.

D. Garcia Fernandes being gone to field with those souldiers of Castille whom hee thought to be best affected vnto him, being but few, in comparison of the Moores, hee did hazard a battell, in which fighting valiantly, hee was enuironed by a multitude of his enemies, where his men were cut in peeces, and hee himselfe taken aliue by the Moores, but so sore wounded, as he died within few houres after. His bodie was afterwards redeemed for a great summe of money, and buried in the monastirie of Saint Peter of Cardena, reedified by him fseuenteene yeares before. This happened about the yeare nine hundred fourescore and ten, or according to the inscription of his tombe, nine hundred fourescore and fise. Then D. Sancho his sonne, surnamed Garcia, was earle, without any contradiction; and except this diffidence against his father, he was a good Prince, and loued his subiects.

19 Whosoeuer was mother to D. Sancho, either Abba, Ogna, or Sancho daughter to the knight which was slaine by D. Garcia, or else allied to the Emperour Henrie, there is a tragicall act reported of her in the Histories of Spaine: That being widow to her husband D. Garcia Fernandes, shee fell in loue with a Prince of the Moores, whom shee had heard was verie sufficient in Penna sports: so as shee had a secret treatie with him, to marie him; promising (to the end they might with more ease effect their designe) to make away her sonne, by poyson, vpon the first opportunitie: But God would haue this wickednesse discovered to the earle D. Sancho, the day before it should bee put in execution. Wherefore being verie carefull of all things, as the mother and the sonne dined together on the day appointed; the earle calling for drinke, they brought him a cup full of wine, mingled with poyson: Then dissembling what hee knew, he intreated his mother to drinke first; as if hee would doe her honour; but shee refusing it, hee still persisted, and in the end forced her to drinke this poyson, whereof shee died. The generall Chronicle sayes, That thereof grew a custome in Castille, to make the women drinke first, the which is obserued at this day in Biscaie, and other parts in Spaine, by way of ciuilitie.

A This accident was the cause which made the earle D. Sancho to build the conuent of Saint Sauour of Ogna, where he placed Nunnes, and made a daughter of his, called D. Tygrida, Abbess; thinking thereby to expiate his offence, for that he had hastened his mothers death. Since there were Monks put in this monastirie, and the women were transported elsewhere, by the king D. Sancho the elder, sonne in law to this earle D. Sancho Garcia, and husband to D. Nunga: for the earle had by his wife D. Prraca, one sonne, who was called D. Garcia, who was earle of Castille after him; and three daughters, D. Nunga, who was queene of Nauarre, D. Therese, queene of Leon, wife to D. Bermond the third, and last of that name, these two sisters were elder than the Infant D. Garcia; and the third was the aboue named D. Tygrida, Abbess of this monastirie of S. Sauour.

B 20 Whilest these things past in Castille, the Moores entred Cattelogne with a great power, about the yeare 986, and gaue a great rout to the earle D. Borel, who thought to repulse them neere to Moncada and Matabous: After which they besieged Barcelone, and tooke it by force, with all the pitifull spectacles of crueltie, couerousnesse, and infamie, that was in the like case; doing the like in many other places. Then laden with spoyle, and drawing after them an infinit number of poore Christian slaues, they returned into their countrey. The earle, who was retired into the mountains, hauing gathered together all the horle and foot he could, returned to Barcelone, tooke it againe, and recovered all the places which the Moores had taken. Cattelogne was againe invaded by the Moores, which held Tortosa, Terida, Fraga, and other places, being ioyned with them of the Isle of Majorca, who once againe defeated the earle D. Borel: and thinking to saue himselfe with about threecore horle, he was pursued; and being forced to shut himselfe vp in the castle of Gautha, neere to Caldes, he was forced, and slaine there, with all those that were in his companie, in the yeare 993, hauing bene earle of Barcelone six and twentie yeares, where his sonne D. Raymond Borel succeeded him. We find, that Lothaire king of France (vnder the foueraigntie of which kingdome the earldome of Barcelone was at that time) granted a great priuiledge to the monastirie of S. Cucufat, in the vallies neere to Barcelone, giuen at Compiene, in the yeare 987.

But returning to D. Sancho Garcia, earle of Castille, he being loath to leaue his fathers death vreuenged, confirmed the league which his predecessor had made with Leon and Nauarre, and in the yeare 992 entred into the Moores countrey, by the realme of Toledo, with a great armie, ruining and spoyleing all where he past, as the enemies had done in Leon and Castille: passing on into diuers other iurisdiccions, where he had good opportunitie to ruine, burne, kill, and carrie away what he pleased, for that the Arabians were then full of factions for the foueraigntie. There was no head, order, nor council, to oppose against the violence of this incensed earle, so as hee ranfomed many townes, and drew great summes of money from them, as well to spare their countrey, as to redeeme prisoners. Hee tooke the towne of Sepulveda, which was then a frontier for the Moores towards the strait of Suterra. Hee granted many priuiledges to the inhabitants thereof, restoring them to their ancient iurisdiccions. Hee recouered the townes of Pennafiel, Maderuel, Monteio, Gormas, Olma, and Saint Esteua; which places had bene lost after the battell where his father D. Garcia was slaine. The earle did all these braue exploits against the Moores: but some hold, and not without reason, that they were before the death of the countresse his mother; who at the returne of this voyage (which was in the yeare 993) had newes what this aboue mentioned Prince of the Moores could doe with women: of whom the grew so far in loue, as she forgot all pietie, and honour, and in the end lost her life. His name is not written by any Author. If the earle did much annoy the Moores by open warfare, hee did no lesse by secret practises, entertaining factions among them, to trouble their estate, and make them more easie to be spoyle.

F 21 There were great seditions among the Arabians after the death of Abdemic Abun- dafin, Captaine generall, or Constable to king Hizen: for hauing bene substituted in the place of his brother, called Abderramen, and shewing himselfe too seuer and proud in his commands, his place seeming also to be of too great authoritie, he was slaine by the souldiers: which bred great quarels and factions. D. Sancho, earle of Castille, and D. Alphonsus, king king of Leon, fought by all means possible to entertaine these diuisions, sometimes fauouring one partie, sometimes another: so as from that time the Arabians power began greatly to decline in Spaine, as it had bene already dismembred in the East, by their discord and furious desire of raigne, the which we will hereafter relate in a more conuenient place. The Estate of Miralumin Hizen was wonderfully troubled in those times, by many which desired either to raigne, or to haue the greatest charges in the kingdome of Cordoua, namely, the dignitie of Alhabib: among the which there was a Moore, called Zuleima, stronger than the rest, by the support and fauour hee had from D. Sancho, earle of Castille: He tooke and shut vp Hizen, after that he had reigned three and thirtie yeares, foure monethes, in the 379 year of the Arabians, and made himselfe king of Cordoua, in the year of our redemption 989. He was an African, or Barbarian, and was much fauoured from beyond the seas. In his raigne was the last rout giuen to the Cartellans, and their earle forced, and slaine, as we haue said. But he did not long enjoy this Estate of Cordoua; for another nobelman of great power, called Mahamad Alchedi, or Almohadi, of the lineage of Aben Humeia, rose vp against him, and deprived him of his kingdome in Spaine, in the year of our Lord 993, which he had maintained foure yeares, with great toyle and difficultie.

In his time there reigned a Moore at Toledo, called Abdalla, who was solicited in such sort by D. Alphons king of Leon, as they contracted together, and did sweare a perpetuall offensiue and defensive league betwixt them: the which was so strongly confirmed, as D. Alphons gaue his sister D. Theresa, a Christian, in marriage to Abdalla, an Infidell king, and sent her to him to Toledo, notwithstanding that he did contradict it all she could. They say, That this Moore being ready to consummate the marriage, he was admonished by the Ladie, that it was not lawfull to doe it, seeing they were of two diuers religions; and that for so prophane a contempt, he might assure himselfe God would punish him grievously, if he refused to proceed. But notwithstanding all her allegations, the Moore would not forbear to accomplish his desire; but he was presently surpris'd with such a terrour and amazement, as if death had approached. Wherefore repenting himselfe, he sent backe D. Theresa to Leon, to the king her brother, with great store of treasure; and rich jewels, for that he would not touch her. This princeesse liued long in Leon, in the habit of a religious woman, and in the end put her selfe into the monasterie of Saint Pelagus, where she died, and was interred.

In the meane time Mahamad the third, or Mahumet, of the race of Aben Humeia, surnamed Almohadi, settled himselfe in the realme of Cordoua, and was Miralumin of the Arabians in Spaine; who shewed himselfe so cruell in the beginning, against the inhabitants of Cordoua, partisans to Zuleima his predecessor, of the lineage of Aben Alaucci, that many of them fled out of the citie, and liued in banishment. By reason of this diuision, many other noblemen, Moores, seized vpon places and prouinces in Spaine, of the iurisdiction of the Miralumin of Cordoua: as Abdalla did, who (as we haue said) had seized vpon the citie of Toledo, & restored the royall seat there, where he was the fourth king: since which time it continued a royallie, and returned no more vnder the soueraintie of the kings of Cordoua. In some Authors we find a tale of a Gentlewoman called Guliena, daughter to Galsfrey, king of Toledo, who by her beautie drew Charlemaine out of France to Toledo, where he did fight with knight called Bramante, that would haue married her: and, they say, that Charles being victor, he led faire Guliena into France. But there is no great probability, that this happened to Charlemaine. It may be that since there was a Guliena, daughter to some Governour of Toledo, called Galsfrey, famous for some like act: For we find in the citie of Toledo, a place called Galienas Palace, where as now the Monasterie of S. Foy is: and in like manner at Bourdeaux in Guienne. Which shewes, that some ladie of fame came out of Spaine into France, but conducted by some other Charles than he that was king and Emperor Iurnajmed the Great. Zuleima being expelled by Mahumet, fled from towne to towne, being accompanied by many Moores and Barbarians, who conspired against him, in fauour of a cousin of his called Almeson, whom they would chuse for their captain: but being ready to kill him, Zuleima being aduertised, and prepared, slue them which pretended to murder him: As for his cousin roan,

Almeson, he saved his life, but he kept him in a strait prison. Being enuironed with so many miseries, chased from Cordoua, a vagabond, and not safe among his owne followers, he had recourse vnto D. Sancho, earle of Castille, craving succours from him, to recouer his Estates. Wherewith the earle was verie well pleased, and led a great power of Christians into the Moores country; and with him D. Raymond, earle of Barcelona, as some write. Mahumet did also make great leues of souldiers, whereof the Alhabib, or Generall, was Alhabarin Almaharin, who did reside at Medina Zelim, or Celi; and had commaundement to come and ioyne with the armie, with all the forces he could make. Their forces being joyned of either side, there was a fierce and bloudie battell, betwixt Zuleima and Mahumet, whereas Zuleima (who had the forces of Castille with him) was victor, haniag slaine five and thirtie thousand of his enemies vpon the place: and pursuing his victorie, he chased Mahumet, and those which remained, as farre as Cordoua. And whilst that Zuleimas men and the Christians were busie at the spoyle of the suburbs; the Alhabib, Alhabarin abandoned his king, and tooke his way to Medina Celi, with those that would follow him. It was then a great fort and rampart of the Moores Estate, against Castille, Aragon, and Nauarre. Mahumet seeing himselfe defeated, and abandoned, was so faint-hearted, as he shut himselfe vp into the fort of Cordoua, resolving to deliuer king Hizen, who was a prisoner there: chusing rather to see Hizen raigne than Zuleima. The people of Cordoua hearing speake of their true king Hizen, made io great an exclamation of joy, as Mahumet thinking himselfe lost, and fearing to die, fled and hid himselfe in a Moors house, who was borne at Toledo, and verie confident vnto him, with whom that night he fled to Toledo. Wherefore Zuleima entred into Cordoua, and raigned againe, Mahumet hauing bene king but one year, which was in the year of our Christ 994, and of the Moores 377. A memorable date, for that this yeare the seuen Princes Electors in Germanie were instituted at the instance of the Emperour Otho, and Pope Gregorie the fifth.

King Zuleima being reestablished in Cordoua, he sent backe D. Sancho, earle of Castille, and his men, well satisfied, rewarding euerie one according to his degree. Yet he was not received, nor obeyed, throughout all the townes of his iurisdiction, but some maintained Hizens partie, who was prisoner at Cordoua. Mahumet Almohadi being come to Toledo, Abdalla raigned there, but not verie quietly in the beginning; but the hatred the Toledanes did beare to the kings of Cordoua, made his way the more easie. Neither of these two tyrants raigned long; for Alhabarin the Alhabib, who liued at Medina Celi, hearing that Zuleima was much troubled to subdue the people of the iurisdiction of Cordoua, which were rebelled against him, he made a leue of souldiers, both Moores and Christians, and came to Mahumet Almohadi, at Toledo, who had bene newly made king of that citie; but the manner how is not specified in Histories. There hauing raised a great armie, they tooke their way to Cordoua, to deliuer king Hizen, who was prisoner. Whereof Zuleima being aduertised, he resolved to defend himselfe; calling all his friends and vassals together, whereof most of them excused themselves, shewing that they were naturally bound vnto king Hizen, for whose deliuerie they knew Mahumet had taken arms, with Alhabarin, and some Christian captaines which were in their armie, whereof two are called Bermendo, and Argomento. Notwithstanding this refusal, Zuleima relying vpon the forces of Barbarie, who assured him that they would neuer forsake him, sallied out of Cordoua, and came and affronted the enimie, nine leagues from the citie, at a place called Hacatallabalar; where his first charge was so happy, as he put the formost of the enemies squadrons to rout, and slue so many, as hee thought all had bene defeated, and Mahumet dead: but the Christians which were in Mahumets armie, rallied their disordered battell, and charged Zuleimas men with such violence, as they made them quit the field, with great slaughter of the Barbarian Africans. Zuleima saved himselfe with a small troupe in the fort of Casia. They write, that in this battell there died thirtie thousand Moores, and nine thousand Christians; among which were D. Arnoul, Bishop of Aufa, Etius Bishop of Barcelona, and Otho of Girone, who carried armes for the Moores quarels: by the losse whereof Zuleima left the realme of Cordoua the second time, where hee had raigned a yeare. Hizen a prisoner was restored to his royall Estate by the victors, the people of Cordoua being affected to him, and did mutine to haue him: and Alahumet was the more inclined to him, for that he was seled at Toledo. The victor prepared to besiege Casfra, to expell Zuleima, and to spoyle the treasure that was within it: but foreseeing the danger, he dislodged, and carried away with him what he could.

The castle being abandoned, was taken by them of Cordoua, and that which remained spoyled, and the soldiers which were found in it, slaine: The bootie which was taken in this castle, was carried to the great Mosque at Cordoua, and there consecrated. This done, Alahumet the Alhabib, led the armie against some places in Andalousia, which continued in their rebellion since the former diuisions; he besieged Alherie, which was defended by Asla, a Moore of a great house, and battered it twentie dayes: the which in the end was forced, and Asla, with some of his children, drowned: The like happened to the townes of Laen, Baeza, and Ariona, the which were kept for king Hizen. In this manner did the Moores make warre, being diuided into two factions, whereof the one held the partie of Hizen, and of the Moores in Spaine, and the other of the Barbarians, and Moores of Alfrick, of whom Zuleima was the chiefe in Spaine.

Alahumet Almohadi reigned at Toledo after Abdalla very little; for the Historians make present mention of his sonne Obeidalla, first king of Toledo: against whom king Hizen seeing himselfe now settled in his kingdom, sent his lieutenant with a great armie, to reduce them of Toledo vnder his obedience: who made a sallie vpon them of Cordoua, where there was a cruell combat: but the end was shamefull for the Toledanes, who lost their king Obeidalla there, and many of their men: Yet were they not daunted, neither did they abate any thing of their rebellious contumacie against Hizen, and the Estate of Cordoua, whom they did hate extremely: For presently after their defeat, and the death of their king Obeidalla, they chose another of the same linage of Aben Humeya, called Hurram, the seventh king in number, who left the Scepter of Toledo to his descendants, vntill it was conquered by the Christians.

This past about the year 1008, when as king Hizen, thinking himselfe to be in more quiet and securitie then euer, he found himselfe plunged in greater troubles then before: for the Moores were so greedie of commaund, as those which had any authoritie or power, would make head against whom soeuer that would commaund them. The which was no wonder, for that in the citie of Cordoua, and the iurisdiction thereof, there were infinit families descending from kings of the Moores, issuing from the race of Aben Humeya: which grew by reason of their pluralitie of wiues, which their sect allowed; which was the cause of seditions and reuolts, for the desire of rule.

During these ciuile warres, the Carrelans and Barcelonians had bene in peace, and free from the Moores inuasions, and had rather sought to annoy them, or inuade them, either alone, or joyntly with the Castilians. D. Raymond Borel, the earle, who had succeeded his father, did burie, in a manner at the entrie of his principallitie, his cousin D. Oliban Cabrera, earle of Cerdagne and Belsu, at our Ladie of Ripon, in the year 994: whose Estates were diuided among his children D. Bernard Brisefer, and D. Geoffrey. This new earle had fortified Barcelone, and repaired all the spoyles which the Moores had made during the warre against D. Borel his father; joyning the Monasterie of Montjuhy to the walls of Barcelone, and called it S. Peter of the virgines, to gratifie D. Borella his sister, whom some call Engelrade, Abbess of that place. There is no mention made of him in Histories, but that he had one sonne called D. Berenger Borel, in the year 995, who succeeded him after his death.

D. Garcia, called the Trembling, fift of that name, and 12. King of Nauarre.

Nauarre. 23 IN the same yere of the decesse of the earle D. Borel, which was 993, died (according to the common opinion of writers) D. Sancho the 3. sonne to D. Garcia Sanches, king of Nauarre; but it is most vncertaine: for the computation of the liues and raiges of these first kings of Nauarre, Leon, and other Princes and Potentates of Spaine, is so diuers and confused in their writings, as no man can judge rightly of them. D. Sancho gaue for the souls for the health of his sonne D. Ramiro, to the Monasterie of S. Emilian, the towne of Cardenas, with all the appurtenances. Afterwards D. Garcia his sonne, furnished the trembling, succeeded him in the kingdom of Nauarre, and the Countie of Arragon. This surname was given him, for that when he entered the combat, he did tremble, not for feare, but by a natural fault, the which did afterwards come into force and valour, being a little hear. In a certain time he did grand donations made in the year 996, of the towne of Henerio, granted by this king D. Garcia to the Monasterie of S. Emilian of Cogolla, mention is made of Alahumet and D. Garcia his nephewes, who were sonnes to D. Ramiro his brother, whom they called king of Arragon; it may be it was onely in title: he died in the life time of D. Sancho their father, and by his death Alahumet their other brother is said also to have reigned in Arragon with D. Ramiro, Quene mother to these three Princes, and not the children of D. Ramiro, the which is a stronger argument that they were but titles. To which place of S. Emilian, this king D. Garcia and D. Ximena his wife make another donation of the water which comes from the valley of Alanson, to water their fields and orchards one day and a night in the weekes; to which titles D. Ramiro is alwaies set: for it was alwaies a custome of the Princes in Spaine, for honour sake, to name their mothers and wiues, in all letters of donation and priuiledges which they graunt; for they soule (by they) and that of their father, and they make this donation to S. Emilian, whom they call their Patron, as they had bene taught. Without doubt their deuotion in those times to S. Emilian had bene verie great. C who was called on as an Aduocate and Patron by the Christians in Spaine, from Burgos into the Ocean: of the which there are two Monasteries, the one called the higher, the other the lower.

D. Garcia the trembling married D. Ximena, and yet there is great diuersitie among Authors touching the name of this Ladie, by whom he had D. Sancho, who was king after him. He recommended his education and bringing vp to D. Sancho, Abbot of Saint Saluator of Leyre, who was afterwards Bishop of Pampelone. The qualities of this king are little knowen, for want of ancient records, whereof they commend one, the which is questionable, whether it be a vertue or a vice, That he could neuer refuse any thing that was demaunded of him: but they chiefly merit to be held liberrall, when as they giue, with judgement, and measurably to men of merit, otherwise they are reardned prodigall, ignorant, carelesse, and contempters of the chiefe point of their charge, which is, to distribute rewards and punishments equally. There is no mention made of his warres and enterprises. He reigned, as they estimate, seven yeares, and so he died in the thousand year of our Saviour. His bodie, as Estates some hold, was buried at S. John de la Pega; others say, at S. Saluator at Leyre, which place was more famous, and of greater authoritie.

D. Sancho, the fourth of that name, and thirteenth King of Nauarre.

E 24 D. Sancho succeeded his father D. Garcia the trembling in his Estates, accounted the thirteenth king of Nauarre; a vertuous and valliant Prince, and famous for his great exploits; during whose raigne, the Historie, and especially the computation of times, begins to be more plaine and certaine, than in the time of his predecessors.

25 In the year 1001 of our redemption, and the 384 of the Arabians Empire, and 287 Moores. of their entrie into Spaine, Zuleima being abandoned by the Castilians, he had recourse to the king of Saragosse and Carrace, with whose aid he recovered Cordoua, and made himselfe king againe, Hizen being fled into Africke; one of whose captaines, called Hali Hatan, holding Orichela, called Hali Gouvernor of Ceuta, and caused him to passe with some forces into Spaine, in hope to raigne there. These two did besiege and take Cordoua, and Zuleima in it, whom Hali slue with his owne hands: but it was not long before Hali Hatan did rise againe, whom he troubled much for the space of two yeares, and after some batailles against Hali, whom he caused him to be secretly slaine in a bath, in the towne of Iawoon and lost on either side, he caused him to be secretly slaine in a bath, in the towne of Iawoon, by some of his Eunuches, whom he had corrupted, in whose place, the noblemen and knights

knightes of the Moores which were at Lahen, chose his brother Casin, who kept at Seule, in the year 1003, and 386 of the Arabians raigned. Manie African Moores of Barbarie, (some sent for, some voluntaries, to seeke their adventures) passed dayly into Spaine, by reason of these conspiracies and ciuile dissensions; of which, Casin the new king had manie which followed his partie, as his deceased brother had. Being come to Lahen, he caused a diligent search to be made for those trecherous Eunuques which had slaine the king, but they could find no more but two, whom he put to death, and then it behooded him to defend himselfe: for Hali Hatan seeing that he could not raigne, procured him great enemies, that is, Abderramen Almorada, of the bloud royall of Aben Humeja, who gouerned in Murcia, sending messagers with all kinds of persuasions, and other meanes, to induce the pettie Arabian kings, which held Sarragosse, Valence, Tortosa, and other townes and forts in Spaine, to ioyne with him, to resist (said he) the Barbarian Moores which came to invade Spaine: wherefore Abderramen was created King and Miralumin by them, but he neuer held the chiefe towne of Cordoua. Having raysed an armie of all those of his faction, he besieged and tooke the towne of Lahen, cutting the Moores in peeces, which held it against him, and from thence went to other places, which he seized on, and in a short time became Lord of a great countrey; the which Hali Hatan and another captain of his traine, called Almundar, Aben-Alfak, did verie much enuie, and as they had helped to raise him to that height, so they sought all meanes possible to pull him downe, and not onely to deprive him of his estates, but also of his life, saying, That it was not reasonable any other than themselves should reape the fruits of their labours, and the conquests gotten with the price of their bloods. For the effecting whereof, they filled the kings Court and campe with quarrels and discontents, among the commanders and captaines, watching some fit opportunitie to execute their malicious designe. King Abderramen putting his good fortune, came to besiege Grenado, the which at that time was reasonably great, and well peopled, and commanded by a pettie king, a Moore, called Bedeet, Aben Abu. There these two conspirators, Hali Hatan and Almundar (making thew to imploy themselves faithfully in any thing that might annoy the besieged) had secret conference with some Moores of the towne, and layed a plot, That they should make a sallie vpon Abderramens armie, the which they would fauour in such sort, as most of his best men and hee himselfe should either bee taken or slaine; and having instructed them where they should charge, and of the situation of the kings lodging (which was vpon the side of a hill, called Senetta, two leagues from Grenado) they held themselves readie, attending the alarme, the which being giuen verie hot, and at a fit time to strike terrour, they joyined with the Grenadines, where they made a great slaughter of Abderramens men, he himselfe being in like manner slaine, and the rest of the armie dispersed and put to flight, abandoning their Engines of batterie, and all their baggage, the which was spoyled, and carried into Grenado, with great joy. This treason was practised by these two captaines through enuie, together with a distrust of king Abderramens good successe; wherefore after this goodly exploit, they resolved to send part of the bootie, with manie heads of the chiefe of the Moores, slaine in this surpris, to king Casin, in signe of triumph; the which was verie pleasing to this king, who was then at Cordoua, and making vse of this good fortune, he went to field, to reduce vnder his obedience manie townes and forts which had revolted to king Abderramen, when as hee was aduanced to that dignitie; the which he did to manie; but he wanted force and time to finish it: for having rayigned scarce three yeares, he died in the year 1007. The Moores of Barbarie, which had for a time followed the partie of the kings of Cordoua, were then in great authoritie in the citie, and therefore had the meanes and credit to chuse Hijaz, the sonne of Mahomet, for king: the which did much discontent the ancient Moores borne in the countrey, who sought some good opportunitie to be rid of these Berberuzes (as the Spaniards called them) by killing or chasing them out of the towne, to the end that the government thereof might retorne into their hands, as before. A fit occasion was offered: for the new king Hijaz, who before his election to be king was resident at Malaga, having a desire to haue that towne at his deuotion, for that it had not obeyed the precedent kings of Cordoua, since their troubles and seditions, Enuie and treacherie among the Arabians.

A tions, went forth of Cordoua, leading with him great troupes of fouldiours, especially of that race of Moores which came out of Barbarie. Comming to Malaga, he was received without any contradiction: but whilest hee was busie there, the inhabitants of Cordoua, who had intelligence with Buz of Grenado, drew certaine troupes, which hee had sent, into their towne, being led by two of his captaines, Hyran and Mogid, by whose helpe they cut the throats of about a thousand African Moores, who were left for the gard of the citie. At this bruite, king Hijaz lieutenant was so amazed, as he got out of the towne, with all the ministers of iustice, and fled to Malaga, to carrie these troublesome newes to the king his master; who within few dayes was slaine by a Moore, called Ismael, having rayigned onely three moneths and some dayes. Abderramen the fourth of that name was aduanced in his place: he was king but a moneth and seutene dayes, and we doe not read, whither he died, or were expelled his kingdom. After him followed Alahumet, great Miralumin of Cordoua, who rayigned not long, for that being rich in treasure, by his good husbandrie, before he came to be king, it was a cause to shorten his life; by the trecherie of his household seruants, who conspired to murder him for his treasure, wherefore they poysoned him, hauing held the kingdom a yeare and foure moneths: He died in the yeare one thousand and nine, and of the Arabians rayigne three hundred nyctie two. He left this place to Hizen the third of that name, who liued long at Seule, being desirous to raigne, the which he now obtained. In the meane time a Moore, who called himselfe king of Ceuta, passing the strait, came to Malaga, where he tooke the fort of the towne. He was called Efraziz, and brought with him a great number of the Moores of Africke: with whom Buz, who reamed himselfe king of Grenado, joyined at Malaga, and called himselfe his vassall, doing him homage. Being thus fortified with the Moores of Spaine, he came to Carmona, the which he tooke: then passing on by Alcaladel Rio, he burnt the suburbs of Triana, and seized vpon Seule. Many other tyrants did rise in diuers places, so as all Spaine, vnder the Moores jurisdiction, was full of seditions, and ciuill warres, and the estate of Cordoua was spoyled by him that could get it: but the kings of Toledo made their profit more than any other, who meddling not with other mens quarrells, kept themselves quiet, and suffered with their owne limits. After the death of Obeidalla (as we haue said) Hyran rayigned, of the lineage of Aben Humeia, who dying left the scepter to his sonne, called Hizen, who rayigned in the time of this other Hizen, king of Cordoua, and was the eight king of Toledo.

King Hizen of Cordoua was of as small continuance as his late predecessors; for the Moores his subjects expelled him, in hatred of the robberies and extortions committed by his Alhabib, or Constable, who from a base place was aduanced to that dignitie: so having held the kingdom twentie moneths and some dayes, he gaue place to Almondar folle, in the yeare one thousand and eleuen. Almondar, who was of the lineage of Aben Humeja, put himselfe forward (being desirous to raigne) in this sedition and popular tumult, and hauing gathered some of his friends and kinsfolkes together, he came vnto the citie, entreating them to receiue him, seeing they would not haue king Hizen: Whereupon being aduerted by some one well affected, that he offered himselfe in an vnseasonable time, the people being in armes, and incensed against a king, wherefore hee should doe wisely to retire, and to keepe himselfe from murthering in this tumult: but being mad with ambition, he persisted in his demand, adding thereunto, that he did not care, so as they created him king that day, if they slue him the next. Which words were so odious vnto all that heard them, as without any further delay, or giuing him that fading contentment to see himselfe king that day, they slew him vpon the place, presuming by the words which he had vttered, that he would be an vnprofitable and bad king: such was the reward of his furious desire to raigne. This being done, they did forbear to kill Hizen, and being resolved not to haue him for their king, they let him vnderstand, That if he would saue his life, he should quit the fort, and retire where he pleased: whereunto he obeyed, and retired himselfe, with some of his friends, into another strong house of his, joyning vnto the citie, of a contrarie humor to Almondar: but the Moores of Cordoua not thincking themselves secure, he being so neere them, and being resolved not to endure any more kings kings of the linage of Aben Humeya, they besieged him in this house, tooke him, and imprisoned him in Cordoua, from whence he escaped, and fled to Saragossa, where he lived in a priuate estate. Then a Moore of great power, called Isar of Algazur, seeing the cite without a king, embracing this occasion, with the helpe of his friends which did assist him, tooke vpon him the title and royall authoritie at Cordoua: but on the other side, one Hali Casin, or Aben Casin, residing at Seuille, a man of a great house, and mightie, seized vpon the towne of Seuille, where he did remaine with the Moores of his faction, and enjoyed the foueraigntie fifteen years; yet taking no other title vpon him, but as Iudge and Gouernour; but he prepared the way for his succellours to make it a royall feat. Isar reigned but two years, and Mahomet his sonne succeeded him, being the twentieth and last king of the Moores at Cordoua, and in whom the majestie of the Miralmunis of Spaine (which had beene great) was extinct: from the which grew so many pettie kings, as there was scarce any good towne in Spaine but had a particular king, which made strict alliances among themselves for the preservation of their estates, and maintained themselves vntill the comming of the Almorauides, Moores, which came out of Affricke, as we will shew. This king Mahomet, desiring rather to hold that little of the estate of Cordoua, which remained, than to seeke after that which was drawne away, enjoyed it in peace thirteene years; the which fell out, according to the common opinion, about the year 1027, and of the Arabians 415: So as the royall seat of the Miralmunis of Spaine (accounting from Abderramen the first, who did begin it) had continued in the cite of Cordoua 269 years. The Moores affaires in Spaine being in this confusion, the Christians neglected this fit opportunitie, to recover all Spaine, and to root out the sect of Mahomet: but they had their infirmities in like manner. D. Sancho king of Nauarre made some attempts, but as it seemes ill pursued, being not mentioned in the Histories.

D. Alphonsus king of Leon, made an enterprize against them that gouerned in Lusitanis, and besieged the towne of Viseo, but as he went inconsiderately about it, to view the place, being vnarmed, hee was shot with an arrow from the towne, whereof hee died soon after: this was in the year 1006, as the Spanish Histories report: But the letters and titles of Chapters and Couents say, he liued vnto the year 1028. A little before his death, he had receiued into his countrey the children of D. Bela of Nagera, a knight who as we haue said, had beene chased out of Castille, by the Earle D. Fernand Gonfalez: which were D. Roderigo, D. Diego, and D. Inigo Bela, who would neuer be reconciled vnto D. Sancho Earle of Castille, their Lord: wherefore hauing liued a wandering and vagabond life for a time among the Moores, and elsewhere, in the end they came into Leon, whereas the king D. Alphonsus receiued them, honoured them, and gaue them lands and reuenues, in the quarter of Somocés. This Prince was careful to administer justice to his subjects, and therefore did renew and restore the ancient lawes of the Gothes, and did correct and moderat them with new decrees fit for the time, and all by the aduise of the generall estates, assembled at Ouedo, in the year 1003. He repaired the ruines of the Citie of Leon, and there build a Church to Saint Iohn Baptist, whither he caused the body of D. Bermund his father, and many others, to be brought, and there interred. In his time liued Athilan, Bishop of Leon, and Florianus a great Preacher in Galicia, both held for Saints in Spaine. They write, that Florian meaning to trie if Sermons were pleasing to God, put burning coales into his mouth, and had no harme.

As for D. Sancho fourth king of Nauarre, he was sumamed the Great, chiefly for his great dominions, and for his great exploits, both in peace and warre; by reason whereof he incited himselfe king of Spaine, the which the Gothes with all their greatie and power durst not doe. He married D. Nagna, eldest daughter to D. Sancho Garcia, Earle of Castille; yet the Histories of Arragon call her otherwise, & say the king had a former wife, which was D. Caya, Ladie of Ayuar, the which was rather a concubine, than a lawfull wife, of whom D. Ramir, first king of Arragon was borne. By this Ladie D. Nagna, he did inherit the Earldome of Castille, and by her had D. Garcia king of Sobrarbre, and Ribagorça. He was either in person, or sent to all the warres betwixt the Christians, and the Moores, whose estate was much shaken in his time, by reason of the diuisions of that mutinous nation; and this king was more fortunate abroad, than in his owne house.

The Histories which treat of his deedes, say, That being absent in some warre against the Moores, his sonne D. Garcia demanded a goodly horse of his mother, out of the kings stable, the which he loued about all the rest, and had straitly commanded his wife not to suffer any one to ride him: yet three desiring to please her eldest sonne, graunted him; but being afterwards dissuaded by a knight, called, Pedro de Sese, or as some write Fernand of Ordognana, the king had master of the kings horse, thee would haue avoided it, considering the charge the king had giuen her: whereas D. Garcia being too much incensed for a matter of no moment, began to imagine that there was some dishonest familiaritie betwixt this Master of the Horse and his mother, whether that he believed it, or did maliciously inuent it, forgetting God, and all filthie respect, he resolved to accuse them of adulterie: and hauing conferred this designe with his brother D. Fernand (who was of a better disposition) he would haue forced him to serue as a witnesse, or assultant in this wickednesse, the which he refused, and did often dissuade D. Garcia from so vile an enterprize, but it was in vaine. In the end D. Fernand youth was vanquished by the importunitie, or rather feare of his elder brother, promising not to reueale the fraud and lye, which he had discovered vnto him. The king being returned to his castle of Nagera, this peruerse sonne D. Garcia failed not to accuse his mother: whereas the king was wonderfully amazed, for that he had neuer scene any cause to suspect his wife of any dishonestie, neither would he lightly believe that which his sonne had said, but examining this businesse carefully, he sought by all means to discouer the truth: yet he caused the Queene to be put in prison in the castle of Nagera, then taking D. Fernand his second sonne apart, he examined him vpon this fact, who answered the king doubtfully, the which increased his suspicion more than before: wherefore the king called an assemblie of noblemen, and of his Council, to whom he propounded this pittifull case, demanding their aduice. They answered that the Queene must purge her selfe by contrary proofes, according vnto the Lawes, or according to the custome which was then in vse, thee should finde a knight to defend her cause by armes, else she must suffer the punishment due to such an offence, which was to be burnt. The poore Ladie attending this sentence, made her continuall prayers vnto God, to make her innocencie knowne, who heard her prayers: for after some daies, no man daring to present himselfe to defend this princesse honor, D. Ramir the kings bastard son offered himselfe to enter combat for the Queene; against any that would maintaine the accusation which was layed against her. As they prepared themselves to the combat, there was a religious man of good fame, and much respected in Nauarre, who doubting of this fraude, or otherwise aduertised by the prouidence of God, came vnto D. Garcia and D. Fernand the kings sons, whom he perswaded with such liuelie reasons, as they were toucht in conscience, and began to apprehend the foulness of their offence, to haue sought her death who was the cause of their being against all truth, and for a matter of so small moment; wherefore casting themselves at this holy mans feet, they confest their fault, demanding pardon of God, and intreating him to finde some means that this pursute might cease, the Queenes innocencie knowne, and that she might be restored to the kings fauour. The religious man hauing comforted them, went vnto the king, to whom he declared what he had done, and what he vnderstood from his sonnes, intreating him to pardon their offence, whom youth and choler had thus transported. The king being ioyfull of the innocencie of his wife, deliuered her out of prison, and meaning that the fauour which they pretended to recover, should depend wholly of their mother, he sent them vnto her: but the shewing her selfe a true mother, did forget the cause she had to dislike her ill aduised sonnes, and pardoning them with a motherlie affection, shee restored them to the kings fauour: In this action, D. Ramir shewed himselfe both vertuous and valiant, wherein hee purchased the more honour, by this circumstance, That hee being sonne of an other woman, would defend the reputation of his mother in law against her owne children: in recompence whereof, the king D. Sancho, assigning portions for his children in his life time, gaue after his death the Earldome of Arragon to D. Ramir with the title of king. By this diuision of portions made by the king D. Sancho, and D. Nagna, D. Fernand was also graced with a royall title, in the succession of Castille, which fell vnto her by the violent death of her brother D. Garcia, as we will shew: Nauarre remaying to D. Garcia the elder brother, and the ancient realme of Sobrarbre to D. Gonfalo; meaning to to honour all his children with the names and titles of Kings, which was the cause of great divisions among these brethren, which happily had ceased, if one of them had become made souveraine King over the rest, the which had maintained the Christians estate in Spaine better united, and of more force to repulse the Moores. The time of this action of adulterie is vacante.

Religious deeds

The king D. Sancho was a very devout and religious Prince, after the manner of those times: for besides the confirmation of gifts which he and his wife gave to S. Emilian, of the towne of Ventose (annexed to this place by D. Garcia his father and others) he made a vow, to give unto the Coueat of S. Saluator of Leyre, the tenth of bread and wine, and the herbage of such places as he should take from the Moores: and with this hope, in the year 1015, he raised an armie to invade the Infidels by the frontier of Funes: at which place of Funes he gave to the same Monasterie a field of Vines which he had of the inhabitants, for that he had slaine tenne Moores in the time of peace, for the which they ought a thousand solz. for a fine, which were so many crownes, or thereabouts. More, in Falles he gave a possession, house, vine, and other apputenances: and in Nagera, the houses, vines, and fields of king Antrago, but what he was, we have no certain knowledge. These things he gave to the Church of S. Saluator of Leyre. It is not knowne what was the successe of D. Sancho's warre against the Moores, but that by conjecture it was good, for that in that time there is a confirmation made by him, of nobilitie, and exemptions granted by his predecessors to the inhabitants of Roncal. The zeale of this religious Prince was such, as he called a Councell at S. Saluator de Leyre, in the year 1022, but the chiefe decree was, a confirmation of priuiledges granted to this Monasterie by his grandfather D. Sancho, and D. Vraas his grandmother, and D. Garcia and D. Ximena his father and mother; which confirmation was signed by the king and all his children. The year after 1023, there was another Councell held in Pamplone, where the Bishopricke was transferred to S. Saluator of Leyre, where it continued some time. There enquire was made of the ancient limits of the jurisdiction of the Bishopricke of Pamplone. This was the subject of Councells in those dayes. Then was D. Sancho the elder (who had beene schoolmaster to the king) Bishop of Pamplone, and Abbot of S. Saluator, but he could not see this alteration, for that he died this year: but his successor carrying the same name, surnamed the younger, saw it in the year 1026, being the seventh Bishop of that Church, being vacante to what Archbishop it was then subject. In our time it is so that of Saragosse.

This year 1026 was borne that great captain, a Castilian, called Roderigo Dias of Bivar, who was afterwards called Cid Roy Dias, the Camper, of whom mention shall be made. In the year 1028 they hold (and it is verified by titles and ancient records) That D. Sancho Earle of Castille died, hauing ruled nine and thirtie yeares, and was buried in the Monastie of S. Saluator of Ogna, founded by him. He was an vfortunate Prince in his house, by reason of the miserable death of his mother; otherwise he was wise and valiant, and a great louer of his nobilitie, to whom he gave great priuiledges and exemptions, yea, he dispensed with them from going to the warre without pay and entertainment, and that they should not be taxed for any imposition which should be leuied vpon the publike. And as he was very deuout, after the manner of those times, he made manie reparations and orders, to make the wayes more easie for them that went in pilgrimage to S. Iagues of Compostella: for in the beginning, the ordinarie and most vsuall way was by the Prouinces of Guisulcoa and Biscaye to the mountaine country, then to the Asturias of Sentillana, then to Ouedo, from whence they entred into Galicia; and since the way being mountainous, although it were short, being left, by reason of the difficult and hard passages, they came from France by Nauarre into Alaua, and then through the Asturias; a longer, but a farre more easie voyage than the other: but the Earle D. Sancho caused a way to be made euen, from Nauarre by Rioje and Bureua, to the cite of Burgos, the which is frequented at this day, to the great ease of such as make this voyage to S. Iagues. They call this the French way. This Earle gave Quintanilla to the Monastie of S. Emilian, and did many other works for the redemption of his soule, as appears by the letters and titles of that age.

D. Bermond, third of that name, 23. King of Leon.

ON Bermond, sonne to D. Alphons succeeded his father in the Realme of Leon, in the year 1028, being but a young Prince at his first entry to the Crown, he began to follow the religious steps of his father, causing churches, monasteries, & other buildings which had bene ruined by the Arabians in the former wars, to be repaired. And moreover, was very careful to maintaine good orders among his subiects, and to do them justice, punishing the disordered with great severity. An argument that he had good and vertuous men in his Court, and of his Councell, who honored both themselves and their Prince, in the due execution of their charges, and discharging of their consciences: so as it followed, that all the subiects gouerned themselves by their kings example: yea the Noblemen and Knights of his Court. The beginning of which raigne could not but be held most happie. Hee married with D. Theresa, second daughter to D. Sancho, last earle of Castile, by whom he had one son, called D. Alphons C by his grandfathers name, who died before his father.

By the same treatie of marriage with the youngest daughter of Castile, after the decesse of D. Sancho Earle of Castile, by the aduice of the country, there was a marriage propounded, betwixt D. Garcia successor to the sayd earle, and D. Sancho sister to the K. D. Bermond. Both parties being agreed, D. Garcia went to Leon, to consummate this marriage, being accompanied by D. Sancho k. of Nauarre his brother-in-law, who had married D. Nugna the eldest daughter of Castile. The Court being full of Noblemen and Ladies to honor this marriage, which should be performed with state; and the Earle D. Garcia having no other thoughts but to court his mistress; there came vnto him the 3 brethren of Bela about mentioned, who were banished out of Castile, & fled into Leon.

D. Roderigo, D. Diego, and D. Inigo, who making a shew to desire the Earles fauor, came to kisse his hand, offering him all service & homage, as his naturall vassalls, craving pardon for that was past: to whom D. Garcia being courteous, gave good reception; and presuming they had nothing hidden in their hearts, but what their countenances shewed, and their tongues vttered, he assured himselfe of them, going without any guard, like a priuie man that had no quarrell: so as these traitours found oportunitie to murder him, in reuenge that the Earle his father had banished them out of Castile, and confiscated their goods: so the innocent suffered for the offender, if we may call it an offence to do iustice vpon rebels. He that gaue him the first blow with his sword, was D. Ruy or Roderigo his god-father. Such excesses did the Christians then commit. The murderers did then escape, but afterwards they fell into the hands of D. Sancho King of Nauarre, who tooke a worthy reuenge. There was great heauinesse in Court for this wretched murder: but D. Sancho lamented more than all the rest, to see her selfe a widow before she was a wife: who seeing her spouse interred at S. John Baptist in Leon, intreated them that they would burne her aliuie with him. By the death of D. Garcia, the Earle dome of Castile fell to the k. of Nauarre D. Sancho, who had married D. Nugna the eldest sister of D. Garcia, and tooke peaceable possession thereof in the same year 1028.

After the death of D. Raymond Borel Earle of Barcelon, which was in the year 1017, D. Berenger his son gouerned this principality, as proprietarie, vnder the Soueraignie of France, being the sixt in number, and was surnamed Borel, as his father, but of a contrary disposition to his father: for by his idleness, he gaue entry to all vices into his Court: war and all exercises of chivalrie were contemned by him, which bred him great troubles. We find that this Earle had three sonnes, the first called D. Raymond Berenger succeeded him: the second, D. Guillen or Guillaume Berenger, was Earle of Manresc, and the third sonne, Don Sancho Berenger Prior of the Monastie of

In the year 1020. D. Bernard Brisefer, cousin to the Earle Berenger, riding through Prouence, was drowned in the river of Rofne: And for that hee was a brave Knight, the Moores having notice of his death, grew so hardie and courageous, as they did ouer-runne the countrey of Cattelogne, entring by Cerdagne: but they were repulled and chased, by D. Geoffrey Earle of that place, brother to D. Berenger. This D. Geoffrey was founder of the Monasterie of Saint Martin of Canigo, and mention is made of five sonnes issued from him. D. Raymond Geoffrey, who was Earle of Cerdagne and Besalu, after the father: D. Geoffrey Guinar, Archbishop of Narbon: D. Berenger Geoffrey, Bishop of Giron: D. Guillen Geoffrey, Bishop of Vigel: and the last D. Geoffrey, Earle of Bergada: Having so goodly an issue, he dyed in the year 1025. and was interred at Saint Martin of Canigo, which hee had built. The Moores by another Inuasion into the territories of Cattelogne, ruined the Monasterie of Ripol: but by the care of D. Oliban, sonne to D. Oliban Cabrifa, they were repulled, and the Monasterie repayed and fortified by him, in the year 1035. in which year the Earle D. Berenger Borel dyed, having gouerned five and thirty yeares without any fyme, being scarce forty yeares old, and the perception of the succession by D. Sancho the Great, king of Nauarre, in the name of D. Nueua his wife, being the first woman which succeeded in Castile, there grew a ywarre betwixt him and D. Bermond king of Leon, who had married the Earles other sister, called D. Theresa: in the which the King of Leon lost the countrey which lyes from the river of Cea, vnto the auncient limits of Castile: but by the mediation of some Noblemen, and good Councillers, these two Princes were reconciled and concluded a peace, by the which there was a marriage contracted betwixt D. Fernand, who cond sonne to the king of Nauarre, and D. Sancho sister to the king D. Bermond, who had bene promised to D. Garcia, Earle of Castile. By this Treatie the lands which the King of Nauarre had taken from the King of Leon, should bee giuen to Fernand: and it was sayd, that the Earledome of Castile assigned to him, should haue the title of a Kingdome, when hee should beginne to enioy it. Thus they were good friends, and maintained peace betwixt these two Estates of Leon and Castile, till after the death of the King D. Sancho the Great: Who about the year 1033. restored the towne of Palence, vpon an opinion which he had to haue bene miraculously cured, (having put his arme out of ioynt, striking at a wild Boare) in the ruines of this towne, which was sometimes destroyed by the Moores, and at a place where as Saint Antolins church had bene. To this place he restored the auncient Episcopall seate, and gaue great gifts vnto it. The Bishops of Palence, call themselves Earles of Pernia since that time. Hee gaue much to other Monasteries, as it was the custome of those times: and that for the deuotion he had to the Reliques of Ouiedo, he went thither as a pilgrim, but he was slain by the way, as we haue sayd, and was buried at Ouiedo, & afterwards transported to O-gna, in the year 1034. After his decease, his children tooke possession of the Realmes assigned vnto them by their father and mother: D. Garcia of Nauarre, D. Fernand of Castile, D. Gonçalo of Sobrabre and Ribagorça, and D. Ramir of Arragon.

Thus a great Estate (by reason whereof D. Sancho had called himselfe Emperour of Spaine, and was surnamed the Great) was dismembred, to the great preiudice of Christendome. Being dead, his brother in lawe D. Bermond, would not obserue the conditions concluded by the Treatie of marriage betwixt his sister and D. Fernand the new King of Castile, seeking to take from him the Land which did confine vpon the Riuer of Cea, conquered and ouercome by D. Sancho the Great, the which he afterwards left vnto D. Fernand, and to his wife, his sister, in making of the marriage. D. D. Fer-

D. Fernand, 2. of that name, first king of Castile, and 24.
of Leon.

D. Fernand had reigned 2. yeares in Castile, when as the quarrell grew betwixt Castile him, and D. Bermond king of Leon, whereof followed the defeat of Llantada, and the death of the king D. Bermond: after which the two breethren, D. Garcia king of Nauarre, and D. Fernand of Castile, led their victorious armie before the city of Leon, where the remainders were that had escaped from the bataille. The Leonois would haue made some resistance against D. Fernand heire to the Crowne: but fearing they should not be able to hold out long, they receiued him: and being crowned in Saint Mary de la Regle, the Cathedral church of Leon, in the yeare 1037. he reigned in peace.
Thus these two Estates of Leon and Castile were vniited, about an hundred yeares after they had beene diuided, in the time of D. Fernand Gonçales: and they came into the mal-culine line of the house of Nauarre, in D. Fernand, the second sonne, by the heredita-rie right of women: that is, Castile by his mother D. Nuña, and Leon, in the right of his wife D. Sancho, for want of heires males of the direct line in these two houses.
Before he came to these great successions, during the life of the king D. Sancho his father, he had had by his wife D. Sancho, presumptiue heire of Leon, one daughter called D.
Yrsea, then a sonne D. Sancho, and after him another daughter named D. Eluira, being King of Castile, she bare him D. Alphonso, in the yeare, 1035: and for the last of all their children D. Garcia: All which were well instructed and bred vp like kings children according to their sexe.

The first royall act which D. Fernand did, was to dispose of Iustice, fortifying by his authoritie the ancient lawes of the Goths, with some necessarie additions or reforma-tions: he was much renowned, not onely for that respect, but also for his Religion, and valour in warre, whereof he shewed good prooffe against the Moores, who inuaded his dominions in the yeare 1038, by the frontiers of Galicia, and the countrey which is properly called Extremadura, the which lyes vpon the banks of Durio, whence it takes the name, not that which they thinke at this day lyes betwixt Tayo and Guadiana where the good wood growes. D. Fernand did not onely repulse them, but also pour-sued them vnto Merida and Badajos, then entering into the countrey, which is now called Portugall, hee tooke from them the townes of Cea, Gana, Viseo, Lamego, the cittie of Saint Martin, Taranca, and in the end after a long and difficult sege, the city of Coimbra, where his armie was in great distresse for victuals; whereof they were re-lieued (as the Spanish Histories say) by certaine religious men of that countrey, who had secretly gathered together (if it be credible) great store of victuals, wherewith they did furnish the campe. The Spanish Authors write, that the king D. Fernand had (at the taking of Viseo) gotten the Moore, which had slaine the king D. Alphonso his father in law, whose eyes he caused to be put out, and both his hands, and one of his feet to be cut off, wherein he rather shewed a base, then a generous disposition. In that war he layed the bounds of his countrey beyond the riuer of Mondego, which is in the mid-delt of Portugall: and leauing for Governour of Coimbra, (being the greatest towne in all the countrey) a Knight called D. Sisenand: hee returned into his countrey, and went to visit S. Iagres Sepulcher, offering part of the spoiles which hee had taken in the warre, as to the Patron and Protector of Spaine, according to the manner of the Religion in his time. After which he continued eight yeares without any warres against the Moores, who hauing dismembred their monarchie of Cordoua, which had so long maintained the name and glorie of the Arabians in Spaine, to the great ruine of the Christians, did now busie themselves to make petite Royalties: whereof the most famous in those times were Seuille and Toledo; that of Seuille extended his Iuri-dictions vnto the countrey called Algarbe, beyond Guadiana.

2 Other Moores neighbours to Cattelogue, hauing entred the Contie of Barce- A lone, in the time of D. Berenger Borel, were slayed by his son and succesor D. Raimond Berenger, whom they called the Elder, for that he had a sonne of the same name, who succeeded him. This Earle was of a small stature; but in this little bodie there lodged a great courage, vnlike therein vnto his father, hauing no delight but in action and arms, of the Townes of Ceruera, Segarra, Tagarra, Verdun, Tous, Lacuença of Odena, and of many other places; and subiected some of the Moores vnto him, and made them Tributaries. With this Warlike vertue, he was wise for the well gouerning of a quiet estate, louing Iustice, being religious, honourable, and liberal to his Nobility, the dignitie of which Estate he did much augment. Hee was twice married: his first B wife, called Radalmurs, brought him two sonnes, the one called D. Pedro Raymond, who was much hated of his father, for some reasons which we will hereafter shew: The se- G conds name was D. Berenger Raymond, who slue his brother; and for that hee was ex- Genealogie of celled Almedia, or Almadis, a ceeding proud, he lost his Estate. To his second wife he had D. Raymond Berenger, who was Earle after him, furnished (for that his haire was white and thicke) faxen haire.

D. Ramir, first King of Arragon.

Arragon.

3<sup>a</sup> The Arragonois their neighbours, began at that time to haue Kings, the coun- C tric hauing that title giuen it, in fauour of D. Ramir, a Bastard of Nauarre, in the yeare, 1304, the Country hauing continued with the title of an Earledome about 250. yeares, by which means it was diuided from Nauarre. This title of a King was confirmed to D. Ramir, by Pope Benedict the ninth, and the Armes of these first Kings of Arragon, weare a Crosse argent in a field azure. D. Ramir did soone after scaze (I know not by what right) of the Realme of Sobrabre, and Ribagorça, by the death of D. Gonçalo his brother, who had beene made King by the will of D. Sancho their father, he being slaine passing the bridge of Montclus, by a household seruant of his, called Raymonet, and left no children. This succession did more rightly belong to D. Garcia, the lawfull sonne of D. Sancho, and brother by father and mother to D. Gonçalo. What- S euer they say, that D. Ramir was a Prince indowed with great vertues, yet would hee haue dispossessed his brother D. Garcia, who was at Rome, of the kingdome of Nauarre, where their father died. For the effecting whereof, hee demanded succours from the Moores, which held Tudella, Saragoffe, and Huesca, and besieged the towne of Ta- fallá, but D. Garcia arriuing at that instant, had meanes to make D. Ramir to raise his siege with dishonour and losse. He had to wife D. Ermisende, daughter to the Earle of Bigorre, by whom he had D. Sancho Ramires, who was King of Arragon after him, D. Garcia, Bishop of Iacca, D. Sancho Countesse of Tholouia, D. Thersa Countesse of Prouence, wife to the Earle Guillen Bertrand, and one Bastard sonne, called D. Sancho, Lord of Ayuar and Xauierre. The time of this Kings Raigne, or the manner of his death, whether it were in warre, or by sickness, is doubtfull amongst Authors, the common opinion is, that he died about the yeare 1063, being at the sege of the Castell of Gra- dos, or Iraos, of a wound which he receiued, being in armes against the Moores of the Country: for that leauing the protection of Arragon, they had put themselves vnder that of Castille, and that he is interred at S. Iohn de la Pégna.

D. Garcia Sanches 6. of that name, and 14.
King of Nauarre.

4<sup>a</sup> AS for D. Garcia heire of the Realme of Nauarre, he came to the crowne as his A other brethren in the yeere 1034, the Queene D. Nuala his mother, yet liuing: he was surnamed Sanches of Nagera, for that he was bred vp there, & made his ordina- ry residence there vntil hee died; and was buried there. The portions giuen by D. San- cho the Great, their father, were very preiudiciall vnto him, for that as the elder, the so- B uerainty of all those Estates did belong vnto him, of all which D. Garcia had nothing but the crowne of Nauarre, the country which is from Bureua and Ogna, run- ning from the country of Frias, conteyning seuen iurisdiccions, in ancient time called Castilla the old, and moreover Alaua, Nagera and a part of Biscay. In the beginning D. Garcia was in reasonable good termes with his brother D. Fernand King of Castille, and did assist him as we haue sayd, in the warres he had against D. Bermond, to settle him in the Realme of Leon: but afterward there grew diuisions betwixt them, as also be- twixt him and D. Ramir, so as during his life they were neuer reconciled. Hee was married whilest hee was Infant of Nauarre, to a French Lady called Estienne, of the house of Foix, as the Spaniards say, yet is it doubtfull, for there is no mention in those times of any Earles of Foix, it may bee shee was of the house of Carcaffone, or Beziers, from whence the Earles of Foix did afterwards descend. By this wife hee had foure sonnes: D. Sancho Garcia, who was King after his father: D. Ramir Lord of Cal- laorra, Torrefilla, de los Cameros, Riuafranca, Lea, Villoria, Trebejan and others: D. Fernand the third Lord of Iubera, Lagienilla and other places, and D. Raymond the fourth Lord of Murillo, Agon and Agoncillo, and foure daughters, D. Ermisenda or Ermisenda, who was Lady of Villa Mediana and Mattes: D. Ximena Lady of Corcerous and Hornos. The third D. Mayor of Ianguas, & D. Yrraca, or according vnto some O- gunda, Lady of Aluerite, Lardero & Mucrones, such was the issue of D. Garcia Sanches of Nagera: During whose raigne the Spaniards set vp the inuention of the image of the Virgin Mary of the royal Monastery, in the towne of Nagera; in honour of whom, D. Garcia, and his wife D. Estephana, or Estienne caused the Conuent of the order of Saint Benet to be built: and moreover the King did institute the order of the knights of the Lilly, for that in the same picture there was a pot of white Lillies, and would haue the Knights carry vpon their cloakes, Lillies imbroided with the needle. This was the deuise of the Knights of the order of Nauarre, wherewith the Kings children, and many Knights of Nauarre and strangers were honoured, the which continued in this house of Nauarre.

Genealogie of Nauarre.

Knights of the Lilly in Na- uarre.

The King D. Garcia did greatly honour his nobility, and did confirme in the yeere 1043, the preiudges of the gentlemen in the Valley of Roncal, in testimony of their perpetual fidelity to the Kings of Nauarre their Princes, who had done him great ser- uices against the Moores his neighbors. He tooke Calazorra from them, in the yeere 1044, a more fortunate warre, out of doubt, then that which hee had against D. Fer- nand King of Castille his brother, a fatal man to all his kinsfolkes and allies. Enuy which torments man, by reason of an others prosperity, breed a hatred in D. Garcia, against his brother D. Fernand, the which was augmented by some dispute that was betwixt them for the towne of Nagera in Rioje, whereas D. Garcia kept his Court, and the Lands of Bureua, which D. Fernand maintayned did belong vnto the crowne of Castille. The first and most vnworthy effect, whereby this hatred was discovered, was a treason plotted against D. Fernand in the towne of Nagera; for being come in brotherly loue to visit D. Garcia, who was sicke in bed, hee was aduerted that by his com- mandement they ment to stay him, and in truth hee had beene put in prison if hee had not escaped: this did so incenle them one against another, as falling to armes, it was one of their deaths.

Garcia's be- traythe the Kings of Cas- tille and Na- uarre.

D. Garcia's traithe against his bro- ther.

This treacherous part was long dissembled by D. Fernand, attending some opportu- nity nity of reuenge, notwithstanding any excuse D. Garcia could make, seeing his designe A had failed. Thus the King of Nauarre liued in continuall hatred with his brethren. D. Ramir, and D. Fernand, as hee had purchased by his bad disposition, the dislike of his father and mother: a Prince in truth vnworthie to make warre against the Moores, for the aduancement of the Christian religion: against whom (notwithstanding that hee was in bad termes with his brethren) hee sent an army, and tooke from them the towne of Punes, in the yeere of our Lord 1045. For the recovery of his health, hee had sent messengers to all the famous Bishops and Abbots of Spaine, that by their prayers to God hee might bee cured: with this deuotion hee caused himselfe to bee carried to the Monastery of Saint Sauueur of Leyre, where hee did beleue that by the prayers of those religious men, his health was restored; in recompence where. B of, hee gaue to that house the Conuent of Centurifontes, and many other things: all this did nothing abate the spleene hee had against his brother D. Fernand, who would not bee surprized.

Castille.

Being returned into his country, dissembling the wrong which had beene done him, he made warre against the Moores, vpon the frontiers of Castille, where he tooke the townes of Gortuas, Vado del Rey, Aquilera, Berlanga, and other places, passing vnto Tarrassone and then hee returned by Medina Celi, ruining the forts, and watch-towers which the Moores had built in those countreies: hee did with lesse difficulty for that the Moores estate was in great confusion, by reason of the seditions and tiranies which were practised amongst them. They write that this Prince did also that yeere C (which was 1047) chase the Moores out of the mountaines, of Ora and Ouan. Some time after, continuing the warre against the Mahumetists, hee past the mountaines with his army into the realme of Toledo, he spoiled the country about Talamanca and Vzeda, whereas the ruler of Henares passeth to Alcala, and Guadajara: he entred the territory of Madrid, and made such a general spoile of townes and people, as the King of Toledo, a Moore called Aly Maymon, was aduised to pacifie him by presents, yea to promise him tribute: the which hee did, sending home D. Fernand rich with gold and silver, and of all other spoiles, into his countreies of Leon and Castille.

Moore.

This King Aly Maymon was the ninth of those which had rained at Toledo the royall race of Aben Humeya, sonne to King Hizen, and grand-child to Hayran. Hee had one sonne amongst others, carrying his grand-fathers name Hizen, and one daughter called Casilda, who was a Christian, as you shall heare. At that time there dwelt many Musarabes in Toledo, who God left not vnurnished of Pastors, among the which Ar- chiques the Arch-deacon is famous, who encouraged the Christians of that city, and instructed them in the grounds of their faith: arts and liberal sciences were in like manner maintained and honored among the Arabians, and in those daies their liued many learned men of that nation, whereof the most renowned were Haly Albunsem, and Aly Aben Ragel, very learned in Astrology. The occasion which drew the Princess Casilda to the Christian religion, is thus related by the authors of the Spanish History. She fel (say they) very sick of a bloody flux, for whose recovery her father had in vaine im- ployed the skill of all the Arabian Physicians, and others that were expert in that facul- ty: but in the end shee had a reuelation, that if shee did wash her selfe in the waters of Saint Vincent's Lake, which is in the territory of Bureua, nere vnto Biriuesca, she should be cured: the which she presently declared to the King her father, who was very well pleased: and hauing written to the King D. Fernand, hee sent this Virgin well attended vnto him, and presently for many Christian slaues, at liberty, vpon this occasion D. Fer- nand entertained her with great honor, & caused her to bee furnished with all things ne- cessary. Being bathed in those waters she recovered her health, wherevpon the Spani- ards say, she would returne no more to Toledo, but caused her selfe to be baptized and built an Oratory with a little chamber vpon the Lake, where shee made her aboad, and there spent the remainder of her daies, in prayers and other religious exercises, and was there buried after her decease.

Cast de a Prin- cess of the Moores hap- ping.

But the same author said, that being at Toledo, before she came into Castille she was full of charity and compassion to Christian captiues, to whom she gaue great almes, which

A which was a signe that there were in her some good seeds of better instruction, the which by the recovery of her health was confirmed. There was also an other Prince of the Moores called Aly Maymon (not he which was King of Toledo) against whom D. Garcia King of Nauarre had a sharpe encounter, at Ricorbaleca, where the Moore was vanquished and slaine.

Nauarre.

These Christian Kings, ambitious and treacherous one against another, not sparing their owne blood, thought to expiate all their offences, in building of Churches, and indowing them with great reuenues, in enuy one of another, with this opinion, D. Garcia gaue many gifts, and granted many preuiledges to the Church of Saint Mary the Royal of Nagera, which hee had caused to be built, for his funeral: declaring that these gifts were for the health of his soule, of his fathers, of the Queene his wiues, and of his children, with the approbation of the chiefe noblemen of his Realme: which dona- tions and preuiledges, hee thought should continue vnto the end of the world, vpon a penaltie, to him that should breake them, of a thousand tallents, to bee ap- plied to the Monastier. In these termes they are exprest in the letters which are found in the sayd Monastier, dated in the yeere of our Lord 1052. and scene by Garibay.

Donations to Churches.

By the like perswasion, D. Fernand King of Castille built the Church of Saint Isidore in the city of Leon. And to make that place of more authority, hee resolved to get his body, which hee thought was yet in the city of Seuille, where he had beene Bishop, C for this cause hee proclaimed warre, against Almuncamus, called by others Benabey, Aben Amet, who at that time was King there, waiting and spoyling his country, on this side the riuer of Guadiana, towards Portugal, where hee tooke the towne of Montemaior, and pursuing his enemy, hee fort him to the like conditions, as hee had done Aly Maymon, King of Toledo, and besides hee made him to deliuer Saint Isidore's bodie, or some thing in stead thereof, the which was received by D. Auio Bishop of Leon, and D. Ordengo Bishop of Astorga, which relike hee caused to bee carried to Leon.

Castille.

This King D. Fernand at the sute of his subiects of the Kingdome of Leon, caused the towne of Zamora to bee new built, which had remayned a heape of stones, since the raigne of D. Ramir the third. D. Garcia King of Nauarre did in like manner build the towne of D Peralta, and other workes. And to returne to the hatred which continued betwixt these two brethren, it burst forth in the yeere 1054. so as the King D. Fernand being false side at Burgos, he requited D. Garcia in the like manner: for D. Garcia being come vnto him, to visit him, and to take from him all suspicion that hee had attempted against him, hee was seized on and caried prisoner vnto Cea.

D. Garcia wrought in such sort with good words and money, as his gard suffered him to escape, and so being full of wrath and indignation, he returned into Nauarre, where hee leuied a mighty army of his subiects, of Gascons and of Moores, allies or mercen- aries, the which he led by the mountaines of Oca, vnto Atapuerca within foure leagues of Burgos: whereof the King D. Fernand being aduertised, he had rayfed great troupes E in Castille, Leon and Asturia to resist him. Yet before they came to ioyne in battaille, hee did solicit the King D. Garcia, by many messengers to retire, intreating him to forget all things past, and that from thenceforth hee would remaine his good brother and friend: but D. Garcia was so incensed, as he would not giue eare to any good counsell, wherefore both armies aduancing, there was a furious battaille, in the which there was much Christian blood spilt: but D. Garcia was so vnfortunate as he was incourted in the charge, by two Knights of Nauarre, who being discontented with him, had retired to D. Fernand's army; these two ranne vpon him and slue him; wherevpon the Nauar- rois army was soone put to route, and defeated. The King D. Fernand did greeue at D. Garcia's death, and deliuered his bodie to his people to bury it, leaving to pursue a- ny King the Moores, who were come to this warre. Such was the end of D. Garcia F King of Nauarre, in the yeere 1054. hauing reigned twenty yeeres. His bodie was interred at Saint Mary the royal in Nagera. Hee intituled himselfe King of Pampelo- ne, Nagera, Alaua, Oca, Bureua, of Castille the Old, and of Biscay, where in truth he held ypoll part of the country.

In witnesse whereof there are letters found, conteyning, that in the yeere 1052. D. A. Nugno Sanchez Earle of Durango, and D. Legunia his wife, indowed a church of Saint Augustine, the which is now called Saint Augustine of Echauri, nere vnto the place whereas long after the towne of Helorio was built, which letters were confirmed by the King D. Garcia, as raining in that country.

Castille.

Conspiration of the King of Castille upon
Nauarre.

After this victory the King D. Fernand seized vpon all Castille the Old, of the territory of Bureta, of Mont Oca, and of part of Rioje, vnto the waters of the floud Oja, which fall from the mountaine of Eucimi, where now stands Saint Dominique dela Calçada, and fals into Ebro at the towne Haro. In confirmation of the Monkes good husbandry, mention is made, of a controuersie betwixt the deceased King D. Garcia King of Nauarre and Saint Dominique, called of Silos, who was a religious man, borne at Cagnas, in Rioje, and of a sheapherd became a Monke; hee was bred vp in the Monastery of Saint Emilian of Cogolla, where hee tooke the habit of the order of Saint Benedict, and liued there so religiously as he was made Abbot: but for that he was a stout protector of the rights of the Abbay, and of their exemptions, he fell in disgrace with the King, who expelled him out of all his dominions: the which hee afterwards repented.

D. Rodrigo
Diaz de Bivar

This good father went into Castille, where D. Fernand receiued him courteously, and gaue him commission for the restoring of the Monastery of Saint Sebastian of Silos, in the valley of Toblatello, the which had bene destroyed by the Moores. In those times there beganne to bee great fame of the valour of D. Rodrigo Diaz, called by the Arabians, Cid Ruis Diaz, against whom he made long and sharpe warres, being a new knight desirous of honour, and ready for all virtuous exercises. After that D. Fernand had subiected vnder his obedience, the territories of Rioje and Mont Oca, which had bene held by the Kings of Nauarre, the Moores made many roades ther, being their neighbours, and did daylie carry away great spoiles, whereof they were often stript by Cid Ruis Diaz; and amongst others mention is made of a route which he gaue them vpon Mont Oca, where he tooke five of their commanders or petty Kings, the which hee afterwards deliuered vpon ransome, and promise of a yeerely tribute. This Cid Ruis had a quarrel with D. Gomes Lord of Gormes, the which had bene conquered by D. Fernand from the Moores, few yeeres before, so as entering into Combate, D. Gomes was slaine; hee left one daughter called D. Ximena Gomes, who made great and continual complaints for the death of her father: but soone after shee her selfe intreated the King to make a marriage betwixt her and Cid, the which hee did, and so this Lady was comforted. Hee purchased this name of Cid, which in the Arabian tongue signifies Lord, in the towne of Zamore, when as the messengers of these five petty Kings, aboue mentioned, bringing the tribute contracted with them, presented it in the presence of the King D. Fernand, they called him Cid Ruis Diaz: wherefore the King would haue this braue Knight carry this title still, who by his right name was called Rodrigo Diaz de Bivar.

Race of Cid
Ruis Diaz.

The towne of Calaoarra being taken by the Moores, and recovered againe by the King D. Fernand, there grew some controuersie betwixt him and D. Ramir King of Arragon, for that place; for the deciding whereof either should bring a knight to the combat, vpon condition that the victor should purchase the right to his party. For D. Fernand Cid Ruis Diaz was armed, and for the King of Arragon came a knight called Martin Gomez, the author (as they say) of the houle and family of Luna in Arragon: Who being vanquished and slaine vpon the place, Calaoarra remained in the iurisdiction of Castille. The race of this knight D. Rodrigo Diaz, descended of Elain, whom others call Layn Caluo, Iudge of Castille, sonne in law to Nugno Nugnes Refore, who had by his daughter D. Eluira Nugnes Bella, or Theresa Bella, as some say, four sonnes, Fernand, Bermond, Layn and Diego, surnamed Laynes. Of Fernand the eldest was borne, Layn Fernander, of him Nugno Laynes, who begat Diego Laynes, father to Cid Ruis Diaz: whose mother was called D. Theresa Nugnes, daughter to D. Rodrigo Aluarez Earle and Gouvernor of the Asturies, by others called D. Nugno Aluarez Almayas. Of Cid Ruis, and of D. Ximena Gomes aboue named was borne D. Diego Rodrig.

A Rodriguez, who died in his fathers life time, in the warres against the Moores. And moreover they had two daughters D. Eluira, and D. Sol, whereof mention shalbe made in the relation of the affaires of Castille and Nauarre.

D. Sancho Garcia the fifth of that name, and the fifteenth King of Nauarre.

B D. Sancho Garcia, succeeded D. Garcia Sanchez his father in the realme of Nauarre, who could not stoppe the course of D. Fernands conquests, having after the battaile of Atapuerca, taken from him a good part of the country which his father enioyed: wherefore he made a league with his vnkle D. Ramir King of Arragon, against D. Fernand King of Castille. By this alliance the Spanish authors say, that these Kings gaue diuers townes and forts in pawne one to another, and that the King of Nauarre did quit to him of Arragon, and to his for cuer, the townes of Sanguella, Lerda and Ondues. This King had to wife a Ladie called D. Plaisance, by whom hee had children, but there is no certaine mention made of them. Hee was of little valour, and therefore D. Fernand of Castille his vnkle, had meanes to restraine him in his Realme of Nauarre, at his pleasure, were it either right or wrong.

C In the meane time the King D. Fernand, to purge and expiat these outrages, gaue bountifullly to the Cathedral churches, colleges, parishes and monasteries of his realme, and to others without it; for they say hee gaue euery yeere to the Abbay of Clugny, a thousand peeces of gold, out his treasury and infinite almes deeds to the poore in particular. The tribute which hee demanded of the King of Toledo, was denied him a little before his death: but hee went in person against him, forced him to acknowledge him for his Lord, and to doe him homage, and in like manner the other Moores, who after his example had rebelled: and they hold that hee also led his army along the riuer of Ebro, by the confines of Cattelogne to Valence, where D. haing taken great spoiles from the Moores, which rained in those Marches, hee returned victorious into his country. His residence was for the most part at Leon, for certaine reasons.

And although that homebred examples did warne him to keepe his Estates vnited in one bodie, to haue the more power and authority, to withstand the attempts of all enemies, yet hee was resolu'd to assigne his children their portions in his life time: To D. Sancho hee appointed the realme of Castille, vnto the riuer of Pisuerga, towards Leon; and towards Nauarre limited by the riuer of Ebro, as hee had augmented it on that side, with the preiudice of his Nephew D. Sancho Garcia: To D. Alphonso his second sonne, he assigned the Kingdom of Leon in the Asturies, and Tramiera, vnto the riuer Deua, which passeth by Ouides: and moreover hee gaue him part of Campos, and the towne of Astorga, and other lands in Galicia with the towne of Zabero: To D. Garcia the youngest the realme of Galicia, withall that hee had conquered in Portugall. Hee did also indowe his two daughters, assigning to D. Urraca the eldest the city of Zamora, and to D. Eluira the youngest, the city of Toro: but this diuision was not allowed, nor kept by his sonne D. Sancho, after his death, the which many say, was in the yeere of our Lord 1059.

A remarkable yeere by the credit which was giuen to the Cardinals of Rome, by the diligence of Pope Nicholas the second, a Sauoyard borne, who hauing called a councill at Saint Iean de Latran in Rome, provided that from thence forth the Pope should not be chosen but by the suffrages of the Cardinals, grounding this decree vpon the corruptions, troubles and seditions, which grew ordinarily vpon the election of Popes; holding it lesse dangerous to haue these indirect courses practised by few, then by the whole Clergy, or the people of Rome. This Decree is infered in the three and twenty distinction, and begins. In nomine domini &c.

The writers of the Spanish History are not very certaine of the time of D. Fernando, A death; for those which seeme most exact, prolong his life vnto the yeere of our Lord 1067. The place where he died is also very doubtfull: but all agree that he was interred at Saint Isidore of Leon, dying so full of contrition and repentance for his finnes, as they hold his body for a holy relike, in the Kings chappell in that church. By this computation he should haue reigned two and thirty yeeres in Castille, and thirty or thereabouts in Leon. Wee finde no other thing touching the affaires of this King with foraine Princes, but only a contention betwixt his Ambassadors, and those of the Emperor Henry, at the councill of Florence, vnder Victor the second, the Emperor pretending that the Kings of Spaine should acknowledge his Maiesty and doe him homage as to their soueraine: but this question was decided by the councill, where it was sayd, B that seeing the Kings of Spaine had defended and conquered their Realmes by armes, without any aide from the Emperors, they were free and exempt from al acknowledgment or subiection to the Empire: whereof wee may read the glosse, vpon the Chap. Adrianus Papa, Distinc. 63. the like prouidence haue the Kings of France, the State of Venice, the Kings of England, and some others.

Spaine doe not

D. Raymond Berenger the elder, Earle of Barcelona, a wise and valiant Knight, of whom we haue made mention, defended his country by his armes and wisdom; and enlarged his limits to the preiudice of the Moores, by the fauour of the other Christian Potentates of Spaine, which made warre against them, and the diuisions which were among these Arabian Mahumetists. At that time was Seneschall in Cattelogne (which was a dignity equall to that of the Constable or Marshals in France) one called Raymond Myron. In his time D. Guillen the fat was Earle of Besalu, sonne to Bernard Briffier, who dying in the yeere 1052. D. Bernard Guillen his second sonne succeeded him: at the same time was Earle of Cerdagne, D. Guillen Raymond son to Cont Raymond Gressy, who held it long, and had two sonnes, D. Guillen Stradain, who was Earle after him, and D. Bernard Guillen, who was also Earle of Cerdagne: and to make cleere the alliances of this house of Cattelogne, we finde that D. Almodis, wife to Count Raymond Berenger, was issued from the house of the Earles of Carcassone, being strongly allied, especially with the Lords of Bearne and Narbone, and the Earles of Tolouse, Bigorre and other great houses of France. From the same house of Carcassone, was issued Emengarde, married to the Vicont of Bessiers, both which in the yeere of our Lord 1068. yielded vnto Raymond Berenger Earle of Barcelona, all the interest and right which they might pretend vnto the Earldomes of Carcassone, Tolouse, Cominges, Rodes and Minerue: by meanes whereof, this house of Barcelona, had great Siegneuries, and pretensions in France, and from that time did enioy the towne of Carcassone: about which time the towne of Perpignan was built.

D. Sancho Fernandes the second of that name, and the second King of Castille.

E

Castille.
An. 1067.

6. IN the yeere of our redemption 1067. the realmes of Castille, Leon and Galicia, were diuided betwixt the children of D. Fernando deceased, and Castille fell to D. Sancho Fernandes, surnamed the valiant. Leon to Alphonso Fernandes the second, whom they called the Braue: and Galicia to D. Garcia, with that which hee had conquered in Portugal. Adding vnto these D. Sancho Garcia, who held the Kingdome of Nauarre, and D. Sancho Ramirez, reigning in Arragon, wee finde that at one instant there were reigning in Spaine, siue grand-children to D. Sancho the Great, King of Nauarre. The Kings of Nauarre and Arragon last named, made a league against D. Sancho King of Castille, but their quarrels and exploits are obscure and vncertaine, at the least they did him no great harme. Whilest that D. Sancho, the mother of D. Fernando: F three children liued, they continued in reasonable good termes, for thee remained at Leon her owne inheritance, so as Sancho durst not attempt any thing against D. Alphonso.

D. Alphonso, to whom it was assigned, thee being dead, which was the second yeere of D. Sancho Fernandes King of Castille; they fought all occasions to spoile one another. D. Garcia King of Galicia began first, taking from his sister D. Vrrata, Lady of Zamora a part of her territorie, the which hee vsurped. D. Sancho King of Castille, who demanded no better subiect, embraced his sisters quiettel, and set her cause resolved to make warre in Galicia; but the Noblemen and Knights of his counceill, were not of opinion; that hee should goe to armes, for a matter which might bee reconciled by some milder course. Amongst those which did contradict the Kings ambitious desire, were D. Garcia de Cabra, and Cid Ruiz Diaz, saying, that if contrary to their aduice, hee were resolved to inuade Galicia, hee should first provide to bee in good termes with D. Alphonso King of Leon, that hee might haue free passage for his army through his country, and to conduct his vituals and munition from Castille into Galicia. To this end the two Kings had two enterueues at Sahagun, where in the beginning D. Alphonso seemed vnractable: yet in the end hee yielded to giue his brother D. Sancho passage, and whatsoever hee demanded: wherefore in the yeere 1071. warre was begunne against the King D. Garcia who had recourse vnto his brother. D. Alphonso of Leon, to bee aided by him; but hee excused himselfe, saying that hee would remaine indifferent, and not deale, for the one nor the other: so as D. Sancho entring Galicia with great forces, after many encounters hee became master thereof, dispossessing his brother of all his country, and tooke him prisoner. So the raigne of this King ended the fourth yeere after his coming to it: yet some authors say, that this was done, after D. Sancho had dispossessed his brother D. Alphonso of the Kingdome of Leon, and forced him to become a Monke, and to take vpon him the habit of Saint Benet: the which they report after this manner: D. Sancho being discontented with the diuision of portions which D. Fernando had made betwixt him and his brethren, thinking that they had done him wrong to take from him the souerainety of these Kingdomes, being the eldest. As soone as D. Sancho, their mother was dead, hee set vpon his brother D. Alphonso King of Leon, and at his first entry wonne a battaile at a place called Plantaca: but the Leonois rallied againe together, they gaue an other battaile to D. Sancho, and defeated him vpon the riuer of Carrion neere to Gulpejora, whereas the King D. Alphonso commanded that they should not pursue the Castillans.

Then was Cid Ruiz Diaz, in D. Sancho's army, as his vassall, who excusing this losse with good reasons, and comforting his King, hee reuiued his courage: so as hauing gathered his troups together, he came and charged the Leonois the morning following, being heauy with sleepe, hauing made good cheere for their victory gotten the day before, and not doubting any enemy, putting them all in disorder, and to a shamefull flight, hauing slaine and taken many; then hee pursued this advantage in such manner, as hee besieged the King D. Alphonso in Saint Maries Church of Carrion, where he thought to saue himselfe, and carried him away prisoner to Burgos.

A while after at the sute and instance of D. Vrrata, sister to these Kings, and of E. D. Pedro Ansures, hee was set at liberty vpon condition: that hee should goe into the Monasterie of Sahagun, and take vpon him the habit of Saint Benet: but hee staid not long there, being forced to enter into it: for by the aduice of the same D. Pedro Ansures, hee left Sahagun, and went to Toledo, to King Almon a Moore, who receiued him verie courteously, and intreated him honourably, whilest hee remained with him, hauing taking an oath of fidelitie of him.

Hospitality of King Almon
a Moore,

Hee lodged him in a faire great house, neere vnto his Palace, which they imagine was in that place where as now the Monasterie of religious women of the conception doth stand, to the end that hee might there enioy the company of the Christian Musarabes, which dwelt in that city.

There came three Knights, sent from his sister Vrrata, to keepe him company. D. Pedro, D. Goncal and D. Fernando Ansures, brethren, of the country of Leon, who brought with them many other Christians, the which were entertained by the King Almon: During this exile D. Alphonso gaue himselfe to hunting and country country sports : and taking great delight in a certain place of the territory of Toledo, A where there were the ruins of old buildings, the King D. Almenor to gratifie him, gaue him leave to build them vp againe, and to plant it with Christians, the which is at this day called Bribuega, yet D. Alphonso grew to be suspected of the Moores, who feared that hee sought meanes to seize vpon the citie of Toledo, whereupon Almenor was persecuted to kill him, notwithstanding hee would not violate the lawes of Hospitality, although hee was a Mahumeticke, but was content onely to take a new oath of him.

While that the King D. Alphonso pass his time thus in exile, D. Sancho his brother, made himselfe master of the citie, and of all the Kingdome of Leon, where hee caus'd himselfe to be crowned King. Hee beeing thus dispossest, they say hee went against D. Garcia King of Galicia, to intreat him after the same manner. The diuision which was then in Galicia, betwixt the King and a great part of his Nobility, made the enterprise more easie; for D. Garcia beeing growne a tyrant, spoyleing and intreating his subiects unworthily, hee gouerned himselfe after the appetit of a slave more then was fit. This woman (who some say, was a slave enfranchised) put the Nobilitie and gentrie, in fauour or disgrace with the King (most commonly by false reportes) as shee pleased, which was the cause of many inconueniences: So as in the end growing insupportable, certaine knights slue her in the Kings presence.

Upon this occasion the Nobilitie was diuided, and the Realme full of troubles and factions, some following the Kings party who would reuenge this murder, and others snorting the murderers. The affaires being in this Estate, the King D. Sancho conuered Galicia with a mighty army, against whom D. Garcia finding himselfe too weak, hee abandoned his country, and had recourse vnto the Moores, demanding aide of them for the recovery thereof, promising to make them flatters of that which hee should get from D. Sancho his brother: but the Moores answered him wisely, that hee who had not the heart to defend his owne, should not bee able to invade another: yet the Moore being liberrall and courteous, gaue him rich presents, and sent him backe, refusing to ingage himselfe in that action. D. Garcia hauing gathered some men together, but not sufficient to effect any matter of importance, doubtfull what course to take, hee fell to spoile his owne country, and making his retreat into Portugal, where hee had recovered some places, hee did mightily annoy D. Sancho his garrisons, but it continued not long: for D. Sancho hauing raised an army, came against D. Garcia, fought with him, defeated him, and tooke him prisoner, neere vnto Saint Iren, and sent him to the castle of Lune, with a good guard, from whence hee departed not vntill his death, the which happened in the time of D. Alphonso his Nephew about the year of our Lord 1081. who commanded hee should bee buried with irons on his feete, at Leon, in the Church of Saint Isidore: by this means the King D. Sancho remained Lord and Maister of all Galicia, and other lands of that partage. By this it appeares there is difference in the time, and in the means of their dispoſſeſſing. All this did not satisfie D. Sancho his ambition, for hee would in like manner stripp his sisters, D. Urraca and D. Eluira, of the lands and places which they held, by their fathers will, and laide siege to the towne of Zamora.

A variety of humane enterprises, and that there is a greater power which controules them. This death happened in the yeere of our Lord 1073. having reigned in Castille about six yeeres and nine monethes: by reason whereof the army disbanded, every one returning to his home, except the Castilians, who would needs continue the siege before Zamora for a time. The Kings body was carried to the Monastery of Saint Salvador of Oña. The inscription which is in that Monastery shewes that hee died six yeeres later, but there is an error, for that Garibay affirms, that hee had beene ancient writings, witnessing that D. Alphonso's brother reigned then in Castille.

If the Castilian brethren were at discord, they of Nauarre had as little charity amongst them: for betwixt D. Sancho Garcia; and D. Raymond, there was enuy and feare hated, the which burst out in time: for D. Raymond holding some strong places, and some in his brothers gouernment, and hauing by his bounty drawne many vnto him, who were discontented with the present Estate of the realme, he rebelled, meaning to defende these places he held: but the King D. Sancho, and the Nobility of Nauarre did easily expell him. But there fell out a new trouble for the Nauarrois, to demand reason of the Kings of Castille, who detained: from him the territory of Bureau, Castille the old, and other places.

D. Raymond being thus expelled, had no recourse to any Christian Princes his neighbours, who (as hee doubted) would detest his attempts, but hee fled vnto the Moores, the enemies of our faith, and making warre with them against his brother there was a battaile giuen neere to Rueda, or Penalen, in the which D. Sancho was slaine:
 this was about the yeere of our Lord 1076, hauing raigned two and twenty yeeres: he had by his wife D. Plaisance, amongst other children, D. Ramir Sanchez, and two D. Garcia;
D. Ramir being very young, vpon the newes of his fathers death, put himselfe vnder the protection of D. Sancho Ramirez, King of Arragon, whom also the Noblemen and Knights of Nauarre called to raigne ouer them, by reason of the minority of their King to oppose him against the enterprises of the bad. D. Raymond, who purified his designe to make himselfe King of Nauarre, and had already seized vpon Pamplona, and viurped the title of King there, but hee was vertuously repulst, so as being deceaued of his ambitious hopes, not knowing what to resolue, hee retired to the King of Sarrogoe, a Moore, where hee past his banished life, and by the bounty of this Pagan, enioyed certaine Lands and places, which defended afterwards to a Neece of his called Marquesa, wife to Aznar Lopez, a Knight, who made a donation of Saint Maria Maier, to the Collegiall Church of Sarrogoe, in the time of D. Alphonso King of Nauarre, called the Warrior: the two Garcia brethren, sonnes to the deceased King of Nauarre, fled into Castille, to the King D. Alphonso, the mightiest Prince at that time
 in Spaine,

7. D. Sancho Ramirez had reigned some yeeres in Arragon, when as hee was called to the crowne of Nauarre. Hee had married a Lady, daughter to the Earle of Vrgel, called D. Felicia, by whom he had three Offnes. D. Pedro who succeeded in his Kingdome, D. Alphonso who reigned after his brother, and D. Ramir, a religious man in the Monastery of Saint Ponce of Tomeres, neere to Belfers, and afterwards King by the decease of his brother D. Alphonso, who left no children. He had also one bastard, called D. Garcia who was bishop of Iacca. In this Prince the two realms of Nauarre and Arragon were vniited, 42. yeeres after the separation thereof: he was warlike and politique, and withall very zelous in the Romaine religion: for hee changed the ceremonies of the Gothes, which the Christians vsed, and brought in those of the Romish church, it may be by the council held at Iacca, vnder this King, when as the Bishopricke of Arragon was first established there: to enrich which seat, besides the tithes, there were certain portions appointed out of the conquests which they should get from the Moores of Sarraçosse and Tudela: and in stead of the ciuill Lawes of the Gothes, hee brought in the common law of the Empire into his iurisdiction. There is a volume extant of particular lawes, given by this King to them of Iacca, which is inserted amongst the customes of Nauarre at this daie: but the chiefe acts of religion done by him, and other Princes in his time, were to indow churches; for the Monasteries, Colleges and Bishopricks of Spaine, haue thousands of preuiledges, donations and exemptions granted vnto them.

Cattellogne.

There is mention made of a counceill assembled in the towne of Barcelone at the p[er]suise of D. Raymond Berenger, the elder, and at the request of D. Almodia his wife, whereas Cardinal Hugues, Legat of Pope Alexander the second, or Gregory the seventh did precede, for the certain time is not set down, but it is only said, that it was celebrated about the yeere 1071. there it was decreed that Clergy men should liue chastly, for that (as the History saies) many of them were married, according to the introduction of King Vitiza the Goth: and after the example of the Arragonois, the seruice of the Musarabes was left, and the Romaine of Saint Gregory receiued in Cattellogne. In the same counceill they treated of secular affaires, as of the gouernment of the country of Cattellogne, of the Earles house, of the Estate of the Nobles, of their names and titles, distinguished by this Earle, into Viconts, Barons and Vauassours: and such like. During the assembly of this counceill D. Pedro Raymond, eldest sonne vnto the Earle D. Raymond Berenger, poisoned D. Almodia his mother in law, feating that shee should labour to deprive him of his fathers succession to aduance her owne children: whereupon hee was iustly disinherited: thus the wicked reaped what hee feared. In the same country died D. Armingol Earle of Vigel, in the yeere of our Lord 1075: to whom his sonne succeeded, carrying the same name: and the yeere following 1076, died the Earle D. Raymond Berenger, the elder, hauing gouerned in the county of Barcelone longer then any of his Predecessors, that is one and fortie yeeres. Hee diuided his Earldome betwixt his two sonnes, D. Raymond Berenger, and D. Berenger Raymond, to the great hindrance of the commonweale, giuing moreouer vnto D. Raymond Berenger the Earldome of Carcaffone. By this Earle D. Raymond the customary lawes were ordained, taken out of the volume of the old Gothique lawes, amended and reformed.

Arabians.

Seditious, rebellious, and factions among the Arabian Princes.

8. The diuisions of the Moores in Spaine, aboue mentioned, doe admonish vs to speake some thing of the turbulent Estate of the Arabians in the East, and in like manner of them of Maroc, which was the cause of a great alteration in Spaine. Returning then to the Caliphe Marwan, who was in armes against Salin, the sonne of Asmulin, who had seized vpon the Regions of Persia and Syria: wee say that by the defeat of Marwan, and his death, Egypt was also conquered by Salin: so as all that which the Arabians held in the East, did obey Asmulin and Casaban his companion and counsellor.

They being dead, Abubalan surnamed Muamat, was Caliphe of Persia and Syria, and Salin the sonne of Asmulin kept Egypt to himselfe, and gaue the beginning to a soueraigne seat in that country, the which hee established at Caire, causing himselfe to be called Caliphe. Against Abubalan, did rise many enemies in Syria and Arabia, of the faction of Marwan, whom they did beleue was yet liuing, so as there died great numbers of that nation, in diuers encounters.

After the death of Abubalan, his brother Abdala succeeded in the Easterne Empire of Sarrazins or Arabians, but an other of the same name aspiring to that dignity, lue him, and held the throne about the yeere 756. at which time there were great troups of Turkes beganne to disperse themselves ouer all Armenia, the which did ouerrunne and spoile the Sarrazins country, who incountred them in diuers sharpe and bloody batailles. After this Abdala, who reigned about some twentie yeeres, his sonne Madi Amadi was Caliphe, who held the Royall seate nine yeeres, and Mosef his sonne succeeded him, who liued but two yeeres, and left the place and dignitie to

A to Aaron Caliphe, who they write was very iust and charitable to Christians, and had fought the friendship of Charles the Great, King of France, of Alphonso the Chast reigning in Spaine, and of other Christian Princes of his time, to whom hee sent Ambassadors and presents, and they to him.

Hauing reigned three and twenty yeeres, he left, after his death, the dignity of Caliphe in question betwixt his two children, Muamat and Abdala, who after great effusion of blood, agreed to raigne with equall title and authority. Muamat transported the seat of his Empire to Bagadat, a towne built by him, neere vnto old Babylon, and would reside no more at Damas. At that time the Empire of the Arabians and Sarrazins was diuided into foure great Potentats, whereof that of the East and of Bagadat retained the title of Caliphe, which signifies King or ruler. That of Egypt called himselfe Sultan, which is as much to say, as Emperour. At Cairon, a great and mighty towne, built within the country of Affricke, in the time of Osmen, some five and twenty leagues distant from Tunis, reigned an other Caliphe, and at Maroc (which Estate was come to them of the family of Aben Alabeci) reigned a Miralmumin, from which great Potentats did afterwards grow, the Kingdomes of Fez, Alger, Tunes and others. After Mahumad tained Imprael, who left the Empire of the East to his sonne Mamum, who held it with great reputation: but after him the Sarrazins power began to decline in the East, by their continuall seditions and ciuill dissensions, whereby the Turkes had meanes to settle a Monarchie, the which beganne about the yeere of Christ one thousand, being called by Mahumet Prince or Gouernor of Persia, who made warre against the Caliphe of Bagadat, in which they serued him: but falling afterwards to quarrel with him, they defeated him, and seized vpon Persia, where they did choose for their first King, their General Tangrolipix, and fence partly by force, and partly by an accord, they delt so with the Sarrazins, as their power declining, the name and Empire of the Turkes hath continued to firme and mightie, vnto our daies. The Miralmumins of Maroc, being farre from these tempests of the East, maintained their dignity in their race and nation, but not without the like furies and inraged appetites of rule; so as hauing beene held many yeeres by them of the lineage of Aben Alabeci, they were set vpon and subdued by an other race of Princes Moores, called D. Almorauides, whereof Iosiph Aben-Tefin was the chiefe, who made himselfe Monarke in Affricke, ouer all the Kings and Potentats which did raigne there, about the yeere 1068. and extended his power into Spaine, as we will shew.

Foure great Potentats of Mahumet, set in Asia and Affricke.

D. Alphonso the sixth of that nation, the third King of Castille, and five and twentieth of Leon.

9. D. Sancho Fernandez, King of Castille, being slaine as we haue sayd, by the treason of Peldides Dolphos, or Ataulphe: D. Ferrac did presently aduersite her brother D. Alphonso, who remained at Toledo vnder the protection of King Almenon. This Moore hauing many spies amongst the Christians, had already intelligence of the murder, and obseruing the actions of D. Alphonso, hee was resolved to stay him, if hee should offer to depart without his priuity and leaue. D. Alphonso was wonderfully perterbed by D. Pedro d. Ansuarez (who walking about the towne had by chance met the messenger which brought him the newes of the death of the King his brother) so depart as secretly as hee could, fearing some treachery in the Moorish King, but D. Alphonso did otherwise, wherein he wrought wisely for himselfe, for he doubted that the King Almenon hauing aduice of what had past, did watch him at the passage: wherefore comming freely vnto him, hee read D. Ferrac's letters in his presence, demanding his aduice, leaue and aide, to goe and take possession of the Realme of Castille. King Almenon was much pleased, in that hee did not distrust him, imbraced him a verie left his wife and children at Saint Peter of Cardegna: but he was followed by about 300. horse, and a great number of foot, who loved him in particular: and with this troupe began to make violent warres against the Moores. He entred their countrie by Atiença, and wonne Castrejon by an ambush, which hee layd for the Moores, whilst that Aluaro Ianes Minaya his cousin, did ouer-runne the countrie vnto Alcalá de Henares, from whence he returned to Castrejon with great spoiles. And for that Castrejon was vpon the frontiers of king D. Alphonso, and for some other respects, Cid abandoned it, and went vnto Hariza, Cetua, and Alcocer, and striking great terror in all the countrey of Calarajub, Teruill and Tietar, hee surprised Alcocer in Arragon.

At that time the towne of Valencia did belong to the king of Toledo, and was governed for king Almenon by a More, called Abubacar, to whom the Inhabitants of Calarajub, and the countrey thereabouts, made their daily complaints of the wrongs and losses they received by Cid, demanding ayde from him: whereupon Abubacar sent them two Captaines, called Faris and Galuc with good troupes; but that could not defend them: for Cid ioyning with them, defeated them, and put them to a shamefull flight, carrying great spoyles to Alcocer, which was his retreat; from whence he sent to king D. Alphonso, by his cousin D. Aluaro Ianes Minaya, thirty horses, with as many swordes tyed to the saddles. This did somewhat pacifie the King, who did willingly see Aluaro Ianes, but for all this he did not call Cid from banishment: yet he suffered all men freely to go to the warres with Cid against the Moores, except Toledo. Cid desirous to make warre, and wanting meanes, hee tooke money vpon the castile of Alcocer, and crossing to Xalon and Monreal, he stayed there some dayes.

11 About this time D. Raymond Ber nger the elder, Earle of Barcelona, being deceased, his sonne D. Raymond called Flaxen-head, succeeded him, in the year 1076. When as neere to Cattelogne, D. Armengol, Earle of Vrgel, wonne from the Moores, Sanahuya, Guizona, Balager, and other places of that countrie.

The same yeare dyed Almuniz king of Seuille, leaving his Realme to his sonne of the same name, who reigned also at Cordoua, and in a manner ouer all Andalusia: so the discord betwixt these Arabians made Cordoua (which had bene lately Princesse ouer other cities) to be subiect and flauie to Seuille. Cid hauing taken some good order for his affaires, and assembled good troupes of souldiers, hee began to torment the Moores of the streight of Sarragoffe, & pressed them in such sort, as Almundafar king of Sarragoffe, made a treatie with him greatly to his honor, and receiued him into his citie, by whose meanes he drew many Christian Knights, which did willingly receive pay of these Moores, when they were in armes one against another, that they might helpe to defeat them. Thither D. Aluaro Ianes came vnto him with a good number of souldiers, being desirous to march vnder the command of so valiant a Captaine as Cid was; who vnderstanding of the good reception which the king had made vnto D. Aluaro, and how he had receiued his presents, was wonderfull glad. This yeare died Almenon king of Toledo; for whose quarrell Cid had bene banished out of Castile: A Prince who had governed the kingdome long, and with whom the king D. Alphonso entertrayned true and firme friendship whilst he liued, and with his sonne, and successor Hazen, who reigned onely one yeare, and died in the year, 1078. after whom a brother of his called Haya Cadurville, obtained the Crowne of Toledo: A Prince of a bad disposition and cruell, numbered the 11. king of that citie, and the last of the Arabians or Moores.

12 During these things, the king D. Alphonso discontented, that the Nauarrois had called D. Sancho Ramires, king of Arragon to raigne ouer them, rather then him, who had a better title, being cousin germaine to the king D. Sancho Garcia deceased, by the lawfull line, whereas the king of Arragon descended from a bastard: seized vpon the towne of Nagera, and of all that iurisdiction, which was in the Prouince of Rioje, of which he made Gouvernor D. Garcia de Cabra, called Crespo de Granon, and intitled himselfe king of Nagera. The people of Guipulcoa, Biscay, and Alaua, who were neighbors vnto it, hearing of this exploit, and considering the greatnesse of D. Alphonso, they thought good to leane vnto him, and to leaue the kings of Nauarre, who were of lesse power

A power: thus his iurisdiction increased, so as hee commanded from the towne of Saint Iagues, vnto Calaoarra. In this felicity he began to restore and re-people many towne of his countrie, destroyed in former warres, as Salamanca, Auila, Legouia, Medina del campo, Olmedo, Coca and Cuellar.

D. Sancho Ramires king of Arragon, hauing no good title to the Realme of Nauarre, for that D. Ramir Sanchez, sonne to the deceased king was yet liuing: and by the same reason the king D. Alphonso hauing no good reason to pretend it, they agreed together, to the preiudice of the pupill: by which accord Pampelone, with all the appurtenances (except Nagera and the other countrie whereof D. Alphonso was seized) remained to the king of Arragon, but vpon condition, that he should acknowledge himselfe vassall in that respect to the king of Castile. This king had made warre against the Moores, whilst he was king of Arragon onely, and before he had obtained the kingdome of Nauarre, he had chased them out of the mountaines of Arragon, Sobrabro and Ribagorça, and moreover had made warre against Abderramen King of Huelca, and taken the towne of Barbalro, at which seage Armengo Earle of Vrgel his father in law dyed. Hauing made his profit of the Realme of Nauarre, and in good termes with D. Alphonso, he continued his enterprises and conquests against that sect, and tooke from them the castell of Mugnonas about Secastilla in Ribagorça: then hee seized of Cobin and Pitilla, and had a great and cruell bataille neere vnto Sarragoffa, and tooke from them Bolea, a place of great strength: to supply the charges of which warre, this king was sometimes forced to vie the revenues of the Clergie, his treasure being not able to furnish so great a charge: but the bishops of his countrie, who affected nothing more then to enrich their order and estate, opposed themselves against him, and assisted him in such sort, as putting him in a vaine feare, that he was damned for this cause, they made him do penance, and to confesse publicly in the church of Roda, before S. Vincent's altar, in the presence, and at the poursuite of D. Raymond Dalmaze, Bishop of that place, and D. Garcia the kings owne brother, Bishop of Iacca, that he had grievously offended. Thus these good fathers insulted ouer their Soueraigne: This fell out about the year, 1083: at which time D. Ramir sonne to D. Sanso Garcia, moued with great deuotion, gaue a new, and confirmed that which he had giuen to the monastierie of Saint Mary of Nagera, which were the places of Torrefilla, Cameros, Treuxcan, Ribafreica, Lea, Villoria, and S. Pelagius of Cerezo, S. Peter of Torrefilla, Saint Mary of Veraça, and other places and churches, making the Monkes and Abbot of that place where he is interred, his heires generall. The King D. Sancho Ramires did in the year 1083, winne the castell of Graos, the which he presented to the Monastierie of Saint Vithorian, to free himselfe of a certaine vow made by D. Ramir his father, and also for a satisfaction to the Clergie: but some write that soone after hee received a great overthrow about Roda, where they say, that the king D. Alphonso carrying a secret spleene, for that the King of Arragon did enioy the Realme of Nauarre, gaue secret ayde and fauour to the Moores, and was the cause of this defeat of Christians.

E Almundafar King of Sarragoffa being dead, he had left two sonnes, Zuleima who was king of Sarragoffa, and Aben Alfay in Denia, who being at disention, set to armes: either of them drawing Christian Noblemen and Knights to his partie. Cid Bais Diaz was for Zuleima. D. Pedro of Arragon eldest sonne to the king D. Sancho Ramires, and Count Raymond of Barcelona fauoured Aben Alfay. Being in armes, and ouer-running the countrie, Cid comming from Huelca and Montaban, incountried the troupes of the Earle of Barcelona, with the king of Denia, whom he defeated, taking Count Raymond prisoner, who was soone after freely set at libertie by Cid, yet the Earle of Barcelona ioyned againe with the king of Denia, who came to bessege the castell of Almenar, whilst that Cid was at the seage of Elscarpe: but he comming vpon them which were before Almenar, he put them againe to route, and returned victor to Sarragoffa: after which he spoiled the countries of Mançon, Onda, and Burriana, notwithstanding that the Arragonois fought to hinder him, being their allies. On the other side, a More of Andalusia, called Almufar, tooke from Ador, another Moore, the castell of Graos, for the recouerie whereof, the king D. Alphonso went to armes, and besseged tion) would grant those articles above-mentioned to the Moores, especially to leaue A the great Mosque for the exercise of their superstition. By the conquest of this great citie, there came into the King of Castiles power, without any resistance, the townes of Magueda, Ecalona, Illecas, Canales, Olmos, Talauera, Coria Confluegra, Mora, Buytrago, Hira, Medina Celi, Atienza, Berlanga, Guadalajara; and by this means were also assured the townes of Salamanca, Aulia, Segobia, Olma, Sepulueda, Coca, Cuellar, Roa and Olmedo, the citie of Toledo seruing as a rampar and fort, to all that lies betwixt it, Atienza, and Medina Celi, and by consequence to Palencia, Coria, and city Roderigues: so as all that was within that circuit began to be repaired and re-edified, the inhabitants being freed from their great feare of the Moores.

The first worke which the king D. Alphonso did after the taking of Toledo, was to re- B payre the castell, forts, and bridges, giuing the gouernement thereof to Cid Ruis Diaz, with a garrison of a thousand Gentlemen Castilians. The house and family of them of Toledo, which is famous in Spaine, is deriued from a Grecian knight, called Peter Paldogne, who came to serue D. Alphonso, at the seerge of this city: but there are appa- rent arguments, that the name of the family of Toledo is more ancient: for there is a tombe to be seene in the royall Monasterie of Ogna, of a knight called D. Gutierez Roderigues of Toledo, who had bene Chamberlaine to D. Sancho Earle of Castile, who died in the yeare 990, of this D. Peter, they say, issued a sorne called D. Illian Petes, of him D. Peter Illian; of D. Peter, D. Estuan Illian, whose image is to be seene on hors- backe in the church of that citie. Don Estuan begat Don Jean Esteuanez, from whom issued Don Gonzalo Jaime of Toledo, who lyes buried in Saint Romaines church, C built in the highest part of the citie, by D. Estuan Illian, D. Vrraca, the King D. Alphonso sister being deceased this yeare 1083, Zamora whereof she was Ladie, was re-united to the crowne of Castile.

As king D. Alphonso desired nothing more, then to order things belonging to reli- gion, and the seruice of God: in a great assembly of Noblemen and Prelates, made to that end, restored the Primacie and Archiepiscopall seate of Spaine, to the church of Toledo, as it had bene in the time of the Gothes: and there was chosen for Archbishop a reuerent religious man, of the Order of S. Bennet called Friar Bernard, a French-man borne, who had bene sent some yeares before into Spaine, by Hugo Abbot of Clugny, at the request of D. Alphonso, for the reformation of the Mona- sterie of Sahagun, which at that time was the chiefe of all the Monasteries of Spaine: this Friar Bernard was found so sufficient for his learning and integritie of life, as he was held worthy to be preferred before all the Bishops and Abbots of the countrie, to the primacie of Spaine; which sea beginning by this King D. Alphonso, was so intiched by all the kings and chiefe Noble-men of Spaine, as besides the primacie and head Chan- cerie of Castile which it hath gotten, we may now say, that next vnto the Pope, hee is the richest Prelate in Christendome. Since that time the church of Toledo hath bene in great credit and authoritie among all those of Europe, and is serued with an incre- dible number of Clerkes: for besides the Archbishop, 14 dignities, 40. Chanoins with Prebends, and 70. Portionists, and other extraordinary Chanoins, there are so many Priests, Chaplaines, Clerkes, Chantres, and other Officers that haue fee, as they ex- ceed 600, being very rich moreover of indowels and plate. The first Arch-bishop of To- ledo is called Eugenius the Martyr, from whom to Friar Bartholomew Carranca of Mi- randa, who was in our times; they number 76. The Archbishops of Tarragone and Bra- ga, contend with him of Toledo for the primacie, neither will the Archbishops of S. Ja- gues & Sarragossa, acknowledge him for primacie, which quarrell heaue vnto themselves.

To returne to our Historie, after that king Hiaja Alcaduribile had lost Toledo, he went F into the territorie of Valencia, the which was held by Abubacar, terming himselfe king of that place, being but Gouernor some yeares before, vnder the kings of Toledo. This Abubacar was discreet and wise, and had gouerned that towne vprightly many yeares: who to assure his viurped estate, had giuen his daughter in marriage to Amet Alen-Hut king of Sarragossa, successe to Zulerna. About the taking of Toledo or soone after, he died, leauing two of his sons for successors, who fell to so great discord, and by reason of them

A then, the people, as Abu-ge Aben-Lope Capraine of the fort, fore-seeing the ruine of thieftwo young Princes, & fearing that these diuisions would make them fall into the hands of the kings of Castile, was readie to abandon the place, and to retire to Morue- tiro, and other lands in that quarter; which were his: but being better aduised by a Se- cretarie a Moore, called Mahomad Aben-Hay, hee stayed still to see what would bee the end of these factions of Valencia: some were of opinion rather then to yeeld vnto their aduersaries, to giue themselves vnto the king of Sarragossa; others to him that had bene king of Toledo; to whose father Almenon they had bene subiect: Thist troubles made work for Hiaja Alcaduribile, who lost neither time nor opportunitie, but came be- fore Valencia with such Mores as he could keep together, with whom soone after those

B Ioynd which king D. Alphonso sent him, according to the treatie, vnder the conduct of Aluaro lones Minaya. Being thus camped, and rather solliciting the towne by good words and promises, then attempting it by armes, in the end they were received, and King Hiaja acknowledged for their lawfull Prince, to whom Abu-ge Aben-Lope, the capraine of the Fort, yeelded vp the keyes, and purchasing by that present the Kings fa- uour, and assured his estate and life: for king Hiaja hated him, for that he had bene al- waies of the faction of Abubacar his rebell: notwithstanding knowing him to be wise, and a man of good seruice, hauing also performed so good an office, as to yeeld him vp the fort, he received him into grace, and honored him, leauing him in the same charge.

C At the same time Hamer Aben-Hut, king of Sarragossa died, to whom succeeded Ioseph Aben-Hut. King Hiaja liued in such continuall distrust, as he would neuer giue leaue to Aluaro lones Minaya and his souldiers to returne home into Castile: for the intear- ning wherof, this king was forced to ouer-charge his subiects with insupportable taxa- tions. There was a Captaine of the Moores in the towne of Xatua, called Aben-Magor, who would not present himselfe before King Hiaja, being notwithstanding in all other things obedient vnto him, but the king not satisfied therewith, would haue him: where- fore he led an army of Moores and Castilians before Xatua, and battered it in valine: for besides that the beleaged defended themselves valiantly, they called vnto their suc- cours the king of Denia their neighbor, who seized vpon the place, and kept it in de- spite of king Hiaja, who was forced to retire, hauing lost, by ouer-pressing it, that which D he might haue enioyed with a litle patience.

Whilst that D. Alphonso disposed of the affairs of his new conquest, & that the Mores more diuided then euer, not able to discern the miseries which pursued them, continued their spoiles, and to stir vp new troubles among themselves, D. Sancho Ramirez king of Nauarre and Arragon, being loth to liue idle, and to let slip such good occasions to enlarge his dominions, and to aduance the Christians power in Spaine. Hee won a bat- tell of the Moores, nere vnto a place called Pierra Pisada, took from them the towne of Argueda, and defeated them in another battell nere to Tudela: and fought with them the third time about Morella; which Incounters fell out happily for the Christians, in the yeare 1084. And the yere after, seeing that he had made great conquests in the cham- pion countrie, he gaue to his eldest son the realm of Sobrabre and Ribagorça, with the title of King, and a while after the Queene D. Felicia died, who was intetred at S. Iean dela Pagna.

The estate of Barcelona, after the death of Cont Raymond Berenger the elder, was in great combustion by the emulation of his two sons D. Berenger Raymond, and D. Raymond Berenger, called Flaxen head, wherof the eldest held a part of the countrie of Cata- logne: but D. Raymond Berenger the younger commanded the greatest part. So as the Moores were not molested in their estates by them; but D. Raymond Berenger followed the partie of the Morish king of Denia, against him of Sarragossa, who enuid the o- thers estate, as we haue sayd. Yet some hold opinion, that it was D. Raymond Berenger the elder, their father, who carried armes against the King of Sarragossa: and that on the other side, D. Raymond Flaxen head, was his friend and ally. Only Armines Earle of Vr- gel, did vertuously make war against the Mores, vpon the frontiers of Catalogne. D. Raymond Flaxen head had married a most vertuous Lady, called D. Almodia daughter to Robert Guichard duke of Pouillia, by whom hee had D. Raymond Arnould which suc- ceeded him.

The Spanish Authors shew a great argument of this Ladies holiness and religion, A for that in her husbands life time, she built the Monastier of Valde Mary, of the Order of Saint Benet, in the Vicountie of Cabrera, and another of Saint Daniel, of the same Order neare unto Gironne, where she professed her selfe, and lived a Nunne. After the decesse of the king, her husband: in whose life time, some people of the County of Cerdagne, reuiued the Arrian heresie, for the prevention whereof D. Guillem brother, Earle of that place, was much troubled. The ambition of raigne was such betwixt the two Earles of Barcelone, as the eldest (due the youngest by treason, watching him as he went from Ostarrit to Gironne: this D. Raymond flaxen-head, hauing raigned onely six years; a religious, mild, courteous, and bountifull Prince, and of a goodly presence, and therefore lamented of all men. This fratricide seeking to dissemble his treason, did B weep much before the world, but he could not so well disguise his offence, but the truth was knowne.

Wherefore the Carrelans reiected him, and in the yeare 1082. Chose Don Raymond Armoûd, the son of the deceased, for their Earle, chasing away D. Berenger Raymond, who thinking by treachery to take away another mans, lost his own patrimonie: and being poore and dishonoured, and moreover, by a iust iudgement of God, hauing lost his speech, he died in Ierusalem, whither he went in pilgrimage. During the infancy of this young Count Raymond Armoûd, some tyrants of Prouence & Langue- doc did invade the territories of Carcaffone, giuing the Earle of Barcelone to vnderstand, that they would hold it in fee of him, and do him homage, and restore it vnto him, when hee should come of age. This Earle Raymond Armoûd was a great personage, C as wee shall heare hereafter.

Castile.

An. 1086.

Returning to Toledo, after that the king D. Alfonso had giuen order for all things that were necessarie for the good of that citie, he returned to Leon, leauing Cid Ruiz Diaz for Gouvernor: and for the ecclesiasticall and ciuill gouernement, Queene Constance his wife, falsely called by some Beatrice, with the Archbishop D. Bernard and others during the kings absence, this Prelate being very zealous in his religion: and discontented that the Moores remaining in Toledo, did enioy the Mosquee maior, a rare and stately building, among all them of Spaine, layed a plot with the Queene to deprive them of it, and without any respect to the promise and oath made by the king, he seized the theron, and forbad the Moores the vse and entrie into this temple, the which D he did consecrate the Cathedrall church the fifth of October, 1086. All this was done suddenly, and without the kings priuie: the Queene and Archbishop knowing well, that it would much displease him, but their hope was, that what had bene done would not be easily vndone, by reason of the respect the king carried to Prelates, and to the Christian religion; for the honouring whereof they had undertaken it, the which succeeded according to their conceits: for the king being returned, and seeing that of force they would make him persiured, being somewhat discontented with the Queene and D. Bernard, in the end he was pacified with such perswasions, that it was an vnworthie thing, that in an Archiepiscopeall citie, and the first in dignitie in Spaine, that infidels should enioy the greatest and most stately Temple, there to exercise their impieties and blasphemies, to the great dishonour of the king, and the name of Christians: and the griefe of pastors and holy Ministers of the Church. Wherefore it was expedient he should aduow the fact; the which was not done rashly, but with great zeale, and by diuine inspiration. He runto, they say, were added the supplications of the Moores, that it would please the king to suffer things as they were, and not to discontent the people: and that for their parts they would willingly exercise their religion in a place of lesse shew. For the Moores spake an Alfaguai of their lawe, whose image is to bee seene cut in stone, in the great chappell of that church.

Gotique ser-
uice changed
in Spaine.

The seruice called Gotique or Isidorus, for that Isidorus had brought it in, and afterwards called Musarabic, for the Christians liuing among the Moores had main- tained it, was in vse, vntill that time as well at Toledo, as in Castile and Leon: but the King Don Alfonso desiring to shew himselfe in all things an affectionate sonne to the Romish see, would haue it changed, and in stead thereof the Gregorian seruice received,

A received, so called of the author Gregory; for which effect hee caused a Bull to be sent from the Pope then raigning, commanding that the seruice of Rome should be from thenceforth celebrated in all the Churches of Spaine, as they did in France, by reason whereof, it is called by some Spaniards, Galliscan. This done, the Archbishop new cho- sen, went to Rome, where he entred, when as Urban the 2. entred his Popedome, and there tooke his oath, receiued the Archbishops cloake, and was confirmed Primate of Spaine; and not onely of Spaine, but of Gotique France, as the limits of the Primacie of Toledo had bene in the time of the king of the Gothes: in witness whereof the Spaniards write, that (to shew his rights and prerogatiues) at his returne from Rome, he called a Councell at Tholoufa, where the Archbishop of Narbonne did assist, with B other bishops of those countries, suffragans, and subject to the Iurisdiction of the Pre- lates of Toledo.

During his absence, Richard Abbot of Saint Victor of Marcellis, was Legate in Spaine (being sent some yeares before by Gregory the 7. Predecessour to Urban the 2.) who tooke great paines to bring in the new Gregorian or Romish seruice, and to abol- ish the Musarabic: for which consideration, and to put in execution that which had bene decreed, the Arch-bishop Bernard, at his returne called a nationall Councell at Toledo, whereas the Clergie, Knights, and people of Toledo, Castile, Leon, Asturia, Galia, and Portugall were assembled, or their Deputies in great numbers. D. Bernard presiding the King being present, there grew great controuersies among them, C the Spaniards refusing to leaue their ancient manner, to receive a new seruice, so as not able to be satisfied by any allegations and reasons, they came to a furious and brut- ish manner of trial, by combat, which was much vied in those times: there were two knights brought to field, the one for the king, and others who desired alteration of the seruice, the other for the knights and commons, which would keepe the Musarabic: for these came San Ruiz, of the family of Matanza, who vanquished him which fought for the Romane seruice, whose name is vnkowne. Yet the importunitee of the King, queen, Arch-bishop, and others of that partie was such, as the businesse was referred to another kind of trial, which was by fire: wherefore hauing brought two bookes, the one con- taining the seruice after the Romane vse; the other, the ancient and Musarabic, they D were both cast into a great fire, whereof the Romane booke leapt presently out (as they say) and the other lay still, and was nothing burnt.

Wherefore they did coniecture, that either of them was pleasing vnto God: and for this cause it was ordained, That they should retaine the ancient manner of seruice in fixe parishes of Toledo, and that in the great Cathedrall church and others the new Gregorian seruice was brought in; and likewise in all the rest of Don Alphonso's Kingdome, the which was granted more by force, to please the king, and to obey the Pope, (who confirmed and allowed it), then for any good will. Yet the Musarabic Office continued long after, in many Monasteries of Spaine: and in the same great church of Toledo, euen at this day they sing Masse all after the Musarabic, euery E day in a Chappell called Corpus Domini.

The fixe Parishes of that Citie, where as this seruice was maintained, had bene held by the Christians Musarabes, whilst that the Moores did raigne there, which are Saint Iust, Saint Luke, Saint Antolin, Saint Marke, Saint Enalata, and Saint Sebastian. That the Musarabic seruice aunciently vsed were that which they hold at this day, and that it was not reformed and corrected, I will not doubt: for in matters of Religion, it is most certaine, that all things haue bene fitted to the time, and to the dispositions of those which liued from age to age, especially in that which concerned the ecclesiasticall discipline. The day of the reception of this Romish seruice, is quoted by the Spaniards the one and twentieth of May, in the yeare 1091, at the third hower.

F Matters concerning Religion being ordered at Toledo, Don Alfonso gaue many honourable titles, dignities, and priuileiges to the Citie, to their great aduantage. For first of all by reason of this conquest intitled himselfe Emperour of Spaine, hee would haue Toledo called and denominated the Imperiall and Monarchicke city, a name which hath remained and continued vnto this day. occasion to come and dwell there, (for the greatest part of the inhabitants were Moors) he granted rights and priuiledges to the citizens, as follow, being drawne out of the letters which are in their Registers.

granted to the city of Toledo.*

1 First, he obtained for a priuiledge to that citie, that all controuerfies amongst the citizens should be iudged there, according to the lawes and ordonances written in the booke called Of Iudges, appointing a Councell of fixe of the most sufficient men amongst them, to assist the Iudge: all which together should take knowledge of the peoples causes, exempting the Castilians, who might decline from that seate, and desire to be sent before their ordinarie Iudges. According to which booke of Iudges, all the inhabitants of Toledo, and that iurisdiction should be iudged in matters of crime: expressly exempting the wiuces and children of offenders, (not culpable) from the pains, and fines due for all offences, namely, for high treason, or practises against the city.

2 That the inhabitants of Toledo might appeale from all other Iudges, & demand to be sent to the Iustice of Toledo, declaring all decrees against it to be void.

3 That the Inhabitants of Toledo should not be apprehended, nor put in prison for murder, vnlesse it were wilful, if they put in caution, or that the truth were apparent: and whereas they could not giue caution, they should not be put in any other prison, then the Dulcida.

4 All controuerfies betwixt Christians and Iewes, or Moores, should be decided by the Christian lawes, and before a Christian Iudge.

5 Exemptions granted vnto Church-men seruing God, of the tenth peny in all their inheritances.

6 Exemption of all taxes granted to souldiers, and to all such as had bene prisoners amongst the Moores.

7 All inhabitants of Toledo, as well Christians as Musarabes, should equally enjoy all royall grants.

8 The widowes of souldiers deceased, should enjoy the honors, and priuiledges of their husbands, and the children of their fathers, yea the sons should haue their arms & horfes.

9 The laborers and trimmers of vines should pay vnto the king for all tribute and seruice, the tenth peny, or portion of their corne and wine, and not bound to any other charges either in peace or war, except it were to succor the city of Toledo, being assailed by foes, in which case they should be bound to assist it with all their means.

10 The like exemptions were granted to the inhabitants of Toledo, for all lands, which they should hold in any other iurisdiction of the kings of Castile.

11 Liberty granted to the inhabitants of the said city, to build milles vpon the riuer of Tajo, against their lands and possessions, and to sell them, exchange them, and otherwise dispose of them at their pleasures.

12 No Iew nor Moore should haue commandement ouer Christians in the city of Toledo.

13 That the city of Toledo might neuer be alienated from the Crowne, nor giuen vpon any title whatsoever, to man, woman, or child.

14 No man, that had not his ordinarie residence in the sayd city, might enjoy any inheritance within the wals thereof, which inhabitants might enter into their lands and possessions, from whence they had bene chased by the Moores, in such townes and places as should be recovered from them.

15 The common treasure of the city should be employed, especially, in the building and reparations of the wals, and the fortifications thereof.

These were the priuiledges granted by the king D. Alphonso the 6. to the city of Toledo, the which were afterwards confirmed by D. Alphonso the 9. an 101 years after: so as by means thereof, it was in a short time peopled with Christians, which came thither from all parts of Spaine, and other countries: and the kings of Spaine haue bin alwaies very careful to honor this city. D. Alphonso leauing the city of Toledo in this estate, in the gard of Cid Ruis Diaz, he went to Leon, with the Archbish. D. Bernard, where there was a councell called, in the presence of Regner the Popes Nuntio; where amongst other things, it was decreed, that the Scribes and Notaries should no more vie the

A ancient Gothique characters, intitented (as they say) by Vifilas their Bishop, otherwise called Toledans: but those letters which are now vied in Castile, were at that time not put in practise. About that time died D. Theresa, the kings sister, wife to the Earle D. Garcia de Cabra, and soone after Queene Beatrix the 2. wife of D. Alphonso being deceased, he took to wife a Princess Moore, daughter to Almuntamuz Aben-Amel, king of Seuille, called Caida, or Zaida, the which was christened and called Mary. He receiued for her dower the townes of Cuenca, Huete, Ocagna, Vcles, Mora, Volera, Consiuegra, Alarcos, Caracuel, and other places. By her the king had one son, named D. Sancho, who died before the father, and the mother liued not long after him.

D. Alphonso
the 6. King of Castile with a Moore.*

This alliance caused great familiarity betwixt the king D. Alphonso, & the Moores, both in Spaine and Affricke, the which notwithstanding turned to the Moores ruine, and especially of his father-in-law Almuntamuz Aben-Amel, K. of Seuille: for to do him a pleasure, and to satisfie his ambition, and desire to be soveraign Lord ouer all the Moores in Spaine, King D. Alphonso, who was in great credit with all the Princes and Potentates that were neighbours to Aben Tefin, who was of the house and family of the Almorauides, to ayde and assist his father-in-law in this enterprise, and to fend him succours of Moores and Africans, the which he obtained to the prejudice of them both, as we shall here. But it is fit to vnderstand, first what these Almorauides were: Wherefore leauing a litle the affaires of Spaine, we will returne to that which we haue handled of the succession of Mahumet. The which (as we haue sayd) being fallen to two of his daughters

Arabians:

C Fatima and Zeineb; of Fatima descended the house and family of Aben Alauy, and of Zeineb, that of Aben Humeja. These two races were in perpetual dissention for the Soveraigntie of the Arabians, both in Asia, Affricke, and Europe, whereupon grew many alterations: so as in the end the Arabians of Affricke being diuided from them of Asia, the Crowne of Affricke continued in the race of Aben Alauy, for the space of 310. yeres: but as this nation was neuer faithfull within it selfe, and could not subsist without tumult and treasons: about the year 1068. there rose vp a noble family amongst them, called the Almorauides, or Lampunkas, which descended not from Mahumet, the which took the scepter from the race of Aben Alauy, and seized vpon the soveraigntie, and regall power ouer the Moores in Affricke: 450. yeres after that Mahumet had made himselfe

D Lord and Emperour ouer that nation. The first of this race which was chosen and declared king, and great Miralumin, was Abu Texifen, to whom Ioseph Aben Tefin above-named his sonne succeeded, who forced the others to quit the Scepter, and transferred it into his family, where it continued 79. yeres: the second yere of his raigene, Ambassadors came vnto him from king D. Alphonso, for the cause above-mentioned: so as within three yeres after, all the Moores of Spaine were vnto them of Affricke, as they had bene long before. Ioseph Aben Texifen the Miralumin, considering that if he sent forces into Spaine, it must needs increase the Moores estate and reputation: he sent a Captaine of great esteeme, called Ali Aben-Axa, his Algezil-maior, or Lieutenant in the countrie of Maroc, who with a great power of men of this race of the Almorauides, and other Africans, came and landed in Andalusia, and ioyned with the

E king of Seuille: but they stayed not long together, for being giuene into some controuersie, it drew them into sedition and armes: so as their forces being diuided, and ioyned in battaile in the open field, Almuntamuz Aben-Amel king of Seuille, lost his life; and this new-come Moore not onely leaued vpon his lands and Segneuries without any difficulty, but also made all the other Moores of Spain subiect vnto him: saying, that they had rather keep the Arabians Camels, then the Swine of the Christian Spaiards. Ali Aben-Axa was so fortunate in his proceedings, as he grew exceeding proud, not respecting his king any more: but rebelling openly against him, hee setled the royall seat at Cordoua, and caused himself to be called Miralumin of Spaine: by means whereof all the treaties of peace which had bin contracted betwixt the Moores and Christians

Alphonso* had had in dowry with Q. Caida his last wife: so as the king D. Alphonso thinking to enjoy an assured peace, hee found himselfe suddenly engaged in great and dangerous warres;

warrs: for Ali entering into the Realme of Toledo, he spoyle the countie at his pleasure, having gotten two great victories, and put two mightie armies of D. Alphonso to bloudie routes: so as the lands of D. Caido dowrie, with others, came into his power, the which was the more easie to effect, for that they were in a manner all inhabited by Moors. Yet in a third expedition, whereas D. Alphonso went in person with all the flower of his kingdomes, the conquerors furie was stayed, so as he was forced for feare (seeing this great preparation made against him) to keepe himselfe within Cordoua, and so abandon his countie to the spoile, not daring to defend it, and in the end came to a composition and treaty of peace with D. Alphonso, by the which he made himselfe his vassall and tributarie, giving him rich presents, and great sums of money, wherewith the King and his armie being enriched, they returned victoriously into Castile. From thence King D. Alphonso hauing gotten new courage, led his armie to subdue Sarragossa, and did so presse it, as the Inhabitants did offer to hold it in fee of him, and to do him homage, the which he refused, demanding the city: but whilest he was busie at this enterprize, behold there arrives in Spaine a great cloude of African Moores, which stricke a greater terror in Spaine then had beene in many ages. It was Joseph Aken Tefar the Miralminin, who incensed at the trecherie of Ali, was come out of Affricke with a greater armie of Moores, then had bin seene in long time, to take reuenge of his trecherie.

16 The presence of this king stayed the siege of Sarragossa, brake the accord made betwixt Alphonso and Ali, and was the cause of many great alterations. Hee besieged and forced Ali in the city of Seuille, and as a traytour, cut off his head: he seized vpon Cordona, in the which was a sonne of Abercatus, and in a short time hee brought all Andalusia vnder his obedience, and in a manner all the Noblemen and townes which the Moores held in Spaine: he drew vnto his seruice some Earles and Noblemen Christians, with many souldiers; whome gaine, or their disordered passions, commanded more then religion. One of these Earles was called D. Ordoñez de Lara: So the Moores of Spaine ioyned with them of Affricke, vnder one Miralminin in the yeare, 1089, hauing bene diuided 334. yeares, they of Affricke being subiect to the race of Aben-Humja from Abderramen the first: This king stayed some time in Spaine, to dispose of his new conquests, not respecting any more the friendship of King D. Alphonso, who first had invited him to come into Spaine; and then he returned into Affricke, where hee had seiled his imperiall seat at Maroc or Marroxx. Then began there a difficult war betwixt these two Potentates in Spaine: by reason whereof King D. Alphonso sought the friendship and succours of other Christian Princes: vpon which occasion there came many valiant Knights into Spaine, to winne honor by armes, and moued also with zeale of religion; among the which were three Princes, whereof mention hath bene made in the beginning of this raigne: that is, Raymond son to William, brother to the Earle of Bourgoigne; Henry of Lorraine or of Belançon, and his vnkle or cousin Raymond of Thoulouze, and of S. Giles: with these and other braue souldiers, as well Spaniards, as of other nations, D. Alphonso made head against this Arabian king: so as he stopt his course, and ouer-run his country newly conquered, taking great spoiles, and carrying away many prisoners, without any opposition.

Portugal held the first of the Crown of Leon

17 At that time D. Alphonso (for the good seruices hee had receiued from these three personages, and to bind them the more to defend the Christians estate in Spaine) gaue them his daughters in marriage: to Henry of Lorraine, whom some call Earle of Limbourg, D. Theresa his bastard, to whom bearing a private affection, hee gaue the countie of Portugal, which he had conquered from the Moores, with the hereditarie title of an Earle, for him and his heires lawfully begotten; and withall making him a promise to adde vnto his Seigneuries whatsoeuer he should conquer from the Moores in those parts, with the same right of hereditarie succession. These goodly gifts did King D. Alphonso bestow vpon D. Henry, vpon condition, that they should acknowledge the kings of Leon for their Soueraigne Lords, and hold them in fee of them, do they them homage, and present themselves at the kings court at Leon, whensoever they should

A should call there vassals; and serue them against their enemies: Moreouer they should furnish three hundred horse, with some other duties: This was the beginning of the Siegneury of Portugal, and of the royall posterity of the possesseurs of that countie. To Raymond Earle of Tolouze and Saint Giles, King D. Alphonso gaue D. Elvira an other of his bastards; and to Cont Raymond of Bourgoigne D. Præcia his lawfull daughter, with the Government of Galicia; & the title of an Earle, which was the ordinary title of great dignities in Spaine, in those times.

D. Sancho Ramirez, King of Nauarre and Arragon, did all hee could to annoy the Moores, vpon his borders: from whom hee tooke about the yeere of our Lord 1089, the towne of Montçon, yet with great difficulty, by reason of the fort, and the obdurate defence of the garrison. The same yeere the priuiledges of Nobility, with all exemptions, were confirmed to them of the valley of Roncal, as a testimony that they had bene alwaies valiant and faithfull to their Kings.

In the yeere 1091, hee forced Abderramen the Moore, King of Huesca, to pay him tribute: he sent succours to his cousin D. Alphonso of Castille, in the warre which hee made vpon the marches of Toledo; and hauing a designe to besiege Sarragossa in time, hee beganne a fort neere to the riuer of Ebro, five leagues from Sarragossa, the which hee called Castellar: hee wonne afterwards from the Moores, Ollalla, Almenara and Nauai, and hee peopled Luna, from whence is descended the family of Luna; and to copee vpon the King of Huesca, hee fortified the castles of Marcuello, Loarre and Algueçar, vpon the Marches of Sobrabre, and subiected all that is betwixt it and Montaragon, within a league of Huesca: wherefore King Abderramen seeing himselfe restrained daily more and more, hee had recourse vnto D. Alphonso King of Castille, offering to pay him a greater tribute, then hee did to him of Nauarre, if hee would take him into his protection: wherewith D. Alphonso gaue care, being glad to make himselfe great by what meanes soeuer, of such power is ambition in the hearts of men, who sparing not the King D. Sancho his cousin, hee had wrested from him the Siegneury of Guipulcoa, which had euer bene vntied to the crowne of Nauarre, and had made Earle and Governour, in his name, D. Lopes Diaz of Haro, Lord of Biscay. This manner of proceeding did much displease D. Sancho Ramirez, who for this cause hauing

D sent some troups of soldiers, to the frontiers of Alaua, to entertaine the Castilians, he went to the siege of Huesca, being resolved to take it at what price soeuer: hee was accompanied by his sonnes D. Pedro, King of Sobrabre, and D. Alphonso, with the forces of Nauarre and Arragon: but as he proceeded in this siege, with to great vehemency, it happened that going to view the weakest places, with his captaines, he was shot with a Moorish arrow vnder the arme-hole, as he lifted vp his arme, to shew some one that was neere him, a place where he thought fit to make his battery. The blow was mortall, the which D. Sancho feeling he retired to his tent, dissembling his paine as much as hee could: being there, hee caused D. Pedro and D. Alphonso his children to sweare, not to depart from the siege, vntill they had taken the towne; and soone after hee died, as

E they drew the arrowe out of the wound. Hee was a valiant Prince, and had happily enlarged his dominions by conquests against the Moores; but his neighbors Christians were not very faithfull, euen D. Alphonso, King of Castille. Hee laued iustice and Government: the towne of Estella was begonne by him, the which at this day is one of the three cities of Nauarre, and the second in dignity: He affected religion much, according to the practise of those ages, for besides many donations made by him to churches and monasteries, and the re-edifying of them that were ruined, hee made D. Ramir his youngest sonne a religious man, of the order of Saint Benet, in the monastery of Saint Ponce of Torreilles. D. Pedro his eldest sonne succeeded him, in the realme of Nauarre and Arragon, in the yeere of our Lord 1094: about this time many monasteries of France, obtained exemption from the jurisdiction of Bishops, the Monks being desirous to enjoy greater liberty, and their Abbots to adorne themselves with crosses and miters like Bishops.

About that time D. Theresa, countesse of Portugal, had a sonne by Henry of Lorraine, or of Belançon at a place called Guyon; his name was D. Alphonso, as the King of Sigüenza and in the end Bishop of Saint Jagues: Peter also of Agen, second Arch-deacon of Toledo, and since bishop of Segobia: Raymond of Agen, who succeeded in the Bishopricke of Ofina, and in the end to the same D. Bernard in his dignity of Toledo: an other Peter who was Bishop of Palence, and Ierome of Perigueux, whom hee made Bishop of Valencia, arriving in that city soone after that D. Roderigo Diaz de Bivar had conquered it; to whom he was an assistant to order clergy matters. Hee carried with him also one Bernard, who was bishop of Zamora: and besides a Limosin called Bourdin, who was Arch-deacon of Toledo, and afterwards Bishop of Coimbra, and successively Arch-bishop of Braga: but this Bourdin became a Judas to the church of Rome, and would haue made himselfe Pope, against Calixtus the second, which caused a great scisme.

All this feed the Archbishop of Toledo brought out of France into Spaine, at his returne from Rome, & furnished Spaine with these Prelats, in recompence of the vow which he did not performe to goe to the holy war: and moreover he re-built churches and other apparient places in the towne of Tarragone, with the money which was prepared for his voiage, and there established Berenger Archbishop, having beene Bishop of Viad: Aulone, leaving the temporality of that towne to Raymond Arnould Earle of Barcelona.

Barcelona.

This Prince was left young at the death of his father, who had beene cruelly murdered by his owne brother, desirous to rule alone in Cattelogne. He was much troubled with diuisions and factions betwixt the Noblemen of the country, and was spoiled of Carcaffone and other Lands which he had in France, by tyrants, as it happens often during the minority of the Prince or Lord. His mother the Contesse Almodia, a widow, gaue ouer al government, and professed herselfe a Nunne in the conuent of Saint Daniel of Gitone: so as hee remained in the hands of Armingel Earle of Vied, the Earle of Cerdagne, and some other of his bloud, who beeing imploied against the Moores, got for themselves, and did not much attend the good of their pople, yet did he grow both in vertue and valour: Cont Armingel died in the yeere of our Lord 1092, and D. Guillen for dauid of Cerdagne, went to the warres of Syria with Gedfrey of Bouillon, where beeing dead and soone after his brother D. Bernard Guillen his successor, leaving no heires of their bodie, the Earle D. Raymond Arnould, as neereft allied did inherit the Earledome, whom God did so fauour, as that Bernard of Aton who had usurped Carcaffone, was growne so haresfull to them of the country, as they chased him away, and deliuered the towne to D. Raymond Arnould their naturall Lord. So he not onely recovered that which they had taken from him, but also augmented his Estates and Siegneuries with the towne of Tarragone, and the county of Cerdagne. We haue sayd before, that he was in a certaine encounter against Cid Ruiz Diaz, during the warres betwixt Valencia and Denia, and that hee was repulled and vanquished by him: but became afterwards good friends, after that Cid had taken Valencia about the yeere of our Lord 1096.

Marriage of the daughters of Cid Ruiz Diaz.

To returne to which conquest, we will say that Cid did presently send to King D. Alphonso his Lord, a hundred goodly horses richly furnished, with other great presents, who being in Palenza, receiued them with great contentment. He sent other presents to D. Ximena his wife, whom with his two daughters, D. Eluira, and D. Sol, he caused to come to Valencia with the lease of King D. Alphonso. The Almorauides of Affricke staid not long before they past the seas, to defend their new conquest in Spaine, and came into the country of Valencia with a great power, but they were repulled by Cid with great losse and dishonour: of the spoiles of which victories Cid sent two hundred horses vnto his King, richly furnished, and at euery saddle did hang a sword of great value. The King D. Alphonso was at that time at Valledor in Castille, who receiued this present graciously: There beganne the treaty of marriage for the daughters of Cid, with D. Diego and D. Fernand Gonçales, sonnes to D. Gonçales Lord of Carrion, for the effecting whereof, the King, Cid, and the parties came to Requena, whether the King brought the two young Noblemen, to whom Cid promised his daughters; and afterwards the marriages were celebrated at Valencia with great pompe. But in the

A end of this feast there happened an accident, which did much trouble these two houses, so inconstant and shorie are humane pleasures; and the counsels and iudgements of God inscrutable. There was a Lyon bred vp in Cid's house, the which by the negligence of the Governour, or otherwise, getting loose, came into the hall; where there was a great assembly of Noblemen and Ladies, with the married coples, and strooke a great terror among them, where as about all others the two Gonçales, newly married showed themselves faine hearted, whereas they were, ashamed, seeing themselves soe disgraced, both by their father in law, and by the other knights there present. From that time they conceived a mortal hatred against Cid, thinking that this Lyon had beene soe loose by his commandment, to try them and feare them, loas they refused to be scutenged vpon soe high occasion. There was no main argument of their banelles, seeing a Lyon vpon the lodaine (although that an unexpected accident, might amaze the most hardy being an ordinary thing in nature, as hee moved at lodaine things) for soone after they came a more ample testimony of their want of courage, in a battaile against the Moores, who were come against Valencia: where they carried themselves, badly yet by the wisdom and valour of Cid these Infidels were vanquished. After al this, these two base Knights would carry their wives home to their houses, but hauing their hearts full of poison, and fearing they should not be able to hurt their father in law, they reuenged themselves inhumanly vpon their innocent wives, and intreated them so it before they came to Carrion, as they left them for dead vpon the way, at a place called Robledos de Corps, neere to Berlanga, where these poore Ladies being cherished by the good people of the country, they had meanes to aduertise Cid their father of their misery. The messenger whom they sent, was encountered by Cid's men, going to the King D. Alphonso with foure score horses, and other rich presents, of the spoiles of the last victory obtained against the Moores. Complaint was made by them vnto the King of this villanous act committed by the sonnes of the Lord of Carrion against their wives; wherevpon the King assembled the Noblemen and Knights of the country of Toledo, and kept a court (whereas Cid appeared, hauing retired his daughters to Valencia) and Iudges were appointed to doe right vnto the parties, vpon soe great a controuersie, among the which D. Raymond of Bourgoigne, the Kings sonne in law was one: Their sentence was that their quession should bee decided by armes, betwixt Knights chosen of either party; such was the lustice in those daies among Nobles, a custome which is not lost amongst Christians at this day. The campe where they should fight was chosen in the towne of Carrion, whereas there appeared Pedro Bermudes, Martin Antolinez and Nugno Gussor, Knights for Cid, who vanquished, the two sonnes of Carrion, with their vncle a partisa of their villany, called Suero Gonçales who were proclaimed infamous and traitors; and degraded of al honor and title of nobility. These two Ladies were afterwards happily married into the house of Nauarre, that is D. Eluira to D. Ramirez, sonne to the King D. Sancho Garcia, and D. Sol, to the sonne of D. Pedro, then reigning in Nauarre and Arragon, called also D. Pedro, who died before his father. After these last marriages Cid growne old, did nothing that was memorable.

Death of Cid Ruiz Diaz.

E He fetled the Estate of Valencia as well as he could, with the aide of the Princes of Nauarre and Arragon his allies. And the better to assure it, he chased away diuers families of the Moores, which were suspected vnto him. A captaine of the Moores, who was also a Doctor of the law of Mahomet, called Alfaraxi, a great friend to Cid, took vpon him the Christian religion, being held a man of great valour and iudgement. The authors place the death of Cid Ruiz Diaz of Buar in the yeere 1098, the towne of Valencia being annoyed by the Moores, which held their campe about it: yet notwithstanding they say that the widow accompanied with D. Ierome the Bishop, went out of the towne, conducting her husbands body, to bury it at Saint Pedro de Cerdagne, where it was laied: the Monkes of that place at this day shew many jewells and other things which they say had beene giuen by that great captaine to their Monastery. After his death, the Christians which were at Valencia fearing they should not bee able to resist the forces of the Moores Almorauides, abandoned the towne, which came into the Infidels power againe, and so continued 140. yeeres.

yet this made the King to thinke, that it was fit to marry his daughter, and therefore hee A made choise of D. Alphonso Infant of Nauarre and Arragon brother to the King D. Pedro for his sonne in law, the which hee did by the aduice of D. Bernard Archbishop of Toledo, which marriage was accomplished according vnto some, in the life time of the King D. Pedro, others say it was after his deccase, D. Alphonso hauing already succeeded him to the crowne of Nauarre and Arragon, in the yeece 1104. for that the King D. Pedro sonne, of the same name, was dead without children, and D. Isabel his daughter was also dead a virgin. This King D. Pedro and his children were buried at S. Jeau de la Pegna, the last of the Kings which were interred there. He had reigned in Nauarre and Arragon ten yeeres and three monethes.

As for King D. Alphonso, he liued vnto the yeece 1208. being afflicted with great in- B firmities, with the which he languished to the age of 73. whereof hee reigned foure and thirty yeeres and eight monethes, after the deccase of his brother D. Sancho, his bo- dy is interred in the Monastery of Sahagun, D. Alphonso his son in law succeeded him, in the right of D. Vrraca (the only lawfull daughter of the deceased) in all his realmes of Castille, Leon, Toledo and other Siegneuries. A little before his death, one Moyse a Jew, very learned in the tongues, in Philosophy and the holy Scriptures, was baptized, and the King D. Alphonso was his god-father, wherefore hee was called Pedro Alphonso. His conuersion was profitable to many Iewes and Moores, whom by disposing and writing hee brought to leaue their sects, and to imbrace the name and profession of Christians. At the same time florished Dominike de la Calçada, whose practise was to reuise the pilgrimes which went to Saint Iaques, and to direct them in their way. At C the place of whose aboade there was since a city built of that name: he caused a Chap- pel to be built there in honour of the Virgin Mary, and a little from thence, fise yeeres before his death, he made his sepulcher: for at that time they buried not any in holie ground. Now it is a Cathedra Church.

Nauarre, Ar-

and Castille.
An. 1108.

Let the Christian Kingdomes of Spaine were vnited in one body, in the yere 1108. by the succession of Leon, Castille, Toledo and other conquests, fallne to D. Priaca, wife to D. Alphonso King of Nauarre and Arragon, intituled Emperor of Spaine by a better right then his Predecessors: notwithstanding that some Chronicles will not haue him put in the linke and number of the Kings of Castille and Leon, for that it was D. Priaca his wife, and not hee which was heire of the sayd realmes D. Pedro Ansures during the Kings absence, who was in Nauarre and Arragon, gouerned, and was Viceroy in Castille; in which time the Moores went to field, and did great harme vnto the Christians, taking the towne of Coria, with other places. D. Alphonso King of Nauarre, entred with an army into Castille, leading with him D. Priaca his wife, but there needed not any force, for all obeyed him, both the townes, forts and Noblemen of the country, whom hee gouerned with all mildnesse, humanity and iustice, and repulsd the inuasions of the Moores on the frontiers of his wiues dominions: but hee made sharper warre against them vpon the conquests of Nauarre and Arragon: in Castille hee repaired Villagades in Rioje Berlanga: and vpon the riuier of Duero, Almanan and Sofia. The surname of warrior was giuen him by reason of his deeds of armes, and the battailes wherein he was during his raigne: The Historie report that he did fight 39. times in a pitch field, & was victor in them all, except in the two last battailes, which were fought nere vnto Fraga. Having gotten footing in Castille, he began to foresee what might happen, if his wife should die without children by him; wherefore he put gononors and captaines of his countries of Nauar & Arragon in al the strong places of Castille, that if he were forced to quither the realms of Castille, Leon, Toledo & their depédañces, he might keep those people in some awe, and

A and leaue it with his honor and aduantage: the which did somewhat estrange the Noblemen of Castille. He knew also, that his wife D. Priaca was proud, ingrate, inconstant, and not very continent, and therefore with good aduice he armed himselfe for all euents. This woman vpon a light occasion, conceived a great hatred against the Earle D. Pedro Ansures, Lord of Vailledolit, who had nourished her, and had kept her Estates after the death of the king her father, onely for that in his letters written to the king her husband, & her, aduising them to come and take possession of her inheritance, he had intituled her husband King of Castille. Whereupon she fought to take Vailledolit, and other lands from him, but the King did presently restore them: and to the end he should be the more secure, against the rage of this woman, hee sent him into Arragon, with D. Elo his wife, giuing him the gouernement of the young Earle of Vrgel his Cousin.

The first expedition which he made against the Moores, was about the yere, 1110. vpon the frontiers of Nauarre and Arragon, where he tooke from them the towne of Exea, in which warre he was assisted by many voluntarie Noblemen and Gentlemen of France, being desirous to winne honor by bearing armes against the Mahumetists. Running along the riuier of Ebro, he tooke Tihaut, Borja, Magallon, and other places of those marches: so as the happy successe of this enterprize gaue him courage to effect that which his predecessors Kings of Nauarre had long before designed; which was, to reduce the citie of Sarragossa vnder his obedience, the which as he made shew to be seige, spoiling the countrie round about it King Abuslen came with a great power, and presented him battaile, neare vnto Valtierra, where the Moore was vanquished, and slaine vpon the place. By meanes of this victorie, King D. Alphonso took Morcella, and resolved to be seige Sarragossa, wherefore he put a strong garrison into the fort of Castella, of old fouldiers, called at that time in Spaine Almograbes, who were continually entertained vpon the Moores frontiers. This seige was long and dangerous, for the Moores defended this citie courageously, being great, full of men, and well fortified.

In the armie of king D. Alphonso, there were many Noblemen of France, which had vowed to carrie armes against the Infidels, among the which were Galton Lord of Berne, the Earle of Cominges, and Rotron Earle of Perche, by whom the Towne of Tudele, seated vpon Ebro, betwixt Sarragossa and Calaoarra, was taken by surprize. The Moores which were there in garrison, did much annoy the campe; for that they spoiled their victuallers and merchants, and cut off their victuals: whereupon D. Alphonso sent Count Rosron with good troupes of foot and fixe hundred horse. The Earle kept himselfe close in certaine valleys, couered with woods, neere vnto the towne, and sent forth some men into the open plaines, to get some spoile, and to driue away their cattell; who being discovered by the Moores of the fort, they sallied forth with all their forces, to the end that not any one of these runners should escape. While they were in skirmish, the Earle came out of his ambush, and cut off their retreat to the towne, the which he found ill garded, so as he seized thereon without any difficultie. The king D. Alphonso to reward the Earle of Perche for this prize, which was of so great importance, for that seige where he was, gaue him this place of Tudele, the which was afterwards annexed to the crowne of Nauarre. The Moores amazed at this losse, began to faint in many places: so as Moncajo, and other neighbour townes, were made subiect to D. Alphonso within few dayes. The Sarragossians were much assisted by the Moores, which commanded at Lerida and Fraga, as well for the danger which did threaten them, as for their conformity in Religion.

During this seige, the king D. Alphonso being in the citie of Barbastro, there came vnto his Court Count Bertrand of Tholouise, sonne to Count Raymond, and D. Eluira his daughter to the deceased King D. Alphonso the 6. This young Prince had bin dispossessed of all his Estate by the Earle of Poitiers, who being graciously interrayned and honored by king D. Alphonso, to the end he might bee ayded by him, to recover his Estate, he made himselfe his vassall, acknowledging him for his Soueraigne Lord of all he did, or should possesse (according to the Spanish Historie.) received him into his protection, & gave him good hope, it was about the year 1116. A yet this did little avails Cont. Brerand; for the continuall warre which D. Alphonso had against the Moores, would not suffer him to attend the affaires of Tholouza, besides William Earle of Poitiers was the kings friend, and came himselfe in person to the war against the Moores in Spaine, and was at the siege of Sarragossa, with the Earles of Perche, Cominges and Bigorre, the Lord of Beam, the Vicount of Lauedan, Bishop of Escar, and many other Noblemen and Knights of France, whereas also were all the Noblemen of Navarre and Arragon, both Ecclesiasticall and secular; among the which those of greatest make, were Diego Lope Ladrón, Ximen Fortunes de Lect, Simon Fortu- nes de mont Castell, Pedro Momello, Lope Ximenes Torella, Lope Sancho of Ogabre, Pedro
Ximenes Iustice of Arragon, Jean Galindio d'Antilia, Lope Fortunes of Albero, Pedro
Ay Entenza, Raymond Peres d'Erille, N. of Almoravid, and with them many of Castile and other places of Spaine. About the year 1118. Almudebar, a strong place and well furnished, was taken by the French; the which strucke such a terror into the Moores thereabouts, as they abandoned Sarrigena, Salce, Robres, Zeura, and Gurrea, the which were seized on by the Arragonois, whilest that the French with the other forces did batter Sarragossa, with all violence, the which the Moores defended valiantly, the king D. Alphonso being then gone into Castile. The Spaniards write, that the French seeing this siege to grow tedious, and being out of hope to take the citie, they retired in a manner all home to their houses, except the chiefe Commanders, to whom D. Alphonso brought new supplies, about July this year 1118. The besieged beginning to doubt that they should not be able to keep the citie long, they employed all their money, meanes, and credit, intreating the Moores that were neere and farre off, to succour them in their great necessitie. Who sending a capitaine vnto them called Te- min, with men and victuals: he was encountered and defeated neere vnto Daroca, by the king D. Alphonso, and the Earle of Prouence, who (according vnto Swrites, the Writer of the Historie of Arragon,) was there with sixe hundred horse; contrarie to that which the Spaniards say: so as the Moores despayring of all succours, began to parle, and to treat of conditions to yield. Some notwithstanding to do more honor to the Clergie of those times, say, that D. William Gasson, Bishop of Pampelone, generall of the souldiers of Navarre, behaued himselfe so in his quarter, as hauing made a great and spacious breach, he entered the towne by force, the Moores making won-derfull resistance, with their king Almosuen, who was slaine among the ruines. This great citie was taken in December, in the aforesayd year 1118. where the king D. Al- phonso entering, he lodged in the pallace of the kings of the Moores, called Açuda, neere vnto the Port of Toledo, beginning to settle the estate thereof, to make it the Capitall citie of all the Realmes which he enjoyed, or that he might conquer hereafter, intui-ting himselfe king of Sarragossa. His chiefe care was to settle the Clergie, and to in-rich that Order, which had serued him much in the siege of the towne: wherefore the Mosque Maior was then consecrated for a cathedrall Church, vnder the name of S. Sa- uueur, and one Pedro de Libana, was chosen Bishop, confirmed by Pope Gelasius. E then reigning. They found many Christians Musazabes in Sarragossa, who had liued there among the Arabians, with great liberty of their Religion, the which they did exercise in a very ancient church, called Nostre Dame del Pilar; we reade in the Historie of Arragon, and in the writings of Ierom Swrite, that the Lords of Bearne, and the earls of Perche did long enioy very great priuileiges in the citie of Sarragossa, by the grant of D. Alphonso. This king and Emperour of Spaine granted great liberties and priuileiges to this citie, to prouoke strangers to come and dwell there, namely, the priuilege of gentrie, and the lawes and Iustice of Arragon: and in time of factions and se-ditions to chuse for their Councell certaine Syndics, Protectors of the people.

As for the dignitie called Iustice of Arragon, which was vsed in the time of D. Pedro F
Ximenes, it is a Magistrate, the gardien and protector of the publike libertie, against the violence of great men, yea to suppress the exccesse and tyrannies of Kings, with soue-raigne iurisdiction, instituted in the infancie and beginning of principalities and Christian Estates in Spaine, after the inuasion of the Moores, when as the kings, not by

A succession of blood and birth, but by their valour and vertues were chosen, to be ready and faithfull Gouernors of the affaires, as well of warre, as of Iustice, according vnto certaine simple lawes, and as then militarie, propounded vnder the title of the court or law of Sobrarbre. This Magistrat was first called Iustice maior, entertained and augmented both in dignitie and authoritie from time to time by good kings. There were great gifts and fees given also by this great king vnto the Earle of Bigorre, in recompence of the good offices he had done him in this warre. These things thus done, hee went and layed siege before Tarrasone; the which made no great resistance, seeing that the neighbour places were come into the power of the Christians. Being yel-ded, it receiued the ancient Episcopall seate, and one D. Michel was chosen Bishop.
 B This towne which in former times had belonged to the Crowne of Navarre, by this last conquest was annexed to that of Arragon.

D. Alphonso continuing his conquests, tooke the places and forts which were along the riuier of Xalon, and in the end tooke the towne of Calarajub, into the which he put a great garrison; as a place which fronted vpon the Moores on the mountains of Cuenca, Molina, Valencia, and Castile, he cleauid that which remained of the Moorish faction vpon the riuier of Xiloca vnto Daroca: he repaired and peopled Montreal, whereas this deuout king instituted an Order of Knights in imitation of the Templers of Ierusalem, which was called S. Saluator, assigning them rents and reuenues, to the end they should employ themselves courageously to roote out the Infidels in Spaine, as he had propounded. King D. Alphonso did these great exploits vnto the year 1120 at which time the Moores were dispossessed of all which doth now belong to Arragon.

But in Carlelogne there yet remained the king of Lerida and Fraga called Aben Gams, whose forces were not to be contemned; and the which were as a thorne in the foot of the Estates of Arragon, but more to Raymond Arnould Earle of Barcelone, who was a good and a valiant Knight; and who had receiued no small blessings from God: hauing by vnexpected meanes recovered the lands which were vlsurped from him during his minority, and augmented his Estates by new successions of the Earldome of Cerdagne, of the towne of Tarragone, and euen newly of the County of Besalu, by the decaile of D. Bernard Guillen, by reason of which prosperities he intitled himselfe D Marquis of Spaine, Earle of Cerdagne, Besal, and afterwards of Prouence and Ai-millan, by the death of Gilbert his father-in-law, who had no other heire then D.
Douie, wife to D. Raymond. It is likely, that by this meane he got the Countie of Prouence, whereof (as a fee of the Empire) he was inuelted by the Emperour Henry the 5.
 as we haue sayd. As for those lands which he held in Languedoc, as Carcaffone and others: some Authots write, that the vicious Bernard of Aton, hauing vsurped them, vnder a counterfeite promise to hold them of him, and to do him homage, hee afterwards made this acknowledgement to William Earle of Poitiers, vsurper of the Con-tie of Tholouza: but D. Raymond forced him by armes to submit himselfe vnto him.

In Portugall Cont. Henry had defended his country against the Moores wisely and valiantly, and had gouerned with all iustice and honor, vnder the souerainetie of the King, or Emperour Don Alphonso, vntill the year 1112, that he died in Galicia, in the towne of Aftorga, and was interred at Braga in S. Maries church, leauing for heire
D. Alphonso Henriques his eldest sonne, about eightene yeares old. D. Therefa the Countesse widow, to whom the Earldome of Portugall did belong in proprietie, shewing her indiscretion, married soone after to a knight of a noble house, called Don Bernard Paez de Transmara, with whom hauing liued some time, by a disordered appetite, or some other damnable occasion, she left him, and married againe with a brother of his called D. Fernando Paez of Transmara; D. Bernard being thus forsaken, and as it were struing with his wife who should be most incestuous, hee married her eldest daughter, and sister to D. Alphonso Henriques, called D. Therefa Henriques.

F These goodly exploits were done among Christians, in the house of Portugall, which was but now growing: for expiation whereof, they say, that Fernando Paez, who had taken away his liuing brothers wife, built a Monasterie at Sobrado in Galicia, nine leagues from Saint Iaques, a pennance and satisfaction taught by the pastors of those times,

times, to miserable contempters of Gods lawes and ordonances. The young Earle A Don Alphonso being much troubled with these excesses, and moreover seeing himselfe condemned, and out of all credit and fauour, for that the adulterous and incestuous D. Fernando intitled himselfe Earle of Portugal, in the right of his wife, he went to armes against him, the event you shall heere hereafter.

Navarre, Castile, Arragon, &c.

If this Countesse were vnchast in her feuerall marriages, her sister D. Vrraca shewed her selfe as loose and disloyall to her husband King Don Alphonso: so as this Prince who was endowd with great vertue and wisdom, was forced to restrain her in the fort of Castellar, neere vnto Saragossa, from whence shee sought by all means to escape: as shee did, with the helpe of some discontented Noblemen of Castile; with whom shee retired into her inheritance, where shee tooke counsell to bee diuorced from the King her husband, making her pretext, that shee had bene married against her will, and by constraint; and moreover, that shee was his cousin germaine removed, and therefore the marriage could not be lawfull, without dispensation from the church of Rome; the which in those dayes was not much vsed. Of this Councell were the Arch-bishop of Toledo, the Bishops of Bourgos, Leon, Palence and others, who were all dissatisfied, chased away, and banished by D. Alphonso, and with them the Abbot of S. Feposeli, chased away, and banished by D. Alphonso, and with them the Nobles, audes, whose Abbey was giuen to D. Ramir the kings brother. Wherefore the Nobles and Estates of Castile, considering what troubles and miseries would ensue, if this desseigne were put in execution against the king D. Alphonso, they would not giue their consents, but took their Queene with all respect, and conducted her into Arragon, to her husband; who dissembled the wrongs shee had done him, receiued her into fauour: but as she continued her leud life, forgetting more and more the honor of her selfe & house, which should haue bin more deare vnto such a Princeesse, then her life, the king in the end caused her to be conducted to the towne of Soria, chased her from his company for ever: notwithstanding he kept still many strong places in Castile, not caring much for the gouernment of the Realme.

Without doubt this king was of a great courage, and gaue good proofes, that he did more esteeme vertue and his honor, then all worldly goods, dispossessing himselfe of all great iurisdiccions, as those of Castile, Leon, Toledo, and others, which D. Vrraca had brought him; who being settled in her countries, began to shew some tokens of amendment, gouerning her selfe by the aduice and counsell of D. Pedro Ansuere, and other knights of greatest wisdom and fame among the Nobility of Castile. Having then assembled her estates, she complained that many forts were kept from her, demanding their aduice and ayde to recouer them: Those which were kept by Captains and gouernors Castilians, were presently yielded vnto her, without attending any commandement from the king D. Alphonso, in hatred that he had chased away the Queene. Among others D. Pedro Ansuere, presently after the restitution of some places by him, went to the king, who was at Castellar; where coming before him, being mounted vpon a white horse, and clad all in scarlet, hee lighted, and holding a halter in his hand, hee layed vnto him, That hee had done vnto his Queene (the naturall and foweraigne Princeesse of Castile) the dutie of a faithfull vassall: yet having failed vnto the king, to whome hee had sworn fealtie and homage, hee had brought vnto him both hand and mouth, the instruments of the oath which hee had made vnto him, to the end that his Maiestie might dispose of them, and of his whole bodie at his Highnesse pleasure and command. King Don Alphonso (alwaies like himselfe) although (vpon sufficient grounds) he were discontented with the yielding vp of these forts, shewing no good countenance vnto the Earle, yet vpon his first speech hee pardoned him, yielding to the counsell of the wife, who commended much the loyalte and integritie of this knight, the which should serue as a President to posteritie: wherefore he was sent backe with honor into Castile.

After this, D. Vrraca did nothing of merit: for falling to her old desseigne of diuorce, she obtained it by the authoritie of Pope Pascall. Of whose commandement and Bulls, Don Diego Gelmirio, Bishop of Compostella, was minister and executioner. Thus finding her selfe without restraint in her lust & luxuriousnesse, she exceeded strangely.

Since

A Shee had familiar and dishonest conuersation with D. Gomes, Earle of Candespina, who had in former times pretended to be her husband, who was secretly deliuered of a sonne, gotten by him, and was for that cause called D. Fernando Hurtado, from whence as they lay, is descended the house of Hurtados, a noble family of Spaine. Although that some doubt hereof, yet it is most certaine, that the Earle D. Gomes, had in a short time the whole gouernement of all the affaires, both of warre and peace at his pleasure, conuersing as familiarly with the Queene, as if shee had bene his wife: and yet another Knight called D. Pedro de Lara, sonne to Don Ordono, Earle of Lara, who entred combat at the siege of Zamora, against the three sonnes of Aria Goncalo, after the decease of the king D. Sanecho, did insinuate himselfe in the Queenes fauour, and was in a short time one of her greatest minions, whereof the earle D. Gomes was very iealous. The dissolute and vnchast life of D. Vrraca was so publickly knowne to all the world, as king D. Alphonso (moued with a iust disdain, both for it, and for the aboue-mentioned diuorce) resolved to enter into Castile with an armie, putting all to fire and sword, being much incensed as well at the dissolute life of the Queene, as at the Castilians basenesse, who obeyed her, bearing them also a spleene, for that they had deliuered her those places which he had giuen them in gard.

There went against him to field the Queenes two fauorites, D. Gomes, and D. Pedro, with the forces of Castile and Leon, who hauing incourted the kings armie, consisting of Nauarrois and Arragonois, they came to fight neare vnto Candespina, and not farre from Sepulveda. D. Pedro who led the foreward, was first charged, who abandoned his men basely vpon the first encounter, and retired to Bourgos, where the Queene, was carrying newes of the route which he had no leysure to see. The army of Castile was defeated and put to flight, and many good Knights slain and others taken, namely, D. Gomes Earle of Candespina, with a brother of his called Diagomes died vpon the place. The valour of one of the house of Olea was great, which carried the Standard of the Earle D. Gomes, who being ouerthrowne from his horse, and both his hands cut off, he held his Standard fast in his armes whilst hee liued, crying out with a loud voyce, Olea, Olea. After this victorie, D. Alphonso past vnto Leon, by the territorie of Campos, making a cruell spoyle and murder, wherofeuer his armie went, vpon D. Pedro's faction. And for that his treasure failed him, the souldiers abandoning themselves to the spoyle, committed infinit thefts and sacrileges, sparing nothing, were it holy or prophane.

King D. Alphonso hauing past into Galicia with the like disorder, the Nobilitie of those countries, assembled all that were fit to carrie armes, and came to meet with this furious enemy, bringing in the armie young D. Alphonso Raymond, the sonne of D. Vrraca, and of Cont Raymond of Bourgonne her first husband. There king D. Alphonso had another battaile, neere vnto a place called Carrera of Anguas, betwixt the townes of Leon and Astorga, where the Nauarrois and Arragonois had the victorie. So as hauing slaine a great number of Leonois, put the rest of the army to flight, and taken D. Pedro de Traus prisoner, D. Alphonso Raymond was forced to saue himselfe in Portugall. King D. Alphonso past no farther, but returned with his victorious armie, ruining all those which followed D. Pedro de Lara's parties: who with their Queene shut themselves vp in a place neere vnto Palenza, called Mencon, which was the retreat of them that had fled: and so returned into his owne country, with many prisoners, and great spoiles.

6 The Queene being freed from so great a danger, continued her lustfull and vnchast life, with her minion D. Pedro, with as little shame and respect, as shee had bene accustomed; who playing the king, yea the very tyrant, incensed the Nobility in such sort, as many of them conspired to abandon the Queene, and to call vnto the gouernment, D. Alphonso Raymond her sonne, who by hereditarie succession ought to haue succeeded her. The chiefe of these conspirators were D. Gutiere, Fernandes de Castro, and D. Gomes de Moncande, who with their confederates (hoping that the infant D. Alphonso should draw great ayde from his vnkle Pope Calixtus, who then gouerned the Church of Rome) they caused D. Alphonso to come vnto their assembly; and in despite of of the Queene his mother, and her Minion D. Pedro, made him king of Castile and A Leon, in the year 1122. D. Alphonso King of Nauarre hauing reigned in those realms, almost 14. yeares, in continuall troubles and care.

This Pope Calixtus of whom we haue spoken, was before called Guy, brother to Cont Raymond, and Cont William of Bourgogne, who being Archb. of Vienna, had bin aduanced to the see of Rome, after the deace of Gelasius the 2. in the year 1120. in the Abbey of Clugny, where Gelasius died, flying the fury of the Emperor Henry the 5. This Calixtus was to contend against Maurice Archb. of Braga, a Limosin, called Bourdin, who had bene chosen Pope by the Emperours faction, against the election of Gelasius, and caused himselfe to be called Gregory the 8. Hee had bin brought into Spaine by D. Bernard, Archb. and Primate of Toledo, with a great opinion of his holines and wife-dome, and therefore he made him bishop of Coimbra, and afterwards Archb. of Braga: but he sought to make him a bad requital, perswading Pope Pascall, who was Predecessor to Gelasius, to deprive D. Bernard of his dignity, and to choofe him in his place, offering him a good summe of money. The Pope who was exceedingly courteous, took his money, and put him in hope, but he did not any thing. Wherefore there growing great diffention betwixt the Pope and the Emperor Henry, for the nomination of Prelates, Bourdin, who had changed his name, & taken that of Maurice, to his promotion to Braga, ioyned with the Emperor, and ceased not till he was made Pope of Rome, whilst Gelasius liued, who soone after died, leauing this quarrell to bee decided by Calixtus.

Then might you haue seene Christs Vicars command armies, place guards, giue the word, be in battels armed, giue the bodies and goods of miserable Christians in prey, and to countenance the most horrible infolencies which warre could produce. Gregory the 8. going from Sutri, where he had assembled his forces, prest Rome by acts of hostility, spoiling pilgrims which went to get pardons, according to the Romane doctrine. On the other side, Calixtus sending many souldiers out of Bourgogne, vnder the conduct of John de Crema, Cardinall of S. Christogene, he himselfe followed after in person, with other troupes, so as he entered Rome with great effusion of blood, and there suppressed Gregory; where making him a ridiculous spectacle vnto the people, mounted vpon a Camell, with his face backward, holding the tayle in his hand, for a bridle, he put him in perpetuall prison, where hauing renounced his Popedome, he ended his dayes. Thus were Ecclesiasticall charges executed among Christians in those dayes. Pope Calixtus hauing preuailed ouer his aduersarie about the time that D. Alphonso Raymond his nephew was chosen in Castile to raigne in stead of his vnchast mother, it was likely this election should be confirmed and supported by the authority of Rome, against all that should contradict it.

The citate of Portugall was troubled with the like disorder, and D. Alphonso Henriques, and the Portugals were prest with the like difficulties, by the disordered appetites of their Countesse, D. Theresa his mother, who was then enioyed by D. Fernand Pace: against whom D. Alphonso armed, pursuing him as a Tyrant and incestuous adulterer, their armies ioyned neere vnto Guymaranes, where D. Alphonso was vanquished, being too hasty to fight, and would not attend some supplies, which D. Egas Nagues (who had bred him vp, and governed him in his infancie) brought vnto him: by whome he was then sharply blamed for his rashnesse, proceeding from want of experience and heat of youth. Hauing recovered new forces, there was a second bataille fought, whereas D. Alphonso had the better: for D. Fernand was put to route, and himselfe with the Countesse put in a safe prison, from whence D. Fernand was afterwards deliuered at her intreatie, with promise neuer more to stile himselfe Earle of Portugall, but to be a perpetuall subiect and vassall vnto D. Alphonso Henriques, who by this meanes remayned a peaceable Earle in Portugall. These fruites did the two vnchast and incestuous sisters reape, being Daughters to king Alphonso the sixth, and in a manner at the same time.

D. Alphonso the 7. left raigning in Castile, where he had some places at his deuotion, held by a Nauarrois garison: during whose raigned S. Dominike of Calçada in Rioje, who

A who was reputed a Saint: hee was buried in the tombe which hee had made in his life time. He had bene a Monke of the Order of Saint Benedict, at Valbanera, and after in the Monasterie of Saint Aemilian, where they did not much esteeme him: wherefore he gaue himselfe to a solitarie life, and to follow the doctrine of Gregorie bishop of Ostia: for he was a man without any learning. At the place of his Sepulcher, there is at this present a towne built with a Cathedrall church, and Episcopall see, carrying his name, vntil at this present to that of Calaoorra. He was much honoured in his life time, and after his death his memorie was reuerenced: Monkes being then admired, which gaue themselves to a monastick and solitarie life. At that time there was giuen by the king D. Alphonso, to the Monasterie of Saint Mary of Valbanera, the church of Leuador, to that of Saint Saluador of Leyre, halfe the towne of Aralco: in imitation of whome other Noblemen gaue gifts vnto Churches, where they had speciall deuotion, every one choosung for his Patron, Aduocate, and Protector, that Saint of whom the churches and Monasteries were named. This was the ordinarie doctrine of that age to win Paradise.

In the meane time the Bishops intruded themselves into the Councels of Kings, to manage affayres of State, and to maintaine their Ecclesiasticall priuiledges, rights, and reuenues, they led armies, and were many times too forward to fight, as wee reade of D. Pedro of Roda, Bishop of Pampelone, who about the year 1115. meddling with the quarrels of some souldiers in the Towne of Tholoufa, receiued a blow on the head with a stone, whereof he died a Martyr, as the Spaniards say: an aduertisement for the rest to containe themselves in their vocations. D. Mayor Garcia, daughter to the Earle D. Diego Ordognes, and of D. Pyraca Garcia, daughter to the king D. Garcia, gaue vnto the Monasterie of Nagera about that time, certaine possessions which she had in Calaoorra. D. Fortun Velaz a knight, at that time one of the most renowned in the Kingdom of Nauarre, gaue vnto the same Monasterie, the place of Alecon, to furnish lights at the Altar of the Virgin Mary: so great and so constant was the opinion of men in that age, that by gifts vnto the Clergie, they might redeeme their soules from eternall damnation, as they did not spare the principall townes of their Estates: D. Raymond Arnould Earle of Barcelona, at the same time, gaue vnto D. Alderis the Archbishop, the citie it selfe of Tarragone, which the Archbishops did enioy in full proprietie, for the space of foure and thirtie yeares. The foundation of the Hospitall vpon the Pyrene mountains, at the passage of Ronceuaul, seemes to be a godly worke, the which was done by D. Sancho de Rofas Bishop of Pampelone, about the year 1122. but it was onely for Pilgrimes, going out of France to Saint James, wherein King D. Alphonso assisted him with money. This Hospitall was built neare vnto the place which was called Charlemagnes Chappell, a place which was much subiect to winds, and continuall stormes: whereupon it was afterwards built lower in Ronceuaul where it is now.

As soone as D. Alphonso Raymond was crowned King of Castile and Leon, by the meanes and direction of D. Pedro de Trauas, a Nobleman, who was allyed in Cartellogne, to the Earles of Virgel, and had bred and gouerned that Prince, hee beganne to pursue his mother, and D. Pedro de Lara her minion. D. Pyraca fortified her selfe in the tower of Leon, where he beleaged her: but by the mediation of some Noblemen, who were al of the new Kings partie, a peace was made vpon condition, that she should giue ouer all gouernement of affaires, and be content to liue a priuate life, hauing a pension fit for her estate and calling. As for D. Pedro de Lara, after that hee had wandred long vp and downe, in the end he left the countie, and being as coldly entertrayned in Nauarre and Arragon, as in Castile, he made his retreat into Barcelona.

7. D. Alphonso being thus dispossessed, D. Alphonso Raymond carried himselfe for king of Castile and Leon. After which he thought vpon the recouerie of the forts of Castile, which his father-in-law, D. Alphonso King of Nauarre detayned from him, wherefore he rayed a mightie armie to vie it, if he might not recouer that which he pretended without armes: with these forces he marched towards Nauarre and Arragon, which were not vnprovided for the King had also taken armes to crosse him, if he should proue insolent, and was alreadie entred into Castile by Rioje, when as the Prelates of both kingdomes, foreseeing the great miseries which would insue, if these two great Princes should once enter into warre, they laboured to make a peace and to make request vnto the king of Nauarre and Arragon, to restore him his townes and forts; the which was of such force, as without any difficulty, King D. Alphonso being glad that he had taken so modest a course, did louingly restore vnto him all that he held in Castile, retaining only the countrie which is from Villorodo to Calacorra: for D. Alphonso his father-in-law, since the decease of Don Sancho Garcia king of Nauarre, and by the same reason, the Provinces of Guipuscoa and Alana remained to the crown of Nauarre. Thus they layed downe armes of either side, and retired into their countries: Alphonso Raymond King of Castile, seeing himselfe settled in peace, he beganne to make warre against the Moores, his first enterprise was vpon Coria, which towne had beene surprized, during the inter-regne or absence of the king of Nauarre and Arragon after the decease of King D. Alphonso the Braue, his grandfather. This was a worke of few dayes, for he easily recovered it; but not content herewith, hee past on into the few dayes, for he easily recovered it; but not content herewith, hee past on into the countries of Extremadura and Portugal, held by the Moores, the which he wasted, and brought away the spoyle, not any Moore appearing to make head against him. This good successe of his affaires, gaue him courage to greater attempts, and were as a spur to the natural vertue and bonnie wherewith God had endowd him, as much as any Prince of his time: for he was active, hardy and valiant, and withall wife, mild, capable, and very deuout.

In his time flourished the Order of Cisteaux, and the religion of S. Bernard, of the which he was carefull, and a great benefactor, so as they attribute to him the building of most part of the Monasteries of that habit which are in Spaine: and hee was no lesse carefull to repaire the ruines of many townes, and castles, which had beene destroyed by the continuall courses of the Arabians; he built and peopled new, and made many good lawes and ordinances, for the administration of iustice, and gouernement of townes: so as for these excellent vertues he was fauoured of God, beloued and respected of his subiects, and greatly feared of his enemies. It was about his coming to the Crowne, that his vncke Calixtus erected an Episcopall see at Zamora: wherof D. Bernard, Arch-deacon of Toledo was the first Bishop, whereas now the Sepulcher of Bernard, Arch-bishop of Toledo, is worshipped with diuine honours, found as the Histories say by a shepherde, a testimony worthe of the inuention: At the same time (which was about the year 1125) the church of S. James in Galicia was made a Metropolitan, by the same Pope Calixtus, in fauour of his nephew King D. Alphonso, who shewed great deuotion to this Saint, for that he had had his breeding and past most of his youth in Galicia. The first Archb. of that place was Don Diego Gelmirio, above named, borne in the same Diocesse, vnder which Archb. were appointed 12. Bishops, S. F. Ispania, Auila, Plasencia, Lamea, Badajoz, Cite Rodrigo, Coria, Lugo, Astorga, Orense, Mondoñedo and Tuy. Then began the Abbey of S. Dominick of Calçado to increase, the place the which was giuen by Don Alphonso the Warriour, king of Nauarre, the place called

A called Olgabarte, or otherwise Iubarte; with great freedomes and exemptions. This Church was made subiect to the Bishop of Calacorra, and at that time there was an Abbot and Monkes there, whereas since there were Chanons placed, and in the end it was made a Cathedrall church, the which is now a towne seated betwixt Nagera and Villorodo, and in the beginning was but a small borough, called Malburguete, the which is now by corruption called Margubette, and is ioyned to the Cathedrall Church of that place, the which at this present is called the Bourg of Saint Dominick of Calçada.

King D. Alphonso the Warriour had giuen some respite vnto the Moores, vnto the year 1125. when as he led his armie against them of Denia and Valencia, and spoiled the countrie: then passing into Murcia and the marches of Carthagea, hee attempted Alcaras; but could not take it: wherefore pursuing his good fortune, hee ouer-run the territories of Granada, then turning by Cordoua, as he prepared to beleage it, he was diuerted by an armie of Moores Almorauides, to whom hee gaue Battaille and defeated them: Yet he did not thinke it fit to stay then at this seege, but returned laden with spoyle into his countrie, whither he led many Christians Musarabes, retired out of the tyrannie of the Moores, to whom hee gaue dwellings and lands, with exemptions and titles of Nobilitie for them and theirs.

In Portugal, Count D. Alphonso Henriques did in like manner annoy the Moores vpon his frontier, from whence he tooke Leyra, in the year 1127. the which hee gaue to the Monasterie of Saint Croix, in the towne of Coimbra, built by him, as the first fruites of his victories. Hee tooke in like manner the towne of Torre nouas. The contrarie happened in Cattellogne, whereas the Moores (whilest that the king of Nauarre and Arragon did ouer-runne their western countrie) were furiously entred, and committed infinite spoyle, the which might well bee one of the reasons which made the seege of Cordoua to cease, and caused the king of Nauarre and Arragon to retire to come and succor D. Raymond Arnould Earle of Barcelona.

In these warres D. Alphonso king of Nauarre, had great ayde and assistance of many Knights and Noblemen of France, that were neighbours to the Pyrenees, to whom a great part of the victories obtained by him against the Moores are attributed by the testimonie of the Spanish Authors themselves. In this voyage of Cattellogne, hee led with him the infant D. Garcia, sonne and heire to D. Ramir Sanchez, to whom by right of succession the kingdom of Nauarre did belong, for that he was issued from the direct and lawfull line of the king D. Sancho Garcia his grandfather. This young Prince was left by his dying father in the gouernement of D. Sol widow to the infant D. Pedro, daughter to Cid, his Aunt by the mothers side, by whom he was bred up in his youth, in all vertue and religion, and they called him the Lord of Monçon. After this expedition the king peopled the new Bourg of Pampelone, which he had caused to be built neere vnto the old towne, and was called at that time Iruna, that is to say, good towne; hee placed French Inhabitants there, taken out of the Goulers which had followed him in the warres against the Moores, whom he would reward for their good seruices, in lodging them in this new increase, which he had made of the towne of Pampelone, giuing them the priuiledges and exemptions of the towne of Iaca. Some thinke they came from Cahors in Quercy: he also gaue priuiledges to the Inhabitants of Maragon.

During these things, the Countesse of Portugal, who was a prisoner, being too hardly intreated by D. Alphonso Henriques her sonne, had meane to acquit D. Alphonso Raymond king of Castile her nephew, with her afflictions, and to inuigilate him to imbrace her cause, and to free her from that hard prison, wherein shee was detained: in recompence wherof she offered to make him her heire of the Earldome of Portugal. D. Alphonso desirous to ioyne this peece to his demaynes, came in person with a great armie, to deliuer this woman, forgetting that the Earle had assisted him in the warre, which he had against his mother D. Xparrac Queene of Castile and Leon, but hee had a sharpe incounter in the fields of Valdeas, along the banks of the riuer of Limia, where being vanquished by the armie of D. Alphonso Henriques, his cousin, hee slaued himselfe, being hurt in the foot, in the territory of Leon.

Being cured, and hauing rayled another army, he entred againe into Portugal, being desirous to recouer his honour, and to force the Portugals to acknowledge him, and to do him the homage which they ought him, as King of Leon. Being arrived at Guymaranes, where the Earle was, he beleaged it, and did all hee could to take the place: but D. Egas Nunez the Earles Gouernor going forth with a safe-conduct, they so treated, as vpon a promise which Don Egas made vnto the King, that the Earle of Portugall should take an oath of fealtie, as to his Soueraigne, he returned satisfied into his Countrey, without doing any other exploit: but the Earle D. Alphonso Henriques would not performe that which his Gouernor had promised: wherefore D. Egas went to the King being at Toledo, and there presenting himselfe at his secte, with a halter about his necke, he craued pardon, for that which he had promised, and could not performe, which was, that the Earle should do him homage for his Earledome of Portugall, whom the King pardoned, being duly informed that hee had done his best endeavour to effect his promise. These wars (which were the first the Castillians had against the Portugals, written by the Historians of Portugall, wherof notwithstanding others make no mention) past about the year 1127. D. Theresa for that time had no ease, Her sister D. Freda made her residence in Saint *Vincent*s church, being streightly guarded: yet they say, that going one day to Saint *Isidor*s church in Leon, to take the treasure which her father and grandfather had giuen vnto that place, as she was carrying this prey, hauing one foote within, and another without the doore, shee burst in the middle, a wortheie and condigne punishment due for the adulteries which shee had committed, and the murders which ensued not long after, to the preiudice and dishonour of the Kings house, and of all the Christian Estate in Spaine, as also for the cruelledge. Others say, that shee dyed in the Castell of Saldagne, being brought in bed of a child by stealth. So Don Alphonso Raymond remayned destitute and without a mother.

About that time the king of Castile, provoked by the Moores, who were entred into the Territories of Toledo, marched thare into their countrey, and tooke from them by a long and painefull seige, the towne of Calatrava, the which he gaue to the Archbishop of Toledo, being a great fauourer of the Church and Clergie, into the which he put a good garrison, the which some beleue were Templers, who were wonderfully increased, and growne exceeding rich; euen in Spaine. After which D. Alphonso Raymond tooke from the Infidels, Alarcos, Caracuel, Almodouar del campo, and other places, whereof he fortified some, and razed others. At that time there reigned ouer the Moores in Spaine and Affricke, Hali Aben-Tefin, the third Miralmmuin, and last of the Almorauides, vpon whom the King of Castile extended his limits vnto the Mountaines called Sierra Morena, where he fortified Pedroche: then he past into Andalusia with a great army, and layd seige vnto the towne of Iaen, but it was in vaine: for being valiantly defended by the Moores, he was forced to retire, and returned with his army into Castile.

Cattlogue.

This King D. Alphonso had married D. Berenguela, daughter to Don Raymond Ar-nould Earle of Barcelona, who dyed in the year 1131. hauing held the Earledome eight and forty years. A litle before his death, he made himselfe Galle of Saint Iohn of Hierusalem, called the Hospitaliers. The Earledome of Prouence was fallen vnto him in the right of his wife D. Douice, and of other lands in France; whereof shee caused himselfe to be called Marquis: by which Lady he had two sonnes, D. Raymond Berenger, who succeeded him in the principalltie of Cattlogne; and afterward came by marriage to the Crowne of Arragon, and D. Berenger Raymond, who was Earle or Marquis of Prouence, thus ordered by his will. Of D. Douice was also borne D. Berenguela Queene of Castile; and two other daughters, who were married into France. The Earledome of Prouence had beene in question betwixt D. Raymond Arnould, and the Earle of Tholoufa and Saint Giles, but their fore, after many delays, was ended by accord: which was, That the lands of Prouence lying betwixt the riuers of Durance and Ilera, making at this day a part of Dauphine, should belong vnto the Earle of Tholoufa, with the Castell of Beaucaire, the Lands of Argence, Castell of Bolobreg,

A beuge, and the moitie of the citie of Auignon, and of Pont de Sorce, the rest should remaine to the Earle of Barcelona. According vnto this diuision, D. Berenger Raymond did inherit Prouence, and there was added, that if any of the parties dyed without lawfull heires, the other should succede. Among other Articles of D. *Raymond Arnould*s testament, he obtained, that if his heires dyed without lawfull children, his daughter Berenguela, Queene of Castile and Leon, and D. Ximena, wife to Roger Earle of Foix should succede.

Castile.

By this noble and vertuous Queene D. Berenguela, D. Alphonso king of Castile, had foure children: D. Sancho who was king of Castile, hee was bred vp in his youth and gouerned by D. Guiliere Fernandes de Castro. The second, D. Fernand, who did inherit the Realmes of Leon and Galicia: and two daughters, D. Isabella, called by some D. Constance, wife to the French King, Lewis the young, the seuenth of that name, he that did put away Elenor, Countesse of Poitiers, heire of Guienne, daughter to Count Wilham; who after this diuorce married with Henry Duke of Aniou and Normandie: who being heire to the Crowne of England, had long and cruell warres against the French, by reason of this Ladies patrimonie, the which continued about three hundred yeares, vnto King Charles the seuenth. The second daughter which D. Alphonso had by D. Berenguela, was called D. Sancho, or by others D. Beacia, who was Queene of Nauarre, hauing married the king D. Sancho surnamed the Wise, or the Valiant, as others write. These to be seene among the tombes which are in the great Chappell C of the Monasterie of Ogna, an inscription of D. Garcia, who they imagine was sonne to the sayd D. Alphonso, who had a second wife, daughter to Wladislaus Duke of Polonia, called D. Risa, by whom he had one daughter called D. Sancho, who was married to D. Alphonso, the sixt king of Arragon, the second of that name. He had familiar acquaintance with two Gentlewomen, whereof the one, which was called D. Maria, brought him a daughter, called D. Stephana; or Estienne: the other which was called D. Gontrude, bare him D. Ferrac, who was first married to D. Garcia Ramirez King of Nauarre: and for her second husband, she married a wife and valiant Knight, called D. Anuro Rodriguez, without any respect of her degree, falling from a Queene to be the wife of a simple Knight: it may be the Ladies of those times had no such haughtie spirits as they haue at this day, or else could not distinguish betwixt vertue and fortune. D. Stephana her sister was married to another Knight, of the house of Castro, whom they called D. Fernand Rodriguez the Castilian, from whom issued a sonne, called D. Pedro Fernandes de Castro. This was the posteritie of King D. Alphonso of Castile. About the year 1132. he made his eldest sonne D. Sancho a Knight, on Saint Mathias day, vpon the which he also gaue the towne of Vra, to the Monasterie of Saint Dominicke of Silos.

Arragon.

It was about this time that Don Alphonso the Warriour, King of Nauarre, who alwayes called himselfe Emperour of Spaine, had certaine quarrels with them that dwelt on this side the Pyrenees, towards France, in the Duchie of Guienne, the occasion being concealed by the Authors, is not knowne to vs, but that wee may coniecture hee would fauour Don Alphonso Earle of Tholoufa and Saint Giles, from whom William Earle of Poitiers detained his liuing: but whatsoeuer moued him, hee beleaged Bayonne, the which hee tooke with litle danger and difficulty, extending his limits much on that side.

Bayonne taken.

During this seige he made his last will and testament, and as hee was alwaies enuironed with Bishops, who forgot not themselves in such opportunities, being also very deuout, and seasoned with an opinion, that finnes are wiped away, and punishments redeemed by gifts and foundations of rents and reuenues to Churches: Hee gaue vnto the great Church of Pampelona, and to the Monasterie of Leyre, the towne and Castell of Estella, to enioy the moytie thereof, with all the rights, profits, and commodities. To the Monasterie of Saint Mary of Nagera, and of Saint Emilian of Cogolla, he gaue the towne of Nagera and Tubie with the castles. To the Monasterie of Saint Dominicke of Silos, hee gaue the Towne of Sanguessa, together with the castell, and the two boroughs, the old and new. To that of Saint Saluador of Ogna, the towne and territorie of Villorodo. To the Monasteries of Iean de la Pegna, and of Saint A Peter of Cereña, and to the Cathedrall churches of Saint James in Galicia, and of Saint Saviour of Ouido, he gaue many Legacies of great consequence, but the most important was, that which he gaue to the religious of the holy Sepulcher, and to the knights of the Temple, and the hospitaliers of Ierusalem, of both his Realmes of Nauarre, and Arragon, and whatsoever else he should conquer from the Moores, ordaining in particular, that his armes and horse should be sent to the Knights of the Temple.

The King gaue all these prodigious Legacies, vpon a wonderfull superstition, together with a hatred which he bare to them of his blood, finding himselfe old, and without any heires of his bodie: but there were but few put in execution, beeing so prejudicial to the Christians estate in Spaine, and would haue bene the seed of diuision and wars betwixt the Princes: yet his testament was made with all solemnities, and fortified with the paines and threats which were in vse in that age. Beeing returned into his countries, he ordained a seuerall court or iurisdiction for the Inhabitants of Calatayub, granting them many priuiledges and immunities, and ordaining that the reuenues of the Clergie should be hereditarie, to the end that the inhabitants, and such as were borne there, might onely enioy them, as in our time in Castile, those do which are of the Bishopricks of Calaoorra, Calçada, Bourgos, and Plaisance, and in many places of the Bishopricke of Pampelone.

Assembly at Sarragossa.

In the beginning of the yeare 1133. this King and Emperour of Spaine, called an assembly of the Bishops and Noblemen of his country at Sarragossa, to resolve vpon the warre against the Moores. Among those which were there present, they name the infant D. Garcia Ramirez, Lord of Monçon, the right heire of Nauarre: Raynon Earle of Perche, Lord of Tudele, D. Sancho de Rofes, bishop of Pampelone, another D. Sancho Bishop of Calaoorra, D. Garcia Guerra Bishop of Sarragossa, D. Michel of Tarrasone, and D. Arnould of Huefca, with many other great personages, both Clergie and Secular. There they concluded to make warre against the Infidels, enemies to the Christians, vipers of the countrie of Spaine; and withall, order was giuen for all things necessarie for so great an enterprise: Lewies of souldiers were made, and Commisaries sent out for victuals, carriages, boates and other things necessarie for the conduct of munition, victuals, instruments and engines of batterie, with great prouision of arms, and all that was needfull for so great an army.

Expedition
against the Moore's con-
stante.

The King D. Alphonso the warrior hauing resolved to root out the Moores, hee began on this side Ebro to assaile them of Lerida and Fraga, from whence hee tooke the towne of Mequinença by composition, being at that time exceeding strong, and valiantly defended by the Moores: from thence he came before Fraga, a towne well fortified, and strong by nature, seated vpon the riuer of Cinca, the which he began to presse about August, and there made a long and fruitlesse stay: so as winter approaching, hee was forced to raise his siege, hauing an intent to returne in the Spring, the which hee did in Februarie, 1134. If the place were strong before, the Moores had so fortified it during the winter, as they had made it impregnable: when as they retired, the beseged taking courage, as wel by the retreat of the Christians, as by some succors which they had from about Lerida, they went to field, and charged the reuerard of the Nauarrois army, whom they forced to turne head, and to fight with all his forces. There was the king D. Alphonso vanquished, the which was strange, and of hard digestion to him, who hauing bene accustomed to beate his enemies, euer since he commaunded an armie. Wherefore he retired wonderfully perplexed, hauing lost that day many Christians, and among others many valiant Knights, and great personages of his Realmes of Nauarre and Arragon.

The Moores growne proud with this victorie, and that they had chased the king out of their limits, entred into his countrie, putting all to fire and sword, which they could not carrie away with them, and came as farre as Monçon: wherewith the king being incensed, he thrust himselfe into a calamitie vnworthie of so great and will a Captaine as he had alwaies shewed himselfe. But we strue in vaine against the wife of heauen, and worldly man doth in vaine call backe good fortune, which hath once turned her face from

A from him, for his finnes, which hee doth not vouchsafe to acknowledge. His troups being disperfed, and euery one retired to his house, after this route he called those that were nearest vnto him; and attending a conuenient number to attend his person, hee went in all hast, beeing old and broken, with foure hundred horse to pursue these Moores, who carried away a great prey, and an infinit number of Christians prisoners, hauing ouertaken them neere vnto their fort of Fraga, hee found his owne error, and would gladly haue retired, but it was too late; for the Moores descouering the small number which pursued them, turned head, and hauing stretched forth their bands, they encountered the King and his whole troupe, and put them in a manner all to the sword, where amongst the rest the King was slaine. This happened in September, in the yeere 1134. Such was the end of King D. Alphonso the warrior, a very worthy and a fortunat Prince, if home-bred calamities, the hatred of his owne blood, and his ouer great superstition, had not vndermined and weakened the vigour of his spirit, the which was much decayed in his latter daies. They say his body was taken vp and buried in the Monastery of Iesus of Nazareth in Montarragon: yet many hold that it was not found, beeing (it may bee) scattered in this defeat from his company, and so swallowed vp in some bogge or riuer, or lost by some other accident, as hath happened to other Princes, in the like encounters. The brute was among the common people, that he was escaped in the charge, and that seeing himselfe twice vanquished, whereto he had not bene accustomed, he was so grieved as he durst not shew himselfe to his subiects any more, but went to Ierusalem, from whence he neuer returned. He had reigned about thirty yeeres. At his decease, the Estates of Nauarre and Arragon were much perplexed, both for that their King had left no heire of his body, as also for the desperate will which he had made. These difficulties were augmented by the factions of the Nobility, who could not agree vpon the election of a new King.

9. Whilest they contended among themselves, D. Alphonso Raymond King of Castile, being aduertised of the decease of his father in law, by the aduice and perswasion of his counsell, hee reuiued his pretensions to the Estates of Nauarre and Arragon, as great grand-child to D. Sancho the great, who was King of Nauarre and Earle of Arragon: wherupon hee seized vpon the Lands of the riuer of Oija, of Villorodo, Granon, Nagera, Logroño, Arnedo, Biquerra, and many other places vnto Calaoorra, which were thence cut off from the body of Nauarre: so as the iurisdiction of that Kingdome was then lymited towards Castile, by the riuer of Ebro. D. Alphonso continuing his conquests, whilest that no man made head against him, hauing attempted the towne of Victoria in vaine, he ouer-ranne the countrie of Alaua, and tooke the towne of Maragon and other forts: striking such a terror into the Nauarrois and Aragonois, as if they had not feared to loose their exemptions and priuiledges, and to bee ill intreated by King D. Alphonso, they would haue willingly yielded all vnto him.

Nauarre by the King of
Castile.

Amongst the chiefe which did counsell and accompany the King in this spoile, were the Bishops, D. Bernard of Siguença, D. Sancho of Nagera, & D. Bertrand of Olina; and of Noblemen D. Lope, and D. Sancho Diaz, D. Garcia Fortuñones, D. Rodrigo Gonzalez, the Earles D. Pedro Lopez, D. Gomez Nugnes, D. Gutierre Peres de Lores, Diego Nugnes, Garcia Garces, Almerigo standard bearer to the King, D. Lopes Lord Steward of the Kings houle, Melendo Bofino, Ordago Peres, Rodrigo Gonzalez of Olea, Gutierre Fernandez, Rodrigo Fernandez, and Rodrigo Nugnes de Guzman. King D. Alphonso spoyling all along the riuer of Oija, beeing admonished not to forget to make expiation for his excesses, he gaue many goodly things to the Monastery of Saint Emilian, the which are found written and receiued by Berenger Arch-deacon of Toledo. Beeing afterwards entred in Arragon, hee committed the like spoiles as in Nauarre. The Nauarrois and Aragonois seeing themselves prest by the King of Castile, they made hast to prevent these mischiefs, whereto they were subiect for want of a head: wherefore beeing assembled at a place called Borja, a towne belonging to D. Pedro de Alariz, a knight of the blood royall, who some thinke was sonne to D. Garcia, the sonne of D. Sancho, standard to D. Ramir first King of Arragon, and of D. Theresia Casal his wife, a great number mongst his children, making them Kings, being ill aduised by bad counsel: to D. Sancho A the eldest he gave Castille and Toledo; and to D. Fernand Leon and Galicia. To D. Sancho hee extended the ancient limits of Castille towards Leon, vnto the towne of Sahagun, by Moral de la Roine, Tordehumes Vregna and Caullas. To the second he assigned the Lands of Leon and Galicia, with that part of the Asturias, which lies from the riuer of Oua vnto Galicia.

These seeds of warre and discord, were laied by the bad counsel of the Earles D. Almeric de Lara, otherwife called Manrique, sonne to D. Pedro de Lara, and D. Fernand of Translamar, great Noblemen, who thought to maintaine the greatnesse and reputation of their houses the better, by these parrages, and from the troubles which might ensue, then if there were but one Monarke in Spaine, an ordinary practise in great Christian Estates: this done D. Alphonso returned into Arragon.

Nauarre.

D. Garcia Ramirez King of Nauarre, seeing the successe of the King of Castille, in the countries of Nauarre and Arragon, doubting hee should not be able to resist the great power of this new Emperor D. Alphonso, especially if hee made himselfe maister of D. Ramirs Kingdome, as hee was very likely, hee resolved to purchase a peace and his friendship, by some submission vnto him for his realme of Nauarre. D. Alphonso then being returned into Arragon, after the ceremonies of his coronation, these two Princes had an interview at Pradilla, with great shewes of loue, where their accord and league was confirmed.

Arragon.

King D. Ramir, who could not obtaine his realme of Arragon, pretended to recouer that of Nauarre from D. Garcia Ramirez, saying, that it belonged vnto him, as being brother, and lawfull successor to the deceased King D. Alphonso the warrior; notwithstanding that D. Garcia had more interest then hee, or his Predecessors Kings of Arragon, being sonne to the Infant D. Ramir Sanchez, and grand-child to the King D. Sancho Garcia, sline by his brother D. Raymond through desire of raigne, after which Paricide, the Nauarrois called in D. Sancho of Arragon, father to the Kings D. Pedro, D. Alphonso, and of this Monke, to raigne ouer them, by reason of the minority of the children of their deceased King, and with the forces of Arragon to repulse the murderer D. Raymond, and his faction: and to keepe him from raigning in Nauarre: yet D. Garcia Ramirez had a better title to Arragon, then D. Alphonso Raymond King of Castille, for that he was descended from the King D. Garcia Sanchez, the eldest sonne of D. Sancho the great, but where force raignes, right must giue place. Notwithstanding all these reasons, D. Ferrer Ramir would make warre in Nauarre, and being in armes, hee forced D. Garcia to arme also, who to auoide the danger which did threaten him, if D. Ramir should make an agreement with the King of Castille, hee made hast to doe the homage, whereof wee haue spoken, but it continued not long: for soone after the Kingdome of Nauarre recouered the ancient and hereditary souerainety. D. Ramir, who kept at Monclus in the mountains of Sobrarbe, staid not long to submit himselfe also to the King of Castille, and to doe him homage for his realme of Arragon: wherefore D. Alphonso restored him all his lands except Sarraçossá, and some other places, which he kept, to make vse of them against the Moores.

In the meane time there were cruell warres vpon the frontiers of Nauarre and Arragon: but the Prelats desirous to see this warre ended, laboured to reconcile the two Kings. D. Sancho de Roça, bishop of Pampelone, an Arragonois borne, deli so in this treaty of peace, as hee gaue the King D. Garcia occasion to suspect him to be false vnto him, for the which he chased him out of his countries, wherevpon he was taxed of two great feuerity; and for that he had bandaged himselfe against a prelat, he was in a manner compared to D. Pedro d'Albares, who by reason of his sterne and fower disposition had bene reiected from the royall dignity, so dangerous it was to touch these sacred persons, were they good or bad.

The Prelats who had vnderaken to make this appointment, neuer ceased vntil they had brought it vnto these termes, that they should choose fixe knights: three of either realme, by whose iudgement all quarrells should bee ended: for Nauarre were chosen Ladron de Guenars, William Aznars of Oxeysa, and Ximen Aznars of Torres for Arragon

A Arragon they did choose D. Pedro d'Albares, D. Casal, and D. Ferris of Huesca. These six being assembled at Vadoluengo; after many counceils and conferences, in the end they concluded that either party should lay downe armes, and the two Kings should continue good friends; and for an order betwixt them, they assigned vnto D. Garcia Ramirez, the superiority ouer the Nobility, who should haue the conduct of armies as General of both realmes: and that D. Ramir should haue commandment ouer the rest of the people, and administer iustice, the which should take place in regard of their persons onely, and during their liues: with which sentence the Kings were not well contented. Yet D. Ramir being willing to satisfie D. Garcia, came to Pampelone, where hee was receiued with great honour procuring at his first coming the restitution of D. Sancho the Bishop, whom hee restored into fauour with the King D. Garcia. There they consulted for the setting downe of certaine and apparent limits, betwixt the two realmes of Nauarre and Arragon. The feperation was drawne by a direct line, from Saint Eneclia, to Bisfal, the valley of Roncall remaying to Arragon. Then passing the riuer of Sarazas, vnto the place whereas it falls into that of Yda, and to Pont Saint Martin, and from thence to the place whereas as Yda falls into the riuer of Arragon, and that of Arragon into Arga, and that of Arga into Ebro, and along Ebro, into Tudela.

This diuision being made, it seemed there should not remaine any cause of hatred betwixt these two Kings; and that D. Garcia Ramirez, should reuerence D. Ramirs, as his father; and D. Ramir embrace D. Garcia as his sonne, to whom moreover hee granted, during his life out of his portion, Valtierra. Quadria, and that which lies betwixt Roncal, and Bisfal, the which he should hold in fee of the crowne of Arragon, to bee reuinted againe after his death. Yet D. Garcia was not satisfied with this accord, perswading himselfe still, that D. Ramir ought not to raigne in Arragon, for that hee had bene a professed Monke, and had taken all orders: so as vpon the pursute which he made to bee freed from the homage which hee had done vnto D. Ramir, for those places aboue mentioned, he attempted to stay him in Pampelone, giuing the charge thereof to some of his followers, but they could not put it in execution; for the King of Arragon was aduertised by a Knight, called Enigo d'Ayuar; so as hauing conferred with D. Pedro d'Albares, and other knights of Arragon, he went out of the towne vnknewe, with foure more with him, posting away with all speed vntill he came to Saint Sauior of Leyre, where hee staid three daies for his traine, who came vnto him, according to his directions, and from thence he retired in safety to Huesca. So it happened to the King D. Sancho Ramirez, as to his great Grand father D. Garcia Sanchez, when as he would haue taken King Fernand the first King of Castille, his younger brother, prisoner, in the towne of Nagera.

Herevpon D. Ramir began to leauy men for the future warre of Nauarre, whereof the King D. Garcia was assured, and therefore hee made many provisions for his defence and safety: the best and most worthy to bee imitated, was, that hee made choise of twelue of the chiefeft families of his country, whom hee bound vnto him by honours and preferments, making them as it were heads of all the rest of the Nobility and gentry of Nauarre. Which were the houses of Gutuara, Almoraut, Bagan, Aybar, Leet, Subica, Rada, Bidaure, Montarot, Vrox, Calcant and Maulcon. He made one Cominander ouer these noble houses, which should bee respected if them next to the Kings person: this was D. Ladron of Guenara, to whom hee gaue the title of Earle, and was the first which called himselfe Earle of Nauarre: this hee did, for that there were some gentlement of his country beganne to abandon him; to follow the partie of Arragon, retyring to D. Ramir, who entertained them; and assigned them lands in Arragon. Of which number was D. Casal, a man of great quality in those daies, hauing lands in both realmes, so as hee quit them in Nauarre to serue the King of Arragon, but as hee carriod himselfe verie passionately in these quarrells, hee fell soone after into a great danger; for being sent by D. Ramir, to the Emperour D. Alphonso of Castille, to confirme a peace with him, that he might wish more liberty attend the affaires of Nauarre, as hee

Dexterity of
D. Alphonso
King of La-Bills.

All matters betwixt the Kings of Castile and Arragon were reconciled, and there was an interview of these two Princes at Alagon, whereas D. Ramir did acknowledge to hold his Realme in fee, and did homage to D. Alphonso, which submission continued some yeares. Such was the dexteritye of the King of Castile, having reduced these two Kings vnder his Soueraignty, and as it were feudatories of his Empire, that although they had a great desire to inuade one another, yet he kept them from all open hostility, as well by his authoritie, as by other meanes: sometimes selfraying them by promises, sometimes by threats, presuming, that if they continued in that estate, he should haue them more at his commandement, then if one increasing with the ruine of another, he would grow so great, as he might rebell, and deny him the homage which he had sworn.

King D. Ramir presently after he had left the Monasterie, married (with a dispensation from the Pope, for that he had sung Masse) to a French Ladie, called D. Agnes or Agnes, daughter to William Earle of Poitiers, and Duke of Guienne, who dyed in the 6th year 1136. going in pilgrimage to Saint James, for elshe his syster, as some hold, by whom he had the Infante D. Petronilla, who was afterwards married to the Earle of Barcelona: he did not long enjoy his wife, after whose death, desiring to quit the affaires of the world, he sent his only daughter to D. Alphonso King of Castile, to be bred up in his Court with the Queene D. Bernaguela: notwithstanding that the Noblemen of Arragon, brought her backe againe, saying, that shee did not find her selfe well in Castile.

Castile. About that time there was a knight retired into Arragon, called D. William Raymond of Moncada, Senechal of Catalogne, who had fled for certaine outrages which he had committed. By him there was a treaty of marriage begun, betwixt the Infanta D. Petronilla, heire of Arragon, and D. Raymond Berenger, Earle of Barcelona her Lord, the which was afterwards accomplished, and in recompence of so great a service, the Senechal obtained his pardon, and his dignity, which was to be chiefe and captain of the horsemen. It is not certaine when this marriage was effected, but it is probable, that it was neere the end of King D. Ramir, for that the Infanta Petronilla, was only two or three yeeres old, when as the King left the government of the Realme, to returne to his religious order, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1137. three yeeres after his election and promotion to the crowne, at which time the authors write that this marriage was concluded by words, De futuro: the conditions amongst others, were. That the Earle should not take upon him the title of King, but should only call himselfe Prince of Arragon, and Earle of Barcelona, but that the children which should descend of this marriage, should be called Kings of Arragon. That the Earle should carry in chief, the first and most ancient armes of Arragon. That was a crosse argente in a field azure, in all actions of warre, but hee might carry whole of Barcelona in his shield and ensignes, having foure bends gueules, or aske or yet the ensigne beares should bee of Arragon; that the Aragonois should take the deuise of Saint George.

Conditions of the treaty.

This treaty being made and concluded in Barbastro, by the King, being afflicted by the Noblemen of Arragon, and the Earle of Barcelona, he was received in quality of Regent of the Realme of Arragon, with the which Carlelogne remained vnder a hundred and three yeeres, after that Arragon was made a realme, and two hundred fifty and three yeeres after that there had been hereditary Earles in Carlelogne. This done, King D. Ramis giving ouer all administration and government, as in a Treaty

A estate and habit, hee had alwaies carried a Monkes heart, hee retired into a Monastery which hee had built, in the Parish of Saint Peter the olde at Huefca, there to spend the remainder of his daies religiously, with the Chaplins.

Cruelty of the King D. Ramir.

This Prince is taxed of cowardice and great cruelty, being transported with continual jealousies, his deeds do witness it, for that by the council of the Abbot of Saint Ponce of Tordesillas Languedoc he cut off the heads of Lope Ferencio, Rodrigo Ximenes, Pedra Martines, and Fernand Gonsalves, all of the house of Lara: Federic Liliane, Pedra Vera, Giles Airoff, Pedro Garcia, Garcia Pigna, Raymond de Foffey, Pedro Lucilla, Michel Alario and Sancho Foppeane, all noble men of great houses; only upon a conceit that hee was contained by them. This execution was done at Huelva. They with the Emperour D. Alphonso of Castille, whom hee found alwaies fauourable, by the mediation of the Queene D. Berenguela his sister, so as being provoked by the Earle, and no lesse by his owne ambition, he led an army against D. Sancho Ramir, whom hee found well attended to make head against him betwix Cortes and Gallur, where it pleased God to slay these armies from fighting, by the means of some good

Notwithstanding Count Raymond (desirous to imbarke the Emperor D. Alphonso's brother in law in this warre) came vnto him to Carrion, where hee renewed the oath of fealty doing him homage for the country of Aragon; where he did infinituate so well into his fauour, as hee got out of his hands the townes of Sarragoffe, Tarassone, Calatayub and Daroca, which were held by the Castilians. Afterwards D. Raymond Berengery returned againe to D. Alphonso's court at Carrion, whereas the conditions and Articles were concluded and set downe, concerning the warre which they should make in common, against D. Garcia King of Nauarre.

D Amongst the which they diuided the Beares skinne before hee was taken, agreeing that of all the country of Nauarre which they should conquer, the Emperour D. Alphons should haue a third part, and the other two should belee vnto D. Raymond, Prince of Arragon, vpon condition to hold them in fee of the realme of Castille. At this treaty there were present the Bishops D. Berenger of Salamanca, and D. Pedro of Burgos, with other Noblemen both Clergy and Secular. From Carrion they went to Soria, where after they had held a councell of prophane things, they had a great care of religion, that is to say, of the temporall reuenues of the Church, whereafter the King and Queene did giue vnto the Monastery of Saint Mary of Valbanera, a house in Canegofa, with certaine immunities, to the end that if any thing were attempted vniufully, to the ruine of another, this sinne might by that meanes be purged.

Peace between Navarre and Castille.

The army of Castille being ready to march, the Emperour D. Alphonso past vnto the frontier of Nauarre, by the riuer of Ebro, marching along the which, hee came to Calaoarra, where hee was met by D. Sancho Bishop of Calaoarra, D. Stephen Prior of Saint Mary the royall of Nagera, D. Michel Bishop of Tarassone, with the Earle D. Ladron of Gueuara, and others; who employed themselves happily to appeale the ambition of this Prince, and to conuert the warre into a good peace, the which was concluded by an interview of the two Kings of Castille and Nauarre, betwixt Calaoarra and Alfaro: to confirme the which, there was a marriage concluded betwixt the Infant D. Sancho, the eldest sonne of Castille, and D. Blanche, daughter to D. Garcia King of Nauarre, in the yeere of our Lord 1140. and promises made by words, de futuro, by reason of the tender age of the Infanta, who was deliuered vnto D. Alphonso her father in law, to be bred vp in Castille, vntill shee were capable for the consummation of the marriage.

D. Alphonso Henriques the first King of Portugal.

Perinatal

THe affaires of Portugal during these actions aboue mentioned, remaine obscure, by the error and negligence of authors; for there is no memory found of the deeds of D. Alphonsus Henriques, since the conquest of Leyra, and of Torrenewnas, which was in D. Alphonsus our Lord 1127. vnto the yeere 1139. when hee kept the riuert of Tayo, and led an army against a King of the Moores, called Ismael or Ismael. In this voyage died D. Egom Nunes who had bene Gouvernor to the Earle in his youth, and his faithfull counsellor; hee was inierred at the Monastery of Sonfa, neere vnto the towne of Porto. Hee had founded, according to the opinion of some, the Monastery of Saint Martin of Cucuyas, in the country of Saint Mary. Ismael came out of this country, against D. Alphonsus Henriques, being accompanied by foure other pettie Kings: Moores: the two armies were in view one of an other, in the fields of Obique; the Earles was about Castrowerde, which at that time was called Cabeças de Key, that is to say, heads of Kings; and as the Chriftians were much inferiour to the Infidels in number; so their opinions were diuers, most inclining to a retreat without fighting; but the Earle who was of a Noble courage, and generous resolution, perswaded his people with such forcible reasons, as they resolved to all hazards, and for a chappie prelage of a future victory, the souldiars turning themselves to God, were moued to salute their Earle, with a royal name and title, crying all with one voice, Portugal, Portugal, for the King D. Alphonsus Henriques.

Being thus incouraged, and all in good order, they charged the Moores: squadrons, and made a horrible slaughter of them, for as having put them all to flight, they remained Masters of the field; they tooke five royal Standards of the Moores, and all their baggage.

The Portugals celebrate this memorable victory, called of Obrique, vnto this day: the honour whereof is due to them which dwelld betwixt Tayo and Duero, and betwixt Duero and Minio, for the Inhabitants beyond Tayo were at that time subiect to the Moores, who held also a great part of the country on this side. After this battail D. Alphonso Henriques tooke vpon him the title of King of Portugal, and left by succession to his descendants this title obtained by a military prerogative, before the battaile. Then beganne the armes of that royall house, this King taking (in memorie of so great a victory which God had giuen him) five little shields Azure, representing the Standards of the fowle fucckings which he had vanquished in a great scutchon argent, placing the fmall scutchons like a crosse, through deuotion, in signe of our Sauours five wounds vpon the crosse, adding moreouer to euerie one of them five deniers argent, which make in all 25. the which with the five scutchons made the number of thirty representing in some sort the thirty pence which Iudas receiued to betray his Master, our Lord and Sauour Iesus Christ (it is the allegory and spiritual interpretation of the armes of Portugal) to the which was since added a border gules charged with castles, or, in the time of D. Saens the second of that name King of Portugal, for some causes which we will hereafter specifie. After the defeat of these five Arabian Kings, who you must vnderstand were vassals to Alborsli, Aben-Tefsi, the great Miralmonum of Affrike King D. Alphonso returned with his victorious and rich Caimbra, bringing the chief city of his Estate.

In this happy success of his affairs, D. Thereſa's mother, being a prisoner, fought to croſs him, treating with D. Alphonſo King or Emperor of Caſtile, for her delivry and reſtitution : and moreover by her inſtruments ſhe made great complaints at Rome, to Pope Innocent the third, accusing her ſon of cruelty and impiety : ſo as the Pope ſent the Biſhop of Coimbra into Portugal, being then at Rome, with charge to enſlave the King by the Apoſtolike authority, and in his name to ſet of Portugall: against her son*

A feritie Countesse at liberty: which the sonne refusing to obey, the Bishop did interdict the city of Coimبرا, and returned to Rome, stealing away secretly in the morning, without the Kings priuie, wherewith being incensed, hee would haue forced the Chapter to proceed to the Election of a new Bishop, wherein hee was not obeyed, so as hee committed many outrages; whereupon the Pope sent a Cardinall Legat vnto him, to correct him, but hee lost his time; for the Countesse continued still in prison, being very expedient and necessary for the good and quiet of the country. For this the Cardinal did interdict all Portugal, and then tooke his way towards Rome: but hee was pursued by the King, who did greatly feare these interdictions: and hauing overtaken him betwixt Coimبرا and Vera, hee sent vnto the Comanderie of Poyares, hee forced him to disanul this interdiction, and moreouer to grant him whatsoeuer hee desired, partly by force and threats, and partly by persuasions.

Whilest hee was in this debate with the Church, Jsmel or Jsmal who had bene vanquished, came upon the towne of Leyra, belonging to the Monkes of Saint Croix of Coimbra (the which for that it was ill garded by a Knight called Pagã Guttieres, who was there in garriſon for the Pior) fell againe into the Moores power; whereout the Abboteeing aduertised, leaving his frocke and monkes weed, he went to horse-backed with a good troupe of soldiars, where hauing spoiled the Moores country, hee seized vpon Ranches: ſoone after King D. Alphonſo Henriques came and laied siege to Leyra; and tooke it, ſince which time hee depriued the Monkes of the Temporality of this place and of Ranche alſo, leaving them only the profits of the ſpirituality.

The warre betwixt Nauaurie and Arragon was hot at this time: but D. Raymond Nauaurie, Prince of Arragon found himselfe troubled, not only against the Moores, which were neighbors to Arragon and Cattelago, from whom hee tooke Chalamera and Alcala, vpon the riuers of Cinca, in the yeere 1143. but also against some knights of Province, which were enemies to D. Berenguer Ramon his brother, hauing leized vpon some places, and bene the cause of great troubles, so as hee was forced to goe himselfe in person: wherefore his country was much anoyed by the Nauaurios, who finding all

Dallured towards Catillde, did wharthey lited : yet at her retidre nee naa toome intal revenge and took the for of Sos. The peace betwixt the Catillans and Nauarre being seiled and entertained , it was againe fortified by the marriage of the King D. Garcia
Ramirez with D. Yraca, balfard daughter to the Empeour D. Alphonso, by whom hee had the Infanta D. Santha about mentioned : and wee must not doubt but that which forme haue left written of elius Kings third marriage with the daughter of D. Lope Dias de Haro, is a mere fiction . It is likely the towne of Hato was built at that time, whereof the Lords of Bificay , and there successors, carried the name, from whence are defended many worthy knights, and great personages in Catille and Leon. The realme of Nauarre at that time had larger bounds then it had since, hauing no means to augment them vpon the Moores, for that the realmes of Arragon and Catillie lay betwixt both; so as the Arragonois, Catillans and Cattelans were to make warre againgt them, as frontering vpon Valencia, and other their lands and Siegneuries . Yet the Kings of Nauar, which haue bin since, were so far from extending of their limytis;
as they haue beene often restrained by the violence and too great power of the Kings of Catille.

About the yeere 1146. D. Alphonso Emperour of Spaine refolued to make warre with all violence against the Moores of Andalusia, by reason of the feditions and reuols which were in Affrike, against the Almorauides, whose History it is needfull to relate.

16. Abolali, Aben-Tefin (whom some will haue to bee Auicenne the great Philosopher, whose works were read, but without any ground) raising one of the Moores of Affrike and Spaine, the third King or Miralummin of the race of the Almorauides, Moore of Affrike, called Aben-Thumert, very learned in Astrology, told a certaine young-man called Adelmon, that he found by the starres, he should get the crowne of the Arabians: and therefore hee aduised him to meete with these heavenly influences.

and to prepare himselfe to receiue this great good which they had promised him. A

This man although hee were of a base and vile condition, whose father got his living by making of pots, and other earthen vessel, yet hee was neither faint-hearted, nor without ambition, wherefore hee gaue such credit to that which the Astrologer had deliuered vnto him, as leauing his house and trade, hee acquainted himselfe with a certaine religious Moore, a Doctor in the law of Mahumet, and withall eloquent in the Arabian tongue, and therefore much esteemed amongst all the Affrican Moores, to whom hee imparted the prognostication of Aben Thumert, intreating him to counsell him, and to assist him in a matter of so great importance, assuring him that if hee attained to that which hee aspired, hee would make him the chiefe man amongst the Arabians, next vnto himselfe.

of Affrike.

This Doctor who was called Almohadi, tickled with the hope of greatnesse, could finde no better, nor more expedient meanes, then to bring in new sects, and to make some change in religion, knowing that nothing doth more alter and transport the hearts of men, then perauersion of religion: wherefore he employed his knowledge and eloquence to interpret Mahumets Alcaron, after a strange maner, and neuer heard of among the Arabians, nor any other nations that were his sectaries: fitting it so well to the humors and dispositions of the people, as in a short time hee was followed by the greatest part of the Affrican Moores, a nation easily misled with superstition: so as it before they tooke Almohadi for a holy man, now they held him for a Prophet, sent vndoubtedly from God. Hee seeing this businesse succeed so well as hee was wellcome throughout all Affrike, and admired of all men, hee beganne to put forth this youngman Abdelmon, giuing the people to vnderstand, that hee was of the true and lawfull royall race of their great Prophet Mahumet, and that hee was a man sent of God, endowed with such vertue, as hee should subiect all the world to the Law of Mahumet; that those great matters had bene diuinely fore-told him, and signified by the starres and heavenly motions: so as by his perswasions his fictions were received and beleued of all men. And proceeding farther, he presumed to speake something against King Alboali, and the present Estate and Gouvernement of the Almorauides, and so by little and little to taxe him openly, declaring with great assurance, that Alboali was a tyrant, whose race had by force and violence expelled out of the royall throne of the Arabians in Affrike the lawfull Princes descended from Aben-Alabey, and that the will of God, reuealed and knowne vnto him by many signes from heauen, was that Abdelmon should bee advanced and chosen for King: hee who was sent of God, and descended from the royall blood of their great Prophet Mahumet. This Impostor did so preach vnto them, concurring with the diuell to bewitch these credulous men, giuen to the damnable art of dyuining, as many Noblemen and Knights, with an infinit number of the Affrican people, desirous of Innovations, according to the mutinous nature of that nation, tooke armes against King Alboali, being accompanied, assisted and counselled by Abdelmon, Aben-Thumert and Almohadi. Whereof the King aduertised, meaning to suppress these great alterations, heerayed his forces, and had diuers encounters against this new sect, which carried the name of Almohades, by reason of their Preacher Almohadi.

Auicenna and other learned Arabians.

Wee haue sayd that some were of opinion, that the King Albo-Ali Aben Tefin, was hee whom we call Auicenna or Auicenni, saying that the goodly works which are amongst vs at this daie, were compiled and written by his commandement, by the foure and twenty great Philosophers, and published vnder the name of Auicenna. For my part I rather beleue them which haue written that Auicenna or Auicenna, called also Albo-Hali, was an excellent man, learned in Philoſophy and Physicke, as his rare works written in the Arabike tongue doe witnesse, being translated since into Latin, who liued in those daies at Cordoua in Spaine, where it seemes the Moores had alwaies entertained an vniuersity of all sorts of sciences, with a great concourse of learned men of their nation; the which had bene alwaies well furnished, the Affricans being people giuen to contemplation, and of a subill spirit: wherefore they haue made Astrology famous, and advanced a sect of Physicke diuerſe from that

A. that of the Grecians, giuen wonderfully to diuination and coniuring, very superstitious in matters of religion; and reasonably eloquent either in verse or prose. Aben-Roh whom we call Auerrois liued and frequented with him, a great Commentator of Aristotle, who through enuy poisoned Auicenna, who finding it before it had wrought his full effect, caused the poisoner to be slain, as Mesua and Zoar report: for hee was a man of great authority, and of a Princes house.

B. Then also liued Aben-Zoar, and other great and learned Arabians, which haue written many goodly works in their owne language, in naturall Philoſophy, Metaphisicke, Physicke and Astrologie, whereof part haue bene preferred and kept vnto our daies, and some lost. If these were Moores borne in Spaine, it redoundes to the honour of the countrie: but it is doubtfull whether they came out of Affrike.

The Moores Estate being thus troubled in Affrike, it moued the Christian Princes to make some gallant attempt vpon them of Spaine: wherefore the Emperour D. Alphonso beganne in the yeere of our Lord 1146. to raise a great army of his subiects of Castille, Toledo, Leon and other countie, and to make the Christians armes of greater force, hee laboured to make a peace betwixt the King of Nauarre, and D. Raymond Prince of Arragon, for the effecting whereof hee called them to Saint Stephano de Gormas, whither beeing come, hee could not obtaine any thing of them, but a truce for some few daies: where notwithstanding they treated of the warre against the Moores, in the which these two Princes ayded the Emperour: the King of Nauarre by land, and the Earle of Barcelona by sea, who hauing armed some ships, and giuen the charge thereof to D. Galeran great Admiral of Cattelogne, and to the Earle of Vrgel, hee caused them to ioyne with the Geneuois, who either for pay, or voluntarily in hope of some gaine, came to this warre, and there did great seruice. The land army was great and well furnished with good and valiant Knights, the Emperour D. Alphonso, and the King D. Garcia Ramirez beeing there in person, their entrie into Andalusia was so fearefull, as approaching and comming neere vnto Cordoua, with a shew to besiege it, that great and well peopled citie, which had bene the Queene of Spaine for so many yeares, was yeeled vnto him by the Gouvernour Aben-Gami, who presented him the keyes with great humilitie, not attending either assault or batterie: into the which the Christian Princes entred in armes, but very peaceably, in the yeare 1147. Yet the Spaniards write, that for that the towne was of too great a guard, and wonderfully peopled, it was left in fee to Aben-Gami himselfe, who did homage to the King of Castile, the which is very doubtfull, considering the importance of the place, and the consequence thereof. We may beleue that the Emperour assured himselfe after another manner, and with better caution then the faith of this Moore, who (they say) sware vpon their Alchoran, to bee his faithfull vassall: from thence the armie marched towards Baeça, the which beeing

E. inuested, they had newes that the Moores came to succour it: wherefore the Emperour going to meet them, he fought with them, and had the victorie, and afterwards tooke the towne by composition; where leauing a sufficient garrison to assure the countrey behind his armie, he marched on to Almerie, a towne vpon the Mediterranean sea, which at this day belongs to Granado, much frequented of Merchants of diuers nations. There he found the sea armie of Count Raymond, and the galleys of Genoua, which had already attempted it, vnder the command of Ansaldo Doria, Bersi Torre, and other captaines of that common-weale. This place was so furiously battered both by sea and land, as it was taken by force: yet the Moores being retired into a part of the citie of good strength, they were taken to ranſome, from whom they drew great ſums of money.

F. They say, that at this prize, that great and inestimable Emerald without peere, was taken, the which is at this day at Genoua, and was giuen vnto them for their part of the bootie, and in recompence of the great seruice they had done there. Yet many beleue, that the Geneuois brought it out of Palestina, from the towne of Cesarea, at which seege they were employed. The spoyle & sacke of this place was diuided betwixt the the Castillans, Nauarrois, Geneuois, and the subiects of the Earle D. Raymond. This is all which was done in that voyage, from whence eury one retired into his country rich, soine by land, some by sea. The King Don Garcia Ramirez accompanied his father-in-law into Castile, where he remayned, with great tranquillitie and content, the rest of that yeare.

Councell at Rheims.

If the Christian affaires in Spaine succeeded well against the Moores, those in Syria declined much: whereupon a Councell was held at Rheims, vnder Pope Eugenius the 3. to resolue vpon some meanes, to support the estate of the Kings of Ierusalem, by some ayde from the Princes of Europe. Thither went D. Raymond, Archbishop of Toledo, as Primate of Spaine: who passing by Saint Denis in France, obserued in a chappell an Inscription of this tenour: Here lies Saint Eugenius the Martyr, the first Archbishop of Toledo.

Being returned, he reported vnto the Church what he had found, whereof the Emperor Don Alphonso, and the Kings children were aduertised, who together with all the people were exceeding glad: for since the death of this holy man, they could not learne where his body lay. Being thus found, they of Toledo procured meanes to haue one of his armes, from King Lewis the young. It was a remarkable act of Religion in the Archbishop Don Raymond in his voyage to Rheims: In our time King Philippe obeyed from Charles the ninth, the French King, and from Charles Cardinal of Loraine, and Abbot of Saint Denis, therest of the bodie (as they say) of this Martyr, the which was brought to his Church of Toledo, where he had gouerned, Domitian beeing then Emperour at Rome: for they did not know him much in France, neither did it serue to any purpose, amidst the ciuill, or rather vnciuill warres, growne for matter of Religion.

Arragon and Barcelona.

D. Raymond Berenger beeing returned into Cattelogne, hauing the Geneuois army ready, and at his commandement, he employed it against the towne of Tortose which was held by the Moores, the which he beseged both by sea and land: at which sege the Earle left D. William Raymond of Moncada, Seneshall of Cattelogne, for his Lieutenant general, whilst that he made a voyage to Barcelona, to pacifie some seditions which were risen in that citie. Such was the diligence of the Seneshall and Geneuois, as by the 30. day of the sege, after many sharpe assaults giuen and valiantly defended, the towne was taken, and soone after D. Pedro de Semenate arriuing with fresh supplies, the castell was also taken: the Geneuois had their part of the spoyle, for the good seruices they had done vnto the Earle. And the Authours of the Arragon Historie write, that a third part of the towne was giuen in fee to the Seneshall D. William Raymond of Moncada, and another third part to the common-weale of Genoua, which portion was afterwards redeemed by the Earle D. Raymond Berenger, for 16000. Maraudis Marroquins, a kind of money which was then currant, leauing vnto the Geneuois the Iland of Saint Laurence, and granting vnto all the Inhabitants of the city of Genoua, and of the iurisdiction (the which was limited by Porto Venero towards the East, and by Monaco, vpon the West, along the sea shore) exemption of all Imposts and customes, Henrico Guercio, Marin Moro, William Lusio, and others, beeing then Gouvernours of the Common weale.

At Arragon, Navarre, Castile, and Aragon.

Whilst the Earle was busie at this warre, the King of Nauarre brake the truce made at Saint Estienne de Gormas: for that the King Don Garcia hauing caused the Emperour Don Alphonso, and other Noblemen and Prelates, to perswade and aduise the Earle, to relinquish the pretensions, which hee vaunted to haue to the Realme of Nauarre, hee would not do it, but threatened to pursue it, when opportunitie serued: wherefore the Nauarrois did ouer-runne the Countrey of Arragon, and tooke the Towns of Thaulte and Fayos, where they put good Garrisons, to serue as a frontier against the Arragonois.

Portugal.

It is no wonder, if in all these attempts of the Christian Princes in Spaine; against the Moores, the new King of Portugal did not ioyne with the rest: for that hee was in disgrace and out of fauour with the Emperour D. Alphonso, who held him as an intruder of the Estate of D. Therese his mother: and moreover, of the title of a king, in a

Province

A Province which was subiect to the Soueraignie of Leon. King D. Alphonso Henriquez hauing liued now 53. yeares without a wife, he married in the yeare 1146. D. Malfada Manrique de Lara, daughter to the Earle D. Manrique, Lord of Molina, a great Nobleman of Castile, by whom he had one sonne named D. Sanchez, who succeeded him in the Realme of Portugal, and the Infanta D. Ferraz, who was married first to D. Fernand the 2. of that name, King of Leon and Gallicia, and from them issued D. Alphonso king of the same Realmes, father to the king D. Fernand the 3. of Castile and Leon: a marriage notwithstanding which was broken, by reason of their proximitie of blood, and for that they were married without a dispensation. King D. Alphonso Henriquez had another daughter by D. Malfada, called D. Therese, married to Philip Earle of Flanders, the first of that name, and one called Malfada, as the mother. Besides these lawfull children, the King of Portugal had one bastard before he was married, whom they called D. Pedro Alphonso of Portugal. Soone after his marriage, beeing importuned by the continuall complaints of his subiects, for the spoyle which the Moores of Saint Iren committed in his countrey, he resolved to beseege that place, but he preuailed more by policie, then happily he should haue done by open force: for marching thither in the night, after that he had made a vow (passing by that place where as now stands the royal monasterie of Alcousas) to build a Monasterie there if his enterprife succeeded well: it fell out according to his desire, for he put his men secretly into the towne, beeing ill guarded, without discouerie, and tooke it in the yeare 1147. on Saint Michaels day, putting all that resisted to the sword, and taking many prisoners: Beeing returned to Coimbra, and hauing giuen thanks vnto God for the fauour which he had done him, he performed his vow, and built the Monasterie of Alcousas, where he placed Monks of the Order of Cisterciens, for the loue of Saint Bernard, who liued in those times. After this conquest, seeing that the Miralumin of Affricke and Spaine, was much troubled to defend himselfe against the faction of the Almohades, he followed his good fortune, and tooke from the Moores the castell of Mastra, where he placed D. Fernand of Montez for Gouvernor, who in succession of time was great Master of the Order of Aviz, of the profession of S. Benedict, which had its beginning during the life of this king of Portugal. Hee tooke also from them the castell of Sintra, and from thence came to lay sege to Lisbon, where he was assisted by many knights of France, England, and Flanders, which came by sea, and landed at Calcais, then came they & camped where as the Monasterie of S. Francis was since built, the Kings armie beeing lodged where as Saint Vincent now stands: which places were then without the circuit of the city walls. The citie was so prest by these forces, as after many dangerous assaults, it was taken, the Christians entering by the port of Alfama, the 25. of October 1147. the sege hauing continued fve whole moneths. Many Knights and other strangers, which were come to this warre, desirous to employ themselves continually against the Infidels, enemies of our faith, vowed neither to returne into their countries, but to remaine in Portugal, who by the kings permission inhabited there, and peopled Almada, Villeuerda, Arruda, E. Zambrja, Castalgrera, Lourinhã, Ville franche, and other places. This citie of Lisbon, which since hath bene the chiefe of Portugal, and the ornament of Spaine, was purged by the bishops from the impieties of Mahomet, and their great Mosque made a Cathedrall church, where as one Gilbert a stranger, but of a holy life, was made bishop: and the king caused the Monasterie of S. Vincent to be built in the same place where he had camped. By means of this important conquest, the king took also from the Moores, Alanguer, Obidos, Torresvedras, and many other places, so as he disposed them in this warre, of all the countrey which is called Extremadura, and passing Tayo, he extended his limits, conquering Acaçar de Sal, Ebora, Yelbes, Moura, Serpa, & vnto Veja, where he put the Moores which defended it to the sword, for that during this sege, other Moores hauing taken the towne of Troncofo, had vnpeopled it, and chased away all the Christians that were within it.

was called by some, Valiant. Hee had some knowledge of learning, honored learned A men, and was studious of the Scriptures, as the wife was in those times, and shewed him- selfe a great Iusticer: for all which vertues he was much esteemed by other Princes, and was honoured, feared, and loved of his Subjects. The armies of the league made at Tu- dele, beganne to annoy him at his first entrance, and did him some harme vpon his frontiers, yet he did not looke any place of importance: for although hee were young, yet he was of an active spirit, and a noble courage, and was well and faithfully assisted by his allies, and served by the Nauarros. The warre was hottest in the valley of Roncalli, but there is no mention, that either in that yeare, or in the others follow- ing, there was any memorable exploit done, and they hold that Lewis the French king, who had beene a great friend to Don Garcia his deceased father, did wonderfully crosse the enterprises of the League, and hindered them all he could, beinge either vpon his treatie of marriage, or else newly married to Dona Isabella Infanta of Castile, in fauour of which, allyance the Emperour D. Alphons did desist from that warre, or did neglect it, and Don Sancho his sonne, King of Castile, (who had his choice to marrie D. Blanche, or to leaue her) married her, and had a sonne by her at the end of the yeare called D. Alphons, who was king of Castile and Toledo, after the father. Some hold that the marriage of king Lewis with D. Isabella, was after all this, in the yeare 1154, and that the King of Nauarre came to Burgos, to the celebration thereof, the which was admired by the French, for the exceeding pompe.

The Countrie of Nagera was then one of the chief gouernments of Castile, for the Gouernour thereof was Captaine generall of the frontier towards Nauarre. The Infant Don Sancho who was called king of Castile, did enioy those lands, and had a Lieu- tenant called Roderigo Pelaez, a wise Knight. About that time died D. Roderigo Gomez, sonne to Don Gomez of Candespina, one of the greatest Noblemen in Castile, whose Tombe is yet to be seene in the Cloyster of Saint Saujour of Ogna: and the towne of Surita was peopled with Christians Musarabes, which came out of Calatayub, Sarragossa, and other parts of Arragon.

The Earle Don Raymond Berenger sought all meanes possible to seize vpon Na- uarre, so desirous he was to ioyne it vnto Arragon: importuning the Emperour Don Alphons continually, to declare himselfe an open enemy to D. Sancho, so as in the yeare 1156, there was a new League made betwixt them, to vndertake this warre where among other Articles, for the better fortifying of their friendship, there was a future marriage concluded betwixt Don Raymond, the young Infant of Arragon, who was afterwards called Don Alphons, and D. Santa daughter to the Emperour Don Alphons, by his second wife. Dona Rica, daughter to Radislaws king of Pologne, whom he had married in the yeare, 1151. yet they could neuer perswade the Emperour Don Alphons to hurt the king of Nauarre, whom he loued: but rather assisted him vnder- hand. The same League was renewed at Toledo, in the yeare 1157. after Don Raymond returne out of Prouence. The occasion of which voyage was to defend his Nephew, heire to his Brother Don Berenger Raymond, who (being in a manner dispossest of his Estate by the enemies of their houle, which had slaine his father in an encounter) had need of his ayde. Hee repulsed the young Earles enemies, assured his Estates, and brought him into Cattelogne, there to bee brought vp. And for that in those troubles of Prouence, the Knights and Commanders of Saint John of Hierusalem, (who were growne mercenary in these Christian warres) did intermeddle, hee gaue them large reuenues in Cattelogne. After the renewing of this League, we find no mention of any worthe act done by this earle, but that hee debauched some faithlesse and treche- rous Knights, which fled out of Nauarre and Arragon: yea one of the greatest called Garcia Almoraut, who came vnto him to Lerida, and there made himselfe his vassall, and receiued from the Earle the title of Lord of Roncevaux, Virros, and Obanos, which were not in his power: wherefore it is to be presumed, that from that time hee sought to gouerne his Estates peaceably, seeing he could not get the Crowne of Na- uarre: and with this desire he ended his dayes, after all his vaine attempts against this Kingdome. Soone after this last assembly at Toledo, the king of Castile was engaged in

A warre against the Moores of Andalusia, which made him perchanee neglect that of Na- uarre, besides he did not greatly affect it.

19 The troubles of Affricke beinge past, as we haue sayd, Abdelmon established Mi- raslumin of the Arabians, and the Almohades in credit by the ruine of the Almorau- ides. The Preacher Almohadi would also haue the Moores of Spaine submit them- selves to this yoke: wherefore leauing Aben Thumert the Astrologian at Maroc, hee past with Abdelmon into Spaine, with great numbers of souldiers, beinge putt vp with pride by their late victorie against their enemies. They found no great resistance there: for the pettie Kings and Gouernors of Prouinces and townes in Spaine, beinge prest by the Christians, and too weake to make head against them, seeing the race of the

B Almorauides of Affricke extinct, from whom they might haue expected some succors, they fought nothing more then support, to maintaine themselves in their authoritie, and greatnesse, which is most commonly the chief god of great men of this world, and therefore as men which regarded not Religion, but for a colour, and for their owne priuate commodities: so as leauing the interpretation of the Alcoran, they embraced the new doctrine of Almohadi, without any opposition, thinking to preferre them- selves by that meanes. And as this Impostor did vomit forth greater blasphemies and impieties, then his Predecessors had done against the true Religion, they became violent and furious persecutors of the Christians: so as the poore Musarabes, who had had some peace of conscience, liuing among the Moores, and had there exercised their reli- gion, without any violence done vnto them for many yeares, were in great perplexi- ty, beinge now persecuted by these new Sectaries of Almohadi, both in their persons and goods, with all kind of rigour: for that they would not yeeld to their superstitions: so as either by the reuolts, or by death, or by the continual flying away of these poore people, all the townes of Spaine which were held by the Moores, were vnpeopled of Christians, who for about 400. yeares had preferred themselves, inuoking (though with little knowledge) the name of Iesus Christ. The gouernement of the Almohades in Spaine, continued in Abdelmon and his successors 52. yeares, vntill that notable bat- tle in the fields of Tholoufa, called by another name of the mountaines of Muradal, or

C of Vbeda. Abdelmon hauing aspired to that which he pretended, held his royall seate in the citie of Maroc, and shewed himselfe a profitable Prince, and pleasing to the Moores, notwithstanding that he was a Potters sonne, and for his chief Councillors, the Astrologian Aben Thumert, and the Preacher Almohadi, who dying within few months after this conquest, was by the commandement of King Abdelmon, buried with pompe and royall honours in a sumptuous Tombe, neare vnto the citie of Maroc, whereas since the foolish multitude, holding him to be some great Prophet, and a messenger of God, made prayers and vowes in all their necessities: as amongst the Christians they had recourse vpon all occasions, to the sepulchers (either true or fained) of Apostles, holy Confessors and Martyrs of the name of Iesus Christ, this passage of the Almoha- des, bred a great alteration in Spaine, whereas many Moores which held their coun- ties in fee and homage of Christian Princes reuolted.

E The Emperour D. Alphons led first an armie of Christians against this new Estate, in the yeare 1157, beinge accompanied by his two sons, D. Sancho, and D. Fernand, who had the titles of Kings in Andalusia he recovered the towne of Baeca, which had bene lost, and tooke Quesada and Ardujar. But he did not long enioy this victorie with his subiects, for bringinge backe his armie towards Toledo, hee fell suddenly sicke, the which (as he past the mountaine or streight of Muradal) did so increase, as hee was forced to light at a place called Fresnedas, where he dyed in the armes of D. John Arch- bishop of Toledo, and of his sonne D. Fernand: D. Sancho remayning behind to guard those places which he had newly conquered. Hee was a worthe Prince, but too ambi- tious, a great fauourer and benefactor of the Clergie, a friend to the people, and a se- vere punisher of the insolencies of great men: of whom the Spaniards write this His- tory. That a certaine Gentleman called D. Fernand in Galicia, hauing taken away a poore labourers goods, for which wrong he could haue no iustice from the ordinarie Magistrate of the countrey, so as he came to the Emperour beinge at Toledo, where hauing watched his oportunitie, he cast himselfe at his feet, making knowne vnto him the violence which had beene done him by D. Fernand, and demanded iustice: The Emperour did not disdain this poore man, but being duly informed of the fact, he sent vnto the Gouvernour, and Meyor Maior of Galicia, commanding them to cause restitution to be made presently vnto the Labourer, of all that he should find had bene taken from him, but the Gentleman would not obey any command, neither durst the Iudge force him, either fearing to displease him, or else wanting meanes to constrain him: whereof the Emperour being aduertised, hee parted from Toledo, to come into Galicia, where having made diligent inquirie of D. Fernand's fact, and of his disobedience and contumacie, he caused his house to be enuironed, where being taken, he commanded he should be hanged before his owne gate; for a warning to others to liue vnder rightly and in peace with their neighbors, & not to contemne Iustice nor their Prince, a noble act and worthe imitation. He had reigned king and emperor 35. yeares: His bodie was carried to Toledo, and interred in the royall chappell of that Church. His Estates were diuided after his death, as hath bene sayd, betwixt his two sons D. Sancho and D. Fernand.

D. Sancho the sixth King of Castile.

Castile and Leon diuided. 20 THe Realmes of Castile & Toledo, were then dis-united from Leon and Galicia, in the yeare 1157. D. Sancho being aduertised of his fathers death, he parted suddenly from Baeca, and came to Toledo to his funerall. A Prince who did nothing degenerate from the virtues of his Ancestors, yea did rather exceed them, but he reigned little.

D. Fernand, the 28. King of Leon.

Leon. 21 His brother D. Fernand, neither attending his comming, nor the performance of his funerals, departed presently, and went to take possession of his Kingdomes of Leon and Galicia, according to the fathers will, which diuision was a great cause of ciuill warres, to the preiudice and dishonour of the Christians name in Spaine: wherefore great Monarkes should be warned by these examples, (which are ordinarie in Histories) neuer to dismember their Monarchies, but to employ all their spirits and wits, to continue it still vnited, although they leaue many children, leauing the Soueraigne authoritie ouer the rest, vnto him whom the lawes and customes do call.

Nauarre. D. Fernand being received and settled in his Realmes of Leon and Galicia, hee began to intreate his Nobilitie ill, & among others he dispossest one of the chiefe knights of Leon called D. Pedro Ponce de Minerva, of his lands and goods, who for this cause came into Castile, to beseech the King D. Sancho, to mediate his restitution, and to bring him againe into fauour with the king his brother. But it falling out at that time, that Don Sancho the wise king of Naurre, being aduertised of the death of the Emperour D. Alphonso, had made certaine roades into Castile almost vnto Burgos, so that D. Sancho had alwaies signed the Leagues which the Earle of Barcelona had made against his father and him, with the Emperour D. Alphonso: and moreover, detrayed from him Nagera, and the lands vpon the riuier of Oja, this knight was entertained by the king of Castile, who employed him in this warre of Naurre, and made him head of an armie, which he sent vnto the frontiers, by the riuers of Oja, which hauing incountered that of Naurre neere to Bagnares, they came to battaile in the fields of Valpierre, neere to S. Asensio. In the Naurrois Armie D. Lope Dias de Haro, Earle of Biscay, led the foreward: Count Ladron of Gueuara had charge of the rereward, with the Earle D. Sancho of Larinacar, Inigo Ramirez d' Aizor, with other, and the king the battaile. On the other side, the Earle D. Pedro Ponce had ordered his men as well, and were more in number: wherefore comming to fight, although in the beginning the Naurrois seemed to haue the better, yet were they defeated, and forced to saue themselves in the next sorts,

The

A The king D. Sancho had this route for that he was too hasty to fight and would not attend the succours of horse and foote, which came out of France; which being arrived, and desirous to wipe out this blemish and infamie; they charged the Castilians, which gaue them battaile againe in the same fields of Valpierre, and defeated them.

These things are written in some Histories, but not allowed nor credited by other Spanish Authors: for that they insert some things which haue small probability, and others that are meer fictions: Whereas they say, that Don Pedro Ponce de Minerva, vsed a strange liberalitie to prisoners, both Naurrois and French, setting them all free without any ranfome, which is not probable: and they also affirme, that D. Sancho king of Naurre dyed in the first battaile, the which is reprooued by other Authors, and by the letters and titles which are yet extant, witnessing that he liued about 37. yeares after: by these reasons, whatsoever is written of these two victories may iustly bee suspected.

That which is written of the Earle Don Raymond Berenger, Prince and Gouvernour of Aragon, is more authentick: that burning with desire to haue the Realme of Naurre, he did sollicite D. Sancho King of Castile to declare himselfe with him, and that they two ioyning their forces together, should set vpon the King of Naurre: and that in the yeare 1158. D. Raymond came againe into Castile, accompanied with a great number of Prelates and Knights, to renew their League, yet without any effect for Castile, for this assembly and interview past not without great contention, for that Don Raymond Berenger refused to do homage vnto the King of Castile, for the townes of Saragossa and Calarajub: but in the end he was forced to acknowledge himselfe his vassall in that regard, with a bond to come to Court, and to assist at the coronation of the Kings of Castile, to carrie the royall sword before them at those ceremonies: As for the Earle D. Pedro Ponce de Minerva, and other Noblemen which were in the like perplexitie, the best Spanish Authors say, that the king D. Sancho tooke the paines to geue himselfe in person with them into Leon, to reconcile them to the King D. Fernand his brother, who came in a peacefull manner, to meete him as farre as Sahagun, receiued him honorably, with great shewes of loue, and restored these Noblemen to their goods and honours; yea he augmented them by his bountie, in fauour of the King D. Sancho, to whom he carried so great honour and respect, as he offered to acknowledge to hold of him (as his vassall) his Realmes of Leon and Galicia; the which D. Sancho would not accept, saying, God forbid, that the son of so great a Prince as the Emperour Don Alphonso was, should euer acknowledge to hold his land of any. In the end after great teists and ioy, these two Kings parted good friends.

The king D. Sancho being returned to Toledo, hee had newes that the Moores were gone to field, & came with a great power to beseege Calatrava, a fort of great importance vpon the frontier, the which did then belong vnto the knights of the temple; who amazed at the brute of this seege, did so distrust their owne strength to defend it, as they deliuered it into the kings hands, to the end he should send Capraines and souldiers to resist the Moores. The king hauing receiued it into his protection, and meaning to prouide for it, he found himselfe much troubled: for there was not any one that presented himselfe to take this charge, but they all drew backe and excused themselves, fearing the great power which was laid the Moores had. In the end God inspired the hearts of two religious men of the Order of Cisteraux, who offered vnto the king, that if he pleased him to giue them that place in gard, they would defend it like honest men. One of these religious men was Friar Raymond, Abbot of the Monasterie of S. Mary de Ilistero, vpon the riuier of Pisuerga, in the Diocesse of Palence, nor of Hilero in Naurre, which was not then built: the other was one of his Monkes, called Diego Velasco, who had carried arms long before he became a religious man of that Order. The offer was presented vnto the King, but more to D. John Archbishop of Toledo, for that the lands of this Diocesse should be first annoyed by the entry of the Moores to Calatrava: wherefore this Prelate by preaching and publike exhortations, began to commend this Abbot D. Raymond, and to encourage all men to assist him, so as in a short time hee was followed by a great number of Nobilitie and other souldiers, some thrust on to winne honour, some moued with zeale to defend the Christian Religion against the inuasion of Infidels, and some with shame. The king, the Archbishop, the Nobilitie of his Court, and the Inhabitants of Toledo, eury one for his part, furnished money, armes, horses, corne, and other necessities for a towne which attends a seerge; and all with such willingness and bounty, as the Abbot might well put himselfe into Calatraua, being assured not to be taken for want of men, victuals, and munition of warre: but before hee dislodged, the king to encourage him to do his duty, and to recompence the good which he had shewne, to employ himselfe for the defence of the countrie, moued also with some Religion, gaue vnto God, to the Virgin Mary his mother, to the congregation of Cisteaux, to the Abbot D. Raymond, and to his Monkes, both present and to come, the towne of Calatraua with all the confines, hilles, land, waters, meadowes, pastures, entries and issues, rights, names and actions belonging thereunto, whereof he caused letters patentes to be drawne in the year, 1158. signed by his Secretarie Martin Pelaez: in the which are named as witnesses, Don Sancho king of Nauarre, vassall to the king of Castile, Don lean Archbishop Primate of Spaine, Don Raymond Bishop of Palence and others.

Calatraua given to the Monkes of Cisteaux.

The Abbot hauing this prouision, he set forward, and came to Calatraua, a place of great importance, as we haue sayd, and the onely rampar for the Christians on that side against the Moores: who either aduertised of this great preparation to defend that place, or for some other lets, did no great exploit worthie the great brute which had runne of their armie, neither came they to beseege Calatraua, whereof the King was exceeding glad, and the Abbot with his Monkes no lesse, who by their courageous resolution had gotten this towne, the which the Templers had bately abandoned. Many Gentlemen which had followed the Abbot in this voyage, seeing him in such reputation left the world, and made themselves Monkes of Cisteaux, yet with a decent habit, fit for the exercise of armes, the which they meant to follow against the Infidels Moores, enemies to the Christian Religion.

Knights of Calatraua first instituted.

Death of Don Sancho the Desired.

This was the beginning of the Knights of Calatraua, an Order which was famous in Spaine. The Abbot Don Raymond being freed from feare of seerge, leaving a good garrison in Calatraua, he returned to Toledo, and from thence past to his Monastery of Hitero: about the which he gathered together a great multitude of people, to the number of twenty thousand, as the Histories report, whome with their mooueable goods and cattell, hee transported to Calatraua, and other places of the frontier, which was badly peopled, making it as it were a strong bastion against the enterprises of the Arabians. The king Don Sancho the desired, liued not long after, but dyed the same year. They write, that his wife D. Blanche being deceased some few dayes before in child-bed, hee was so oppressed with griefe, as he fell sicke and dyed. His death was very preiudiciall to the Realme of Castile, and followed by many miseries, the which he did well fore-see. He left the gouernement of his sonne Don Alphonso, who was yet very young, to a knight whose name was Don Gutierre Fernand Ruiz de Castro, ordaining that hee should bee bred vp vnder his discipline, vntill hee came to the age of fiftene years complete: willing that the Knights which held any places and garrisons, should keepe them vntill that time. They surnamed him the Desired, by reason of the great vertues wherewith hee was adorned, and the hope and taste the people had of his good and iust gouernement, in one year, or thereabouts, that hee reigned. Hee was buried at Toledo in the Cathedrall church, nere to the Emperour Don Alphonso his father. The Queene Dona Blanche his wife lyes in the Monasterie of Saint Mary the royall of Nagera, to the which a little before her death shee had giuen the towne of Nectares, nere vnto Torrezillas de los Cameros.

Araxes and Barcelon.

The Earle Don Raymond Berenger Gouernour of Arragon, hauing in the meane time made warre against Don Sancho King of Nauarre, with his forces of Arragon and Cattelogne, being not able to ingage the King of Castile, and taken Buereta, with some other pettie forts of small importance, seeing in the end that hee strived in vaine against an enemy which had not onely means to defend himselfe, but also on the contrarie, to offend him: hee yielded himselfe tractable to the perswasions of

A of certain good Prelates, who were much grieved to see Christians seeke the ruine one of another, for their ambition: wherefore in the year 1159. after many treaties of Peace, betwixt these two Princes, in the end there was an interview, and they remained good friends, making an end of all their quarrels, which had continued almost five and twentie years.

Peace betwixt
Arragon.

We must not wonder, if Secular Princes were in combustion, seeking to rule one ouer another, hauing (it may be) some plausible pretext, seeing that the Prelates of Spaine were a president for them without any reason. The Primacie which see of Toledo held ouer other Bishops, was not acknowledged of all: for the Archbishop of Braga, and he of Saint James refused to obey him.

B but the Primate of Primates, Adrian the third, sending Cardinall Hyacinth his Legat from Rome, forced them by a sentence.

the fourth of that name.

HE death of the King D. Sancho confirmed his surname of, desired, for that there followed dangerous combustions, begunne betwixt two great families of Castile, through jealousy and desire of rule. The young Kings person (being then but foure yeeres old) was under the charge of D. Lourenço Fernandis Ruiz de Castro, according unto the will of the deceased King his father, who had also ordained that the captaynes and Gouvernors of Prouinces and places should continue in their charge; 2.

charges, vntill that his sonne D. Alphonso should bee fifteene yeeres old compleate. A those of the house of Lara, being men of great account, were discontented with this deceit, of which family the chiefe was the Earle D. Manrique de Lara, who had two brethren, D. Aluaro, and D. Nugno, all sonnes to D. Pedro de Lara (of whom wee haue made mention) and of D. Aba, forsaken by the Earle D. Garcia de Cabra with these mothers ioynd, by reason of consanguinity, D. Garcia d'Acia, their brother by the mothers side, sonne to that Lady D. Aba, and the Earle D. Garcia de Cabra, her first husband: they were greued to see the Kings person, and the chiefe affaires of the Realme in the hands of them of Castro, who held many places, and good gouernments in Castille and Toledo: wherefore they sought all occasions to seize vpon the authority, and to dispossesse their aduersaries: D. Gutierre Fernandes, was an ancient Knight, B wise, faithfull, and without any malice, who gaue no man occasion to complaine, but great meanes to such: as enuied his honour to hurt him by his sincerity. Hee had also bene Gouernor to the King D. Sancho his father in his youth, and was so worthy a knight, as they say hee had made and armed fise hundred Knights, with his owne hand. Onely hee wanted the happinesse to haue children: but his brother D. Ruy Fernandes, called the Bald, had foure. D. Fernand, D. Aluar, D. Pedro and D. Gutierre, surnamed Ruy, and one daughter, called D. Sancha Ruy, married to D. Aluaro Ruy de Gosman.

Indiscretion of
D. Gutierre Fernandes.

These factions declaring themselves, every one stood vpon his gard: and for that it was not easie to dissolve that which D. Sancho had decreed by his testament, nor to wrest the authority from them of Castro by force, being in possession: the brothers of C Lara found meanes to circumuent the good knight D. Gutierre Fernandes, by goodly persuasions, saying, that for the good of the general peace, he should bee content with those honours hee had, and suffer the Earle D. Manrique to keepe the Kings person:
the which should in no sort blemish his authority, but should giue great reputation to vnto the Earle, who was a noble man of that quality, as hee well decreed it: all the four brothers promising and swearing vnto him, that they would alwaies preferre and defend the honour and authority which was due to his reuerent age. D. Gutierre deceiued with these good words, deliuered the King into the hands of these foure brethren, who remained with D. Garcia d'Acia, as the eldest, the rest hauing at that time no meanes to contradict it, but soone after they had an opportunity to get the King D into some termes and difficulty, touching the entertainment of the young Kings house, into some termes and difficulty, touching the entertainment of the young Kings house, and the necessary prouisions of money for his Estate with the brothers of Lara, they wrought in such manner as hee resigned this burthenome charge vnto them, the which they willingly accepted, as a thing which they had long affected; wherein the Earle D. Garcia, did some what wrong his honour and faile of his dutie, as well as D.
Gutierre Fernandes de Castro had done; so the King came into the power of D. Man- riques de Lara.

These alterations, vsuall for the dignity of the young King, discontented D. Gutierre, E and withall, those of Lara beganne to faile in that which they had promised him; wherefore he let them vnderstand that he would haue the King D. Alphonso againe, to nourish and breed him vp according to the disposition of the King D. Sancho: willing that they mocked him, as a man which had lost his senses. Wherevpon these two brothers went to armes, and drew vnto them their kinsmen, friends, and partisans, gi-uing way and meanes to all the lewd people of the country to commit a thousand iniuries, following the one or the other faction, as it is vsuall in such wars.

And moreover they made a passage for D. Fernand King of Leon, to enter into the territories of Castille, where hee committed great exccesse vnder pretext to pacifie the warres betwix these two houses of Castro and Lara: for being entred with an army, he seized vpon those forts, which were nearest vnto his frontiers of Leon, along the ri-uer of Duero, and passing on further, hee caused the Earle D. Manrique and his be-thren to dislodge, who carried the King D. Alphonso with them to Soria: Dining these tumults D. Gutierre Fernandes de Castro died, and was buried in the Monastery of Saint

The general History of Spaine.

A Saint Christopher of Encas: after whole decease the Earle D. Manriques caused his Nephewes D. Fernand, D. Aluaro, D. Pedro and D. Gutierre Ruy to be summoned to deliver vp into his hands the places belonging vnto the crowne, the which they held, and had commanded vnto their vncles death: but they made answere that they were not bound to deliuer them vp, seeing that the will of the deceased King was, that they should hold them vntill the King D. Alphonso were full fifteene yeeres old. There vpon D. Manrique commanded that the body of D. Gutierre Fernandes should bee vn-terred, and charging him with felony and treason against the King and crowne, hee sought to haue him found guilty.

B His foure Nephewes embraced the cause, and defended both themselves and their deceased vncle, saying that they neither had, nor did commit any felony, in retaying of those places, seeing it was according to the last will and testament of the King D.
Sancho, the which they had neuer demanded of their vnclerlyuing. The Lords of the councell, who were Iudges in this cause, gaue sentence that there was not any felony committed, and therefore they ordained, that the body of D. Gutierre, which had bene against the law of Nations inhumainely pulled out of his graue, should be laied in againe. Their contentions were so great, and the miseries which ensued so infinit, as press by necessity, they were forced to ingage all the reuenues of Castille and Toledo, for twelue yeeres, vnto King Fernand; and in the end the Earle D. Manriques bound himselfe to deliuer vnto the King of Leon, the person of young D. Alphonso, his Lord,

C and to make him his vassal. And to performe his promise, he led the King D. Fernand to Soria, where hauing propounded certaine reasons, in an assembly of the Noblemen of Castille, to perswade them that it was expedient the Kings person should bee put into his vnclerly custody, they deliuered him vnto him, protesting that they put him into his hands, being a free Prince, and therefore they intreated him to maintaine him in his liberty. The Noblemen durst not herein contradict the King D. Fernand, being within the country and in armes. The young Infant being carried in a gentlemen armes, beganne to weepe and cry out, wherefore they carried him backe to the lodging to giue him an aple, or some such like thing to please him. At that time there was present D. Pedro Nugnes Almexir, a hardy and generous knight, who being gree-ued at this trecherous act of the Earle D. Manrique, gaue order (that whilst they dand-led the child, to still him) they should bring him a good horse behind the Kings lodging, then approaching neere vnto the young Prince, making shew to flatter him, hee tooke him in his armes, and slipping away by some secret passage well knowne to him, he carried him to his horse, and so fled with him to the towne of Saint Estienne of Gormas: doing this act for the liberty of his King with such dexterity and diligence (whilst that the King D. Fernand attended the Infants returne) as he was gon a good way before it was discouered.

This being knowne by the King D. Fernand hee grew into a great rage, and vsing threats, he commanded D. Manrique and the rest of his faction, to giue order, that the child might bee found out and brought againe, where soeuer he were: wherevpon the Earle D. Manrique, and his brethren, vnder colour of seeking their King D. Alphonso, had meanes to get out of Soria, where all was in Combustion. Being arrived at Saint Estienne de Gormas, that night they seized againe of the Kings person: notwithstanding whether remorse of so foule an act, altered the mindes of these knights of Lara, or that all the brethren were not like affected, as D. Manrique: D. Nugno the youngest of the brethren tooke King D. Alphonso, and carried him to Atienza, not respecting the accord made with the King D. Fernand, who holding himselfe deceiued by D. Manrique, sent him word by a knight, that hee was a traitor, and that he would bee reuenged. The Earle made no other answer, but that it was lawfull for him to doe any thing to deliuer F his King and natural Prince from captivity. Afterwards the Earle meeting with the King D. Fernand, who accused him of treachery, and demanded Iustice of the Estates of Castille, he answered againe, that he knew not that he was a traitor, but that hee repent him not to haue done his best endeavor, to deliuer his King, a child of so tender age from such vniuall slavery.

Lopez Diaz*, who was afterwards the ninth Lord of Biscay, the third of that name. It is that D. Lopez which was at the siege of Surita, with King D. Alphonso, called the Noble, in whose raigne we now are come, and whose daughter D. Yrreca was married to Fernand the second King of Leon and Galicia: hee also (having built vp the towne of Haro, in Rioje) surnamed himselfe of Haro, and left it to his posterity. He had of D. Mençia his wife, one sonne called D. Gaufrida, who some say had bene fathers estates, and an other daughter called D. Gaufrida, who some say had bene Queene of Nauarre, but it is doubtfull. This D. Diego Lopez, was the tenth Lord of Biscay, and a very good Knight: who had the honor to bee standard-bearer to the King of Castille, and was at al the exploits of warre, done by King D. Alphonso the ninth. Hee had to wife D. Maria Diaz de Lara, daughter to Cont Nugno, of whom we haue made mention, and she bare him D. Lopez Diaz de Haro, who was the eleuenth Lord of Biscay. His Image is to be seene kneeling in the quier of the great church of Toledo, planted against a pillar. The succession of these Lords, shall bee here-after set downe according to the time.

Castille.

An. 1170.
D. Alphonso
the noble King of Castille
comes to years.

And marries Elenor of England.

Returning to King D. Alphonso, after the taking of Surita, hauing dismissed his souldi-ars, he returned to Toledo, where hee kept his court, and assembled the Noblemen and knights his vassals: where finding himselfe in free possession of all the country of Toledo, he came to Burgos, where hee called an other assembly, and kept his court, in the yeare 1170. touching that which lies on this side the mountaines, belonging to Castille & Nagera: and for that the fifteenth yeere of his age was now ended, all the townes & forts were yeelded vp vnto him, without any contradiction, according to the will of his deceased father, yea those which were held by D. Fernand of Castro, who was neuer more seene in Castille, by reason of the quarrels he had with the house of Lara, but pal-sing to the Moores, hee shewed himselfe a perpetuall enemy to his country. In the assembly at Burgos, there was speech of the excesses, and outrages done by Fernand King of Leon; to reuenge the which hee resolved to proclaim warre against him, but it was not put in execution long after, by reason of D. Alphonso's youth, who was not yet capable of so great an enterprise. There they treated also of the Kings marriage with Elenor daughter to Henry the second King of England, who was as renowned as any Prince at that day in Christendome: he was sonne to Goffrey Duke of Aniou and Normandie. It was this Henry which had married Queene Elenor, heire of the Dutchie of Guienne, and countie of Poictou, put away by Lewis the seuenth the French King.

After these things, there was an enter-view of two yong Kings, D. Alphonso of Ca-stille, and D. Alphonso of Arragon, at Sahagun, with shewes of great loue: and from thence they went to Sarragosse, from whence there was an Ambassage sent to effect the marriage of the King of Castille. The Ambassadors were D. Celbrun Archbishop of Toledo, the Bishops of Palenza, Calaozza, Burgos and Segobia, the Earles D. Pance and D. Nugno, with other Noblemen who found the court, with the Queene mother and her daughter at Burdeaux: whose returne the King of Castille attended at Sarragosse.
where during his aboad, the league was renewed betwixt Castille and Arragon; and a new made for the mutual defence of both Kings, against all men, except the King of England, in the which were named all the great men belonging to either estate:
for assurance whereof, there was assigned and laied in pawne the castles of Nagera, Biguerra, Clauijo, Ocon and Arueda, for the King of Castille; and for the King of Arragon, Hariza, Daroca, Aranda, Epila Borja: with a condition that hee which should breake the league, should loose these places: and the conventions were signed and confirmed by the two Kings, and their chiefeft Nobles. The Ambassadors of Castille were welcome to Burdeaux, and their charge was very pleasing to the king of England: whereupon the Princesse Elenor was sent into Spaine, being accompanied by Bernard Archbishop of Bourdeaux, the Bishoppes of Poictiers, Angoulême, Perigoux, Xaintes, Agen, and Bazas: by Rasul de la Faye, Seneshall of Guienne, Helie Earle of Perigott, the Vicounts of Tartas, Chaste.

Chastelleraud, Chastillon, Mortmar, Vendome, Angoulême, Labrit or Albret, with very many other Noblemen and Knights. By the treaty made with the Ambassadors it was said, that the assurance and contract of marriage should be made at Tarrasone, and should be solemnly ratified in the presence of the King of Arragon; wherefore the two Kings came to Tarrasone, where these things were celebrated and sworn with great solemnity, in the yeere of our Lord 1170. and for accomplishment thereof at that instant D. Alphonso King of Castille, caused all the Knights of Castille, which were there present, to swear fealtie to his future spouse: and moreover hee gaue vnto her in fa-uour of the marriage, the castles and city of Burgos, Castro, Xeris, Auia, Monçon, Sala-dagne, Tariego, Dueregnas, Carrion; Aabelon, Medina del Ampo, Villa Escusa, Aguilar & Astudillo, & for her idle expences & to furnish her cabinet, he assigned particularly vnto her, Burgos, Nagera, and Castro Xeris: besides hee gaue vnto her the rents of the port of Saint Emeterio, Belgo, Cabedo, Briza de Centillana, Calaozza, Logroño, Arnedo, Bignerra, Granon, Vilhorado; Pantorio, Monasterio, Pozza, Atienza, Olma, Penafili, Coriel, Surita, Hira, Aegna Negra and others. Moreover hee promised to giue her the moytie of all hee should conquer from the Moores from the day of their marriage. These promises and matrimoniall conventions were sworn in the presence of the Archbishop of Bourdeaux, and other English Ambassadors, to whom in the Queenes name hee caused the forts to bee deliuered, and the homages aboue mentioned to bee done, all in the presence of the King of Arragon, as an indifferent ab-trator for both parties. These things thus finished, the two Kings of Castille and Arragon, parted good friends, and the Ambassadors, with the new spouse, came with D. Alphonso the Noble, to Burgos, where the marriage was celebrated with great state and royal pompe, after which the court parting from Burgos, it came to Nagera, in the countie of Oja, where the King gaue leaue to many which had come to attend the solemnitie of his marriage, namely to them of Auila, who had alwaies followed him, to whom for their willingness to serue him, hee graunted many priuiledges.

After which hee led the Queene to Toledo, where hee grew to amorous of a Lew, whom they called Hermosa, as hee forgot his new spouse, and intangled himselfe so farre in her loue, as hee almost lost his senses; whereat some Knights of Castile beeing verie much greeued, they thought to doe an act pleasing vnto God, and profitable to the common-weale; to kill this Lew, the which in the beginning the King did beare verie impatiently, but in the end hee acknowledged his error; and de-tested it.

Vpon the confines of Arragon and Castille, there began at that time a petty estate in Albarrazin, which place was vsurped by a Knight, called D. Pedro Ruiz d'Asagra, who held it of God and his sword. Hee was borne in Nauarre, and wonne the loue of the Moores of Murcia, and other neighbour places, which did fauour and succor him in his enterprises, and withall hee had newly made a league with D. Sanebo King of Nauarre, who supported him and vsed him, to bridle Arragon and Castille, with which estates hee had or feared some larres. This fort which had bene in ancient time called Saint Marie of Albarrazin, was a troublesome thorne in the feete of the Kings of Castille and Arragon, into whose territories D. Pedro Ruiz d'Asagra, made often roads, at his pleasure: who hauing about this yeere of our Lord 1172. taken some places in Castille, the King D. Alphonso the noble, resolved to make warre against him, and to take them from him if hee could: for this consideration hee made a priuate league with the King of Arragon, who was interested; by the which it was concluded, that the King of Arragon should haue the fort of Albarrazin; and hee of Castille should haue the rest which D. Pedro did hold, for the obseruing of which Articles, hee of Arragon did giue in pawne to the King of Castille, the castle of Hariza, with Aranda, Borja and Argudas: and the castle of Verdejo was giuen to the King of Arragon by him of Castille, bynding also the townes of Agreda, Aquilar and Cerueda: which places were assurances for that which had bene contracted betwixt them, promising that if there should bee any contrauention, or fraude betwixt them, it should bee repaired within three yeeres, or the places lost for him that had committed the fraude; But these designs went to smother, the two Kings being at a jarre for Hariza, the which A was delivered to the King of Castille by Nugno Sanchez a knight, without the King of Arragons expresse command, and before the warre of Nauarre was begunne. Then the King of Castille was most commonly accompanied by D. Celebrun Archbishop of Toledo, Primat of Spaine, the Bishops D. Ioselin of Sigüenza, Gonzalo of Segobia, Ramond of Palencia, Pedro of Burgos, Sancho d' Auila, Bernard d' Osma, with other Prelats and Church-men, of which kinde of men Kings counsels did then most commonly consist, and therefore whatsoever Princes committed, were it good or bad, is iustly to be imputed to them, be it in religion or in matters of State. There were also many Noble men of Marke in those daies; amongst the which were D. Ponce, Lord Steward, and D. Nuñez standard-bearer of Castille, D. Gonzalo Maragon a standard-bearer also, and D. Rodrigo Gutierrez a Steward, which were the chiefe offices of the crowne they were annual, as it seemes, or else at the Kings pleasure.

Nauarre.
An. 1173.

Nauarre in-uaded by the Kings of Castile and Araragon.

By their aduice and assistance, with other Prelats, Noblemen and Knights of his realmes, D. Alphons entered Nauarre in the yeere 1173, with a great army, against his vncle D. Sancho the wife, moued thereunto, as well by the spoiles which he had done in the territories of Rioje and Bureau, during his nonage, as also by the perswasion of the King of Arragon his cousin, whose countrie D. Sancho had invaded, whilst that the armie of Arragon was in the Realme of Valencia against the Moores, thinking to make his profit thereby, whilst the King of Arragon was absent with his forces. So breaking the accord and peace, which hee had made with the deceased D. Raymond, and renews with Queene Petronilla, hee had overrunne his country, and forced D. Alphons King of Arragon, to giue ouer his praise-worthie enterprises, and to turne head against his enemies, whom he had repulsed into Nauarre, entering by Tudela, where hee did besige and take the towne of Arguedas, the which hee fortified and manned with a good garison.

These two Kings of Castille and Arragon being in armes, and pressing D. Sancho in diuers places, hee found himselfe to weake to make head against them, so as his countries endured great spoiles and miseries, for his armie being defeated towards Castille, the Castilians did runne as farre as Pampelone: on the other side the King of Arragon tooke from him the towne and castle of Milagro, the garison whereof did alwaies keepe his frontiers in alarme, by reason whereof hee razed it, but it was since repaired by the Nauarrois. Notwithstanding these two vnited forces, yet D. Sancho defended himselfe valiantly against the King of Arragon and tooke from him the castles of Trafinos and Caxuelos. The most renowned Knights which were in those daies in Nauarre, as appeares by the ancient Records of townes and Monasteries, were Inigo Almorauid in Roncal, Sancho Ramirez in Aybar, Jordain in Saint Marie in Vxue, Ximen Almorauid in Peralta, Garcia of Alberio in Tudela, and Martin Ruiz in Estella, who had the government of these places and forts, and commanded D. Sancho souldiers.

Sancho of Cas-
tile.

An. 1174.

During these warres, the King of Castille resolved to propound a marriage vnto D. Alphons King of Arragon, the which had beene treated of betwixt him and D. Sancho his aunt, daughter to the Emperor D. Alphons, by his second wife D. Rica, and would attempt (by the charity which did guide both him and his counsel) to breake the marriage which was already concluded betwixt the sayd King of Arragon and the daughter of Manuel the first Emperour of Constantinople, and so farre advanced, as these came already to Montpellier, when as D. Alphons of Arragon forsooke her to hearken to the marriage of D. Sancho of Castille, to the great contempt and disgrace of the Emperor. This other marriage was afterwards celebrated in Sarragossa, in the presence of Cardinal Hiacinth, the Popes Legat in Spaine, in the yeere 1174, in consideration whereof, the King of Arragon gaue vnto his spouse many townes in Arragon and Catalogne, imitating the example of the King of Castille, who had extraordinarily advanced the Princess of England.

Queene Petronilla of Arragon was deceased the yeere before this marriage, it may bee whilst her sonne was in Prouence to dispute the succession of the Earle of Prouence

Prouence his cousin, who had beene slaine nere vnto Nice by the Niffards: whose inheritance he had obtained, notwithstanding that the Earle of Tolouise was a great enemy vnto him. They write that this Princeesse by her last wil and testament did ordaine, that no women should succeed to the crowne of Arragon.

It was the same yeere 1174, that King D. Alphons the noble confirmed the priuiledges of the city of Toledo, the which we haue set downe by Articles during the life of the Emperor D. Alphons the sixth: a while after the King D. Alphons of Castille being at the siege of Cuenca, hee quit vnto D. Alphons of Arragon the fealty and homage, and all pretension of souerainty, which hee had to the realme of Arragon, in confirmation of their friendship, and in respect of their new contracted alliance; three and fortie yeeres after that the Realme of Arragon had begunne to hold of the crowne of Castille.

The Noblemen and Knights which had conducted Manuell the Emperours daughter to Montpellier, seeing themselves and their Princeesse thus mocked, not knowing what other course to take, they would haue carried her backe into Greece: But either by loue or force they married her to William Earle of Montpellier, in whose house shee was lodged: of which marriage issued a daughter, called Mary, who in time, was wife to the sonne and heire of this D. Alphons King of Castille. This sonnes name was D. Pedro, borne of D. Sancho of Castille, besides these brought the King her husband, D. Alphons, who was Earle of Prouence, and D. Fernand, who being a Monke in the royall Monasterie of Poblette, which his father had finished, hee left it to be Abbot of Montarragon. King D. Alphons had three daughters also by the Queene D. Sancho, that is D. Constance who was married first to the King of Hongarie, and afterwards to the Emperour. Frederic the second, D. Eleanor and D. Sancho, both Countesses of Tolouise, the one married to Cont Raymond the father, and the other to Cont Raymond the sonne. This Queene D. Sancho was verie deuout, after the manner of that age: wherefore as soone as she was married shee built the Monastery of Sixena, of the Nuns of Saint Iean.

Arragon.

Generation of
Arragon.

This age was (as the rest) full of deuotions, and inuentions of new seruices: for Cardinal Hiacinth being Legate a Latere for the Pope in Spaine, the order of knights or men at armes, of Saint James, had his beginning in the realme of Galicia, by an emulation betwixt some knights, & Monkes of Saint Eloy, a Monastery in the same Kingdome. These good religious fathers seeing the great concourse of people which came from all parts of Christendome to the sepulcher of Saint James, they beganne to build Hospitals, out of their reuenues which were very great, vpon the passage which in Spaine they doe commonly call the French way, to lodge and feed Pilgrimes, and to supplie all their necessities, in sicknesse or in health: wherein they employed themselves honestly, and the first Hospital of their foundation was that of Saint Marke the Euangelists, without the walles of the city of Leon: afterwards they built another vpon the passage of Castille, called delas Tiendas. In imitation of these Monkes, yfing such courtesie to strangers which went to Saint James, there were thirteene Knights, very deuout to this Apostle, taking him for their particular Patron and aduocate, according to their instruction, vowed themselves to gard and assure the way for pilgrimes against the incursions of the Moores, and other theues which troubled Spaine; and hauing imparted their designe to the Monkes of Saint Eloy, they agreed to make one body amongst them, and to make the patrimonie of the Monastery of Saint Eloy common, with that of these Knights, and others which should ioine with them: at that time they did enioy about twenty castles, which made the Monkes more willing to allow of this communion: at these holy souldiers were married from their first institution, wherefore they did onelie vow coniugal chastitie, and as for pouerty it was not very great, they onelie renounced the proprietie of their goods, for the seruice of the order; enioying the fruites, whereof they payed tithes vnto the Monkes for the diuine priuilege, wherein they were employed: they did vowe obedience to their Prior and Maister, by such an order, as the Monkes should bee subiect to their Priors both for spirituall and temporall; and the Knights to the same Prior touching their spirituall;

spirituality; but in regard of the temporall they should obey the maister of the order. A Whereof the first was named D. Pedro Fernandez de Puente Encalada. The first convent which was built for these Knights, was neere vnto Saint Marke's Hospitall, without the walles of Leon, on a peece of ground belonging to the Monkes of Saint Eloy, which they gaue; into the which they all retired, taking vpon them a modest kind of habit, fit for the warre, carrying vpon a white cloake a red-crosse, in forme of a sword, for a marke of their order, and for an argument of humilitie they had their haire powled, which was no small abatement in those times.

Their Order was vnder Saint Augustin, according to that of the Monkes of Saint Eloy; and all these things were ordered in the presence of Cardinal Hyacinthe, the Legat, and allowed by him, hauing especiall authority for it. A while after D. Pedro, the Master of the Order, accompanied with certaine Knights, this order being wonderfully increased, went to Rome, to present himselfe to Pope Alexander, who confirmed the order in the year of our Lord 1175, according to the disposition of Cardinal Hyacinthe his Legat, who was afterwards Pope. Many haue beleueed, and some haue written, that this order of Knights of Saint James is more ancient, grounding it vpon a certaine priuiledge which is found at Salamanca, in the Monasterie of the Holie Ghost, where at this present the religious women of that order are: for besides the moderne Castilian Language, in the which this priuiledge is written, with the date and yete thereof, counted from the nativity of our Lord Iesus Christ, discouers the fallhood: for that in those daies all Instruments, titles and letters were written in Latin, and that they did account the yeeres from the Era of Cesar, there is not any mention found in the Authors of the Institution of this Order, nor of any exploit of the Knights thereof, before this time: besides other markes of fallhood which may be discouered in this priuiledge, as to intitle the King D. Fernand the Great Lord of Biscay, and King of Leon, which hee was not, and by consequence had no cause to grant priuiledges to that Monastery of the citie of Salamanca, which hath been alwaies of the iurisdiction of Leon. Whereas in the yeere 1034, which is the date thereof, there reigned D. Bernard the third of that name, so as it is not without cause if they doubt of the truth of the priuiledges granted to churches and convents.

These Knights newly instituted being fallne into some dislike with D. Fernand King of Leon, reigning at that time, they left their Conuent of Saint Marke at Leon, and retired into Castille, where they were courteously receiued by the King D. Alphonso, who gaue them the towne and Castele of Vcles, called in old time Vcclesia, where they built that renowned conuent, which is the chiefe seate of their religion and order: yet they sent some of their brethren to dwell in their first conuent of Saint Marke at Leon, after the decease of the King D. Fernand, vpon condition that the superioritie should belong to that of Vcles; but it is not obserued, for the conuent of S. Marke doth not acknowledge that of Vcles in any thing, but doth keep their first reuenues, the which were since augmented in Estremadura, after the conquest thereof by them of Leon. In the time this order did extend farre into Portugal, where it got great reuenues vnder the obedience of the conuent of Vcles, vnto the King D. Denis, who put the Knights out of his country.

A thousand launces of the Order of Saint James.

Two chiefe
conuents.

This order of the Knights of Saint James did so grow in wealth and number, by the bountie of Kings, and indulgences of Popes, as they were able to arme a thousand launces compleat, in both conuents of Vcles and Saint Marke: and before that by the authority of Pope Adrian the sixth, the masters place was incorporate to the crowne of Castille, the Masters of the Order were chosen and displaced, if there were cause, of the suffrages of thirteenth brethren, who had that authoritie and power from the whole Order, the which doth enioy more dignities, conuents, monasteries, colleges, and other lands, then any Order that is in Spaine: first there are those principall conuents, which are the chiefe of all the rest, which bee Vcles and Saint Marke, vnder the which are foure Hermitages, Saint Marie de la Pegna, neere vnto the Towne of the which are foure Hermitages, Saint Saluator of Munfiers, neere to Almeca: Saint Mary Segure of the Mountaine, Saint Saluator of Munfiers, neere to Almeca: Saint Mary of Cagnamanes in the fields of Montiel, and Saint Anthony about Alhambra.

Besides

A Besides one Conuent in the Citie of Seuille, two Colleged in the Vniuersitie of Salamanca, fixe Monasteries of Religious women, which were the holie Ghost at Salamanca, S. Foy at Toledo, Saint Croix at Maileddit, Saint James at Granada, S. Olalia at Merida, and Saint James la Iunguera of Barcelona. They haue also fixe Hospitalls: S. James of Toledo, where they go to be cured which haue the poxe or French disease, and all other infirmities which depend thereon, S. James at Cuenca, las Tiendas in Castile the old, the hospitall neere vnto the Conuent of Saint Mark at Leon, and the Hospitall of the Conuent at Vcles. Moreover, this Order hath many commanderies, the which are bound to serue in time of warre against the Moores, and to furnish 368. lances: those which belong to the iurisdiction of Vcles are, the great Commanderie of Castille, that of Paracuellos, Monthermand, Mora, dos Barrios, Montreal, Horcajo, el Corral of Almaguer, el Campo de Critana, which is the best Commanderie of all Spaine: Yeste, Moratall, Carauaca, Aledo, Ricote, Biedma, Ciega, Soconos, Torres, and Cagnamares, Montiel, Sociellamos, Villamaior, Carrizosa, Vilhermosa, Vallanous de la Fuente, the buildings del campo de Monnel, Villa Escusa de Plaro, the buildings of Mancha, and the river of Tayo, Huelamo, Orria, Estremera, Saint Croix de Sarca, Villoria, Villarubia, Alpagues, and the Priorie of Vcles, the Chamber of the Priuiledges of the Order, and Alorqui. These bee those which acknowledge Vcles. Now those follow which are of the iurisdiction of Saint Mark of Leon, the great Commanderie Aquilarejo, Calcadilla, la Puebla de Sancho Peres, el Santo, Villafranca, la Fuente del maeistre, Almendralejo, Lobon, Montijo, Metida, Alcuercar, Riutera, and Azebucha, Hallame, Elliotua, Palomas, Ornachos, Reyna Hinojosa, Medina de la Torres, Valencia del ventoso, Monasterio, Montemolino, Viage, Azuaga, Guadalcanal, Mures, Benaçuca, Estepa, the houses of Corduba, the buildings in the Prouince of Leon, the Prouince of the conuent of Leon, Villanous of Alif, dar, Vena Mexi, the Prouostship of Bienvenida. In Castile the old, are Pegna, Viende, Estriana, Castrotoraua. Besides all these there are the commanderies of la Torre d'Ocague, Sarca, Mirauel, Castelleja de la Cuesta, Barra, Castroverde. And in the Realme of Valencia are the commanderies of Museros, Enguerra, Orcheta, Sagra, Zener and Fradel. Besides these Commanderies, this Order hath at this day aboue fixe hundred Knights of the habit, about two hundred Clerkes brethren, which remaine in the conuents, with Vicarages and other Benefices, so as it is wonderful great and rich. And although it were first instituted to make warre against the Infidels, yet there are few at this day which affect these commanderies, or the habit to that end, but only to increase their reuenues, or to be in greater reputation among soldiours, by means of this habit. Such was the iurisdiction of this Order of Knights.

During the raigne of this King Don Alphonso the Noble, the Monasterie of religious women of Balbuena was built by Peter of Balbuena an Hermit: in like manner one Iohn of Ortega, borne at Quintana in Ortugno, in the Diocesse of Burgos, was sanctified, I know not for what holines, and his bodie was buried in the yeare 1173, in the Monastery which carries his name: where the Spanish Authors say, hee did many miracles. There were infinit donations made vnto Monasteries, Conuents, and Orders of Knights, by the King and the Nobility of Spaine, for the redemption of their soules, and of their kindred and friends deceased, as their letters report.

The Order of the Knights of Calatraua, whose beginning wee haue described in the life of the King D. Sanche the desired, was much augmented at that time, and was only governed by masters: whereof the first was called D. Garcia, to whom succeeded D. Martin Peres of Syon: and the third master which gouerned at that time, was D. Nugno Peres, of Quignones. The first Conuent of this Order was at Calatraua: but since the Knights made diuers changes, as appears by their Historie: as to Ciruelos, Buxeda, Corcoles, and castel of Saluatierra: and since the chiefe seate of their Order was transferr'd to the castell of Couo, in the time of D. Nugno Hernandez the twelfth Master, where it now remains. The rents and reuenues of this holy company of Warriours haue so increased from time to time, by the bountie of the Kings of Castile, as they haue beene free to serue against the Moores with 300. Nauarre,
An. 1176.

About the year 1176, was founded the Monasterie of our Ladie of Irançu, by Don Pedro de Paris, bishop of Pampelone, who notwithstanding he called himselfe so, was of Nauarre. It is very likely that the Prelates in those dayes had a great desire to build Mona- steries and such like houses, that they might leave some markes: for otherwise they could leaue no subject to speake of them, that age being vnlearned, and full of ignorance, so as not knowing in a manner any other duties, they thought themselves sufficiently dis- charged, if they did build any retreat for Monkes: and withall, they had an assurance, that their beginning should not remaine imperfect, nor vnprovided of rich reuenues, le- ting that the hearts of Kings, and of all men in generall, were seasoned with this persuasi- on, that to enrich the Clergie, was the true meanes to wipe out all their offences, and so bee saued: Wherefore all their exhortations, counsell, and other care, tended onely to this end, to entertaine all, especially the Nobilitie in this opinion. This Bishop, accord- ing to this kind of doctrine, built and erected this Monasterie of Nostre Signora of Irançu, and there placed the religious of Cisteaux: the Abbot of which place is of great authoritie in Nauarre, and hath a voyce in the assembly of the Estates, as a chiefe member of the Clergie.

Castile.

11 Returning to the secular affaires of Castile, wee finde that this year, Don Alphonso, the Noble, made another roade into Nauarre, being assisted by Don Cel- brun, Arch-bishop of Toledo, and many other Bishops, but to small effect. The most renowned among the Knights, which iured him, were Don Gorgal of Maragnon, his Standard-bearer, and Don Rodrigo Gutierrez Lord Steward: these were Offices in the court of Castile, which were held during the kings pleasure.

Cuenca taken from the Moors.

This warre was diuerted by the inuasions which the Moores made into Castile and Arragon, in the year 1177. Whereupon the two Kings ioyning their forces together, besetged Cuenca. The place was strong and well manned, and hard to be forced: where- fore the King of Castile left the king of Arragon there, who after many assaults tooke it. There they placed and instituted an Episcopall seate, changing that of old Valeria, by a graunt from Pope Alexander the third. After which, the Moores of Alarçon, doubting they should not be able to defend that place, quit it: which conquests remained to Cas- tile: and this was at the same time when as King Don Alphonso the Noble, did remit the Soueraignie and homage which the King of Arragon did owe to the Crowne of Castile.

An. 1179.
League against
Nauarre.

In the year 1179, there was a new League made and confirmed betwixt these Prin- ces of Castile and Arragon, to make warre against the king of Nauarre, at their com- mon charge, and equall conquests: according to the which Don Alphonso the Noble did so presse the King Don Sancho alongst the Riuer of Oja, as hee tooke from him the places which hee had seized on during his infancie, and recouered Burbiesca, Cerefo,

A Cerefo, Granon, Entrena, and Logrogno, remaining by this meanes Lord and Mas- ter of Rioje and Bureua, the which the kings of Nauarre could neuer after get. This losse was made more grieuous by the death of Donna Beacia, Queene of Nauarre, a Princess of great vertue, who (as some write) was buried in the Cathedrall church of Pampelone.

12: After all this, D. Alphonso the Noble came to Burgos, to prouide for the necessi- ties of the warre, as well against Nauarre, as the Moores: and hauing need of great sums of money to that end, he propounded in a generall assembly of the Estates at Burgos, to leaue a tax vpon the people, whereunto the Nobility as well as therest should contri- bute, imposing fise Maraudis of gold for euery person, the which was valued about fise Ducats: this counsell was giuen him by Diego Lopes de Hara, Lord of Biscay, but it tooke

Wherefore D. Alphonso chan- ged his opinion, and let them vnderstand, that from thenceforth hee would maintaine their immunities, and that whatsoever he had then propounded, was not to continue, but onely to supply the present necessitie of his affaires, which he would seeke to surr ish by some other meanes. For the great resolution which D. Pedro de Lara shewed in this action, they say, that the Nobilitie of Castile did grant to him and to his successors, a sollemne break-fast, in testimonie of his good indeour in a businesse of so great conse- quence: and moreover they affirme, that thereby the Lords of Lara haue the first voyce

C for the Nobilitie in the Court of Castile. It is not from these 5. Maraudis of gold, that the Prouerbe is growne in Spaine, To reuenge or defend their Nobilitie for fise hundred folz, for fise Maraudis are got fise hundred folz. Wherefore leauing all the fables which some produce to that purpose, you must vnderstand, that according to the ancient lawes of Castile, the iniurie which any one did vnto a Gentleman, where there was a ciuill repara- tion, they payed fise hundred folz for a fyne, which were worth foure hundred Marau- dis of currant money at those dayes, and that which was done to one which was no Gen- tleman, was repayed by three hundred folz, which were worth but two hundred and for- tie Maraudis: wherefore the Prouerbe, to reuenge his Nobilitie, for 500. folz, is drawne from these ciuill lawes. D vehemencie against the Moores, after that he had recouered those places which D. San- cho king of Nauarre had taken from him, and the quarrels betwixt him and his vncl Don Fernand king of Leon being somewhat reconciled: by the mediation of the Noblemen and Prelates of both Realmes, and by the meanes of the king of Arragon, who sent Don Berenger Bishop of Lerida, and D. Raymond of Moncada thither: the more to tye the holy Knights vnto him, and to haue them readie at need, he made Vcles the chiefe seate of the Knights of Saint Iames, to whom he gaue the Townes of Mora, Ocagne, Oreja, and o- ther places, along the riuer of Tayo. He gaue to the Order of Calatraua, the townes of Magueda, Aceca, Cogolludo, Surita and others: hee peopled the towne of Palence in Vera, or rather Playfance, and there placed the auncient Episcopall sea: hee fortified To- ledo, and rampared Alarcos in that Dioecesse, becing a place of importance vpon a hill on the left hand, comming from Almodouar del Campo, to Citre recall, about Caracuel.

13 In the meane time there fell out a great quarrell, betwixt Don Fernand king of Leon, and Don Alphonso Henriques King of Portugal, by reason of the fort of Citre de- rigo, whereas the King of Leon maintained a garrison which did much annoy the Por- tugal: for the souldiers of this place did continually spoile the Portugals countrie, with- out any respect: wherefore D. Alphonso Henriques, who was now very old, sent his sonne D. Sancho with an army against this garrison of the King of Leon, and to race the place, whereof D. Fernand being aduerted, he fortified his guard there, and approaching him- selfe with good troupes, he encountered the Portugals neere to a place called Arraganal, or Arganal, where they were defeated, and their Generall D. Sancho taken, with many Noblemen and Knights of his armie, who notwithstanding were courteously let at liber- ty by the King of Leon.

and Castile in quarrell

D. Alphonso Henriques wonderfully incensed at this losse, being now about 85. yeares old, he gathered his army together, and went to horfe, where entring Galicia in hostile manner, manner, he tooke Lymla, Turon, and other places: then returning into his countrie, hee drew his forces againe together, and marched beyond Guadiana, where he did assaile the citie of Badajoz which the Moores held, being in a countrie, the conquest whereof did belong to the Realme of Leon: whereby it appears, that among the Christian Princes of Spaine, there was some diuision made for their warres against the Moores, to the end they should not crosse one another by their ambition and couetousnesse. The king of Portugal battered Badajoz with such speed, as he had meanes to enter it, and wonne two parts of the towne, forcing the Moores to retire into a part, which was of some strength, where they defended themselves. The King of Leon hearing of this enterprize of the King of Portugall, (although he were not fully reconciled with his nephew of Castile, by reason of the new troubles which happened by the reuolt of D. Fernand Ruiz de Castro, & that he must of force leaue some part of his forces to make head vpon the frontiers of Castile, (if haply they would presse him on that side) marched from Zamora, which was newly taken by him, with such souldiars as he could gather together, towards Badajoz, whereas D. Alphonso Henriques came to meet him, and gaue him battaile, which the Portugals lost: so as D. Alphonso Henriques was forced to fortifie himselfe in that part of Badajoz, which he had wonne: yet finding himselfe not very safe, he resolved to retire as well as he could into his countrie: but as they went out of the citie in a great presse, hee bruized his foot against a barre of the gate, so as he was taken by the Leonois, who carryed him to the campe to the king D. Fernand, who receiued him with all honour, as his father-in-law, and a great Prince as he was, from thence he was carried to Auila, where hee was carefully looked vnto, and there made an accord with the King of Leon his sonne-in-law: so as they continued good friends. The places which the Portugals had taken in Galicia, were restored, and D. Fernand desired no other satisfaction, but an oath of fealtie and acknowledgement of the countrie of Portugal, holding of Leon. So Don Alphonso Henriques returned free into his Realme of Portugall: after which time he could not ride, being lame of his fall, but was still carried in a coach or chariot.

D. Alphonso K. of Portugal taken, and the warre of Leon ended.

Leon.

As for D. Fernand Ruiz de Castro, who, as wee haue sayd, had left the king of Castile seruice, and was retired into the Moores countrie, after that hee had followed their armies some time, in the end he came to serue D. Fernand King of Leon, by whom he was put into citie Roderigo, after that he had succoured it, and chased away the Portugals. This Knight who was of a turbulent spirit, and did hate the Castilians deadly, bred a quarrell betwixt the Kings of Leon and Castile, making continuall roades from his garrison of citie Roderigo, into the countrie of D. Alphonso King of Castile, and had newly delated some troupes of Castilians, which were gathered together to repulse him, whereas some were slaine vpon the place, and some taken prisoners, among the which was the Earle D. Nugno de Lara, and others whome he deliuered afterwards vpon their faith. This was the occasion which did much trouble and hinder the King D. Fernand, when as hee came against his father-in-law: and the Portugals who beleaged Badajoz, a towne in his iurisdiction belonging to the Moores, whome notwithstanding hee chased away, making himselfe master of the towne: where he left Aben Abel, a Moore for Governour, in whom he trusted, for that the Inhabitants were all Moores: but this Infidell did not keepe the place long, but yielded it to Aben Jacob, great Miralmanin of the Almohades, sonne and heire to Abdelmon deceased.

Excellis of D. Sancho against the Moores.

15 Aben Abel did not onely commit this trecherie against the king D. Fernand, but moreover hauing gathered together great forces of the Moores Almohades, hee over-ranne and spoyled the territories of Leon: then entering into Portugal, he came and beleaged the towne of Saint Iren, in the which the king D. Alphonso Henriques was, being then old, and vnprofitable for the warre; who was in great danger to be taken within that place: but the King Don Fernand comming in good time, the siege was raised, and the Moores put to route: who were afterwards pursued by the Infant Don Sancho, who marched with the armie of Portugall neere vnto Seuille, where being encountered by the Moores, he vanquished them, and then beleaged Niebla: but he was forced to leaue it, being aduertised that the Moores were entred by Extremadura, and did beleage Veija: wherefore being prest to defend his owne, he left the other. Arriuing at Veija, he defeated and and dispersed the Moores, and freed the towne from danger: this was in the yeare, 1181.

At that time the chiefe in Spaine among the Princes of the Moores, according to the diuision which they had made among themselves, vnder the Soueraigntie of Maroc, were the Kings of Murcia; one of the which called Lobo, had had a perpetuall hatred against the Royall family of Almohades, called the Mazemutes. This Lobo had beene tributarie to the King of Arragon: but during the quarrels betwixt Arragon and Castile, he had rebelled, by the fauour of the King of Castile: whereupon the King of Arragon fauoured the Mazemutes. Lobo being dead, his sonne Madef succeeded him; who was father to Zaen, the last King of the Moores at Valencia. 16 As for Zamora which D. Fernand King of Leon had newly subdued, it was thus: The king of Leon hauing built and peopled the towne of Ledesma and others, to accommodate his new Collonies, hee had somewhat restrained the territorie of Salamanca, whereat the Inhabitants being incensed, they rebelled against him: and hauing drawne vnto them Auila and Zamora, and infected other neighbour places with the poyson of their rebellion, they made choice of a Knight, called Nugno Ruiz, for their head, with whom going to field with a great number, as well of their citizens, as of their allies, the King D. Fernand came and charged them neere vnto Valdemuca, where he did quite defeat them, and tooke their capitaine D. Nugno Ruiz alieue, whose head he caused to be cut off: This victorie made the chiefe of them which had taken armes against the King, to retire, giuing the rest occasion to giue ouer the enterprize, and then alioyntly together demanded pardon, and obtained it. The towne of Zamora being (as we haue sayd) engaged in this mutinie, the King D. Fernand led his victorious armie thither, but the Inhabitants yielded without any difficultie: so within few daies these two townes, and others by their example, returned to the obedience of the king of Leon.

17 This yeare 1181, D. Sancho king of Nauarre, fortified a little towne, called at that time Gasteiz, to serue for a barre against the king of Castile, and to defend the frontier in the Province of Alaua. This place being since augmented in circuit and people, was called Vitoria, a part whereof (which at this day is called Villa de Sujo) was that Bourg of Gasteiz. The king granted to his new towne the same Lawes he had done to Logroño, correcting and reforming them in some points: he gaue many priuiledges to the Inhabitants, namely, that they should not haue any stranger to bee Iudge or Governour ouer them, but one borne in the countrie, who should be chosen and changed by them, if they found him not faithfull and capable: the which was called the priuiledge Merino, according to the style of the countrie. They haue obserued this order in the gouernement of the towne, the which is one of the best ordered in Spaine, hauing about all things become careful not to admit any new Christian to publicke charges, vnlesse he bee of soure descents. The reason of this name Vitoria, was for some victorie obtained in that countrey against the Castilians, as it is to be presumed: but by the defect of Histories of those times the particularities are not knowne.

After that this towne came vnder the obedience of the kings of Castile, they did much enlarge it in circuit, and built the foure parishes of Saint Michel, Saint Vincent, S. Peter, and Saint Illefonce or Alphonse. It is written of this king D. Sancho the Wise, that hauing about this time ouer-ranne the territorie of Rioje and Burcua, the which D. Alphonso of Castile had taken from him some yeares before, and being neere vnto Burgos, at a place called Atazpuerca, he gaue a blow with his sword against an Elme, for a marke that the limits of Nauarre should extend so farre: then returning with an infinite number of cattell, and other spoyles, as he had a little past the Monasterie of Saint Peter of Cardena, the Abbot of that place, who was a reuerent man, took the Standard of Cid Ruiz Diaz great Grand-father to the king D. Sancho, (who was buried in that Monasterie) & mounted vpon a Muler, being accompanied by tenne of his Monkes; the strongest of which carried this Standard: he made all the haile he could after this armie, vntill hee had ouertaken the king, before whom he humbled himselfe. The king, wondering to see these Monkes in this equipage, with standard of warre, yet he gaue them good reception, being of himselfe very deuout: and demanding what was the reason of their comming, the Abbot sayd vnto him, That he was Abbot of Saint Peter of Cardena, and that he was come vnto him to beseech him, for the honour of Cid Ruiz Diaz, his great Grandfather, (who

(who was interred with them and his Standard which he saw in their hands) that would A please him to leaue the prey which he carried away. The King thought thereon a little; in the end he found himselfe so touched with the remembrance of Cid Ruis, and the deuotion and great reuerence he bare vnto the religious, as he left this great bootie which hee had made, to restore it to the owners, wherewith all men were not content.

Castile.

The quarrels betwixt the kings of Castile and Nauarre continued long, although by fits they had some rest, but it was a counterfeit peace, or a feate of warre. Logroño and Aguiñejo were (by some accord made betwixt these Princes) as neuters betwixt Nauarre and Castile, in the hands of Ramir de Barca; but the city of Calaoarra was held by a knight called Don Diego Ximenes, in the name of Don Alphonso, king of Castile. And for that the warres betwixt these Christian Princes were very dishonorable and prejudiciall to religion, whereof they carried the title, Pope Lucius the third then reigning, sent a Cardinal Legat into Spaine, to reconcile them, who vsed great diligence, but not with such effect, as he desired. The kings of Castile and Arragon had an interview, and he of Arragon past to Saint James, to visit the Apostles Sepulcher. This Legat did set downe an order betwixt these two kings, for the conquest of the Moores countrie, wherunto hee did animate these Princes, and assigned to Arragon, that which lyes from Valencia towards Cattelogne, and the rest to Castile: with which lyes from Valencia towards Cattelogne (which came after) were not well content, so as they were faine to make a new diuision, extending the iurisdiction of Arragon, vnto Alicanti: this happened since in the reigne of Don Pedro.

Arragon.

18 This king Don Alphonso of Arragon, hauing about that time held a Prouinciall Councell at Tarragone in Cattelogne, made a decree among other things, That from thenceforth the Notaries should not set downe the yeares of the reigne of the Kings of France, in any contract which should be made in Cattelogne, as they had till then observed, but only the yere of the Incarnation of our Lord Iesus Christ; which was, that they would no more acknowledge the fourcraigie of France, of whom Cattelogne and the Countie of Barcelone did hold and depend. This king D. Alphonso finding himselfe mightie, and hauing a good share on this side the mountaines, busied himselfe in the French warres, taking part with the factions, which were among the Noblemen of that nation, and yet was neuer in very good termes with Castile, but for his own profit: yet he maintained himselfe wisely in his countrie, and with reputation.

Portugall.
An. 1183.

19 Don Alphonso Henriquez being very old, and at the graues brinke, thought what was fit for his soules health, as he had beene instructed; he procured in the yere 1183, to haue the bodie of Saint Vincent transported to Lisbon; the which they sayd, was in that countrie called Algarbo, on the holy promontorie, the which hath bene since called (by reason of this relique) Cape Saint Vincent, he was borne at Saragozza. The king went twice in person to Cape S. Vincent, being 89. yeares old, for the removing of this bodie, the which he placed in the Cathedral church at Lisbon. This Prince was so religious, and so great a benefactor to the Clergie, as (besides the three Monasteries of S. Croix of Coimbra, of Alcousa, and of S. Vincent at Lisbon) hee built the great Cathedral church of that citie; and that of Eborac, indowing them with great reuenues. The queene Donna Malfada his wife, carrying the like zeale, did also build the Monasterie of Saint Dominike at Porto, the church of Saint Peter, the Monasterie of Leza, of the Order of S. Iohn, a League from the same citie, and Saint Mary d' Aguas Santas, Saint Saluator of Goandara, Saint Peter de Retes, Saint Mary de Gojos, and about Guyamaranes the Monasterie of Acosta, with many others, to the number (as they say) of an 150. if they sayle not in their account. And for a testimonie of great charitie, they say, that these good Princes left a rent to the barke of Mexanrio, vpon the riuer of Duero, to the end they should passe euery one without any fee.

Whilest they busied themselves about these works of pietie, Aben-Iacob great Miramun of the Arabians, (being aduertised of the routs and ruine of his sectaries in Spain) F past the streight in person with great forces of the Almohades Affricanes, where hauing ioyned with the Moores of Spaine, hee went to beseege Saint Iren, into the which Don Sancho the Infant of Portugall had put himselfe, beginning to make his Engines readie

A ready to batter it, where the besieged were likely to be in great danger; but the good old man Don Alphonso Henriquez would not let the Infidels glorie, in that they had done him this affront in his old age, but hauing put his men in order, and being resolute, hee ledded them to succor his sonne, who had intelligence of the Portugall armie, the which (being fauoured by a furious salley which the besieged made) charged the Moores armie with such resolution, as they put them to flight, with great laughter of their bell men, and the losse of their king Aben-Iacob, who being mortally wounded in the charge by a Portugall, dyed at the passage of the riuer of Tayo. This battell was wonne in the yere 1184. on S. Iohn Baptists day, five dayes after the Moores had begun the sege. Aben-Ioseph his brother succeeded this Moore, and was the third King of the Almohades.

B 20 After this famous victorie, these Princes, father and son came to Coimbra, which was at that time the chiefe towne of the Realme of Portugall, and from thence to Porto, where the marriage of D. Theresa Infanta of Portugall, was concluded with Philip Earle of Flanders. Being returned to Coimbra, D. Alphonso Henriquez fell sicke, whereof hee dyed, being 91. yeares old, hauing reigned with the title of a King about 46. yeares, and had succeeded in his fathers Estates, and held them 73. yeares. His body was interred in the Monasterie of S. Croix of Coimbra, D. Sancho his sonne was king after him in Portugall, furnished the Builder of townes.

21 D. Fernand King of Leon, had a little before his death, pit away D. Vrrata his daughter, by reason of proximitie of bloud, their marriage being made without a dispensation from the Pope, who being (as they write) wonderfully prety by the King, to give them leaue to remaine together, would neuer yeeld vnto it, notwithstanding that of her was borne D. Alphonso, who succeeded his father in the Realmes of Leon and Gallicia: they were cousins in the third degree. D. Fernand married afterwards with the daughter of the Earle Don Nugno, who liued little with him: then he tooke to his third wife D. Vrraca Lopez, daughter to the Earle D. Lopez, and sister to Don Diego Lopez de Haro, with whom he continued not long, for hee died in the towne of Benaunt in the yere 1188. hauing had two sonnes by her called D. Sancho Fernandez, and D. Garcia. His bodie was interred at Compostella, in Saint James church, where as his mother D. Berenguela the Emperesse did lye.

22 A T the time of his death, it seemed there remayned no cause of quarrell, betwixt Leon and Castile, which was not decided and ended. His sonne D. Alphonso being troubled with continuall stormes and quarrels by his mother-in-law D. Vrraca Lopez, was retired into Portugall: so as at the time of his fathers death, he was absent, but being aduertised thereof, he came presently to Leon, where he was received and crowned king, without any contradiction: The King of Castilles Councillors were of opinion, that by the death of D. Fernand, their Prince had a good opportunitie offered, to bee reuenged of the wrongs which were done him during his nonage. If he had then any desire of reuenge the future euents will shew.

King of Leon

D. Alphonso furnished the Noble, reigning then in Castile, was numbered for the 4. of that name, of those that reigned alone in Castile, whose posteritie was very great: for he had eleuen children by Queene Elenor, daughter of England; the eldest was Queene Blanche, mother to the king S. Lewis of France: the second D. Berenguela who was queene of Leon, daughter to D. Alphonso the ninth. The 3. was a sonne named D. Sancho, who died in his Infancie: the 4. was D. Vrraca, Queene of Portugall, married to D. Alphonso the second of that name furnished the Grosse: the 5. child was Don Fernand, who died also young: the sixt was D. Malfada, dead in Salamanca and was not married: the 7. Then had D. Alphonso and D. Elenor two daughters, who died young: and successiually the Queene was deliuered of another daughter, called also Elenor like her selfe, who was wife to Don Iayme, or Iames, first King of that Name, and the eighth King of Arragon.

In the end they had the infant Don Henry, who succeeded his father in the realmes of Ca. A stile and Toledo. These were the children which issued of that marriage.

The other Don Alphonso being crowned King of Leon, his mother-in-law retired into Nagera, where she lived long in her widow-hood, and being dead, was buried in the Monasterie of Saint Mary the royall, in the chappell of the true Crosse, whereas afterwards others of her house were interred, and three of her brethren, Don Lopes Diaz, D.
Martin Lopes, and Don Diego Lopes de Hara. The new king of Leon stayed not long after his Coronation before he came to the court of Castile, being at Carrion, where they say, that King Don Alphonso the Noble his cousin made him knight, as he did also Conrad the fourth sonne to the Emperor Fredericke Barbarossa, to honour whom, the Spaniards write, that he would have given him the Infanta Donna Berenguela his daughter, but she would not go into Germany: others say, that the marriage was made and accomplished: but Conrad being departed to returne into Germanie, (whither he was called to be shed: but Conrad being departed to returne into Germanie, (whither he was called to be Duke of Saxe) Donna Berenguela desired to be divorced, the which was done by the meanes of Don Gonsalo Arch-bishop of Toledo, and Cardinal, Gregorie the Pope's Le-gate: and was afterwards married to D. Alphonso King of Leon, coulin germaine to her father. Don Raymond called Flacade, Earle of Tholoufa, was also made Knight in the company of these two Princes. In this ceremonie the King of Leon kissed the king of Castilles hand, which was a fore-telling of the pretensions and quarrels which should fall out betwixt these two Realmes.

The court being then at Carrion, there was an assembly of Noblemen vassalls, which did acknowledge the Soueraintie, to take the oath of fealtie vnto the King, as it was in ancient time obserued almost euery yeare, where they were accustomed to treat of matters of consequence concerning the State, and the houses of Princes. The Comcancellors of greatest note to D. Alphonso King of Castile in this assembly, were Don Goncillo Arch-bishop of Toledo, Primate of Spaine, the Bishops Don Rodrigo of Calatonia, Don Maurice of Burgos, Don Arderic of Palence, and Don Gonsalo of Segobia, Don John of Cuenca, the Earles Don Pedro de Lara, Don Nugno de Lara, Don Diego Lope de Hara, Lord of Biscay, chiefe Standard-bearer of the kingdome, Don Rodrigo Gutierrez
Lord Stuard, and Gutierrez Rodriguez Chancellor.

The discontents and secret hatred betwixt the Christian Princes, which reigned then in Spaine, was great, being five, carrying the titles of Kings, that is, three *Alphonso*s, of Castile, Arragon, and Leon, and two *Sancho*s, one of Nauarre, and the other of Portugal. The King of Castile presumed to haue superiority ouer the other foure, as his vassalls, notwithstanding any accords which had beene made: wherefore hee thought hee might lawfully controule them at his pleasure. Some yeares before he had taken from the king of Nauarre, the lands lying vpon the riuer of Oja, and Bureua, being the ancient part of Nauarre, which came not to them of Castile by any iust title, but by meere vsurpation and violence. As for him of Arragon, he complained, that the King of Castile had neuer kept any thing promised in the League, which had beene made betwixt them, but had made his profit in all warres, of the Arragonois bloud and meanes. The King of Leon began to find the error which he had committed to haue come to the court of Castile, being at Carrion, and to haue kissed the Kings hand. As for Portugal, there was neuer any good correspondence betwixt these Princes, and them of Castile, since the first Earle Don Henrique: so as these vices hauing infected the hearts of these Potentates, by jealousie, enuie, and bad counsell: they moued the kings of Arragon and Nauarre first of all, to make an offensive and defensive League: for the conclusion whereof the two Princes met at Boria, where, of mortal enemies, they became great friends. There it was accorded, that the friends & enemies of any one of these Princes, should be reputed for such by the other, and that they should be bound to assist one another, for the defence of their Estates. For the obseruation of which accord, neither of them did pawne for his part, the Montagu, Saint Mary of Vxue, and Chastillon of Sanguette with their forts: and for Arragon, the townes of Boria, Sos Malon, Ruelta and Petillas.

For the guard of these ten places, there was chosen, by a common consent of the two kings

A Kings, D. Fernand Ruiz d'Acera, a knight borne in Nauarre, but remained in Arragon, and was Gouernor of Daroca and Calatayub. He tookes his oath to both these Kings, well and faithfully to keepe those places, to deliuer all tenths to him, in whole preiudice the treatie had beene broken by the other: the which was not only sworn by both kings, but also by their eldest sonnes, Don Sancho of Nauarre, and Don Pedro of Arragon, and moreouer, it was agreed, that whensoever Don Fernand Ruiz would discharge himselfe of the guard of those places and forts, that foure knights of either partie should be named out of the which number, the two kings should either choose one, into whose hands the forts should be deliuered with the like oath: that is, the two kings of Nauarre to the knight of Arragon, and the five of Arragon to the Nauarrois. These things being concluded, sworn, and signed, the Kings departed, D. Sancho into Nauarre, and Don Alphonso to Daroca: whereas the articles were againe considered and sworn, in the presence of the chiefe knights of both kingdomes: whereof those of Nauarre were D. Pedro Ladron de Gueusara, Inigo Ortiz, Garcia Almoravid, Pedro de Castan, Michel de Lera, Alfonso de Palencia, and Barthelemy de Rada, all of the most famous families in Nauarre.

This League being made in the yeare 1196. was followed by another made betwixt the kings of Arragon and Leon, into the which Don Sancho king of Portugal was drawn.
An assembly being made to that end at Huelca, thither came the ambassadors of Leon & Portugal, with ample authority and instructions: whereas a League was made among those Princes like vnto that of Boria, capitulating, that not any one of them should make warre, truce, or peace, without the consent of the others. These alliances made and confirmed with all the oaths and solemnities required, did not cause so great a storm as they did threaten for the kings of Leon and Portugal were long quiet, without giving any annoyance to Castile: the kings of Arragon and Nauarre made some attempts, but of small effect.

D. Sancho the 2. King of Portugal, the first of that name.

D 24 W Hen as Don Sancho came to the Crowne of Portugal, he was 31. yeares old:
four yeares before he had married Donna Aldoncia, or Douce, daughter to Don Raymond Berenger Earle of Barcelona, and Regent of Arragon, and of Queene Petronilla. D. Sancho had by this Ladie Douce nine children, whereof there were four sonnes, the eldest was called Don Alphonso, and was King after his father, hee was borne in his Grandfathers lifetime: the second was D. Fernand, who was Earle of Flanders, by marrying with the heire of that countrie, whose name was Jane daughter to Count Baudouin Emperour of Constantinople: the kings third sonne was D. Pedro, who was great in Arragon, where he married the Earle of Virgels daughter: the fourth sonne died young, and was called D. Henrique. Besides these sonnes, he had five daughters, the eldest whereof was married to Don Alphonso king of Leon, the ninth of that name, and was called Donna Theresa, from whom he was divorced, by reason of consanguinity, notwithstanding two daughters and one sonne which they had had: after which diuorce shee lived religiously in Portugal, in the Monasterie of Lorban, which her father built, and afterwards marry Donna Berenguela daughter to the king of Castile, who was as meere allied to him as the other.

This was the practise of those kings, when they had a desire to change their wiues, either for their pleasures, or for some other aduancements, the Pope interposing himselfe, dispensing, binding or dissolving at his will and pleasure, by the authority of the Romish Sea. The second daughter of D. Sancho king of Portugal, and of D. Aldoncia, was Donna
Mafada, Queene of Castile, a Lady of rare beauty, whom D. Henry of Castile married: but Pope Innocent the 3. dissolved this marriage within few daies; by the solicitation of D. Berenguela sister to this king of Castile, who in disdain, that Don Alonso de Lara had concluded it without her priuities, informed the Pope of their secret alliance that was

was betwixt them; and perswaded him to separate them: but this Princeesse being thus retired, retired in great disdain into Portugal, where she lived the rest of her daies in the Monasterie of Renca, built by her. The third daughter was Donna Sancho, a Nunne in the Monasterie of Saint Francis of Alanguer, built by her. The fourth, Donna Blanche, Lady of Guadaluca in Castile: and the fifth and last was D. Berenguela, who was not married, but did accompany her eldest sister Donna Theresa, when as she retired to the Monastery of Epitani. This King D. Sancho had familiarity with two Gentlewomen after the death of his wife: the first was called Donna Maria Aires of Fornello, by whom hee had one daughter called Donna Prieta; and D. Martin Sanches of Portugall, who was Governor of the frontier of Portugall; and a great favourite to Don Alphonso king of Leon his brother-in-law: he married Donna Olalla Peres, daughter to the Earle D. Pero Fernandes de B Castro. Don Sancho did marrie this Gentlewoman his friend, to a knight called D. Gil Vas- quez de Souza; and tooke a second friend, whose name was Donna Maria Peres de Ribera, whom he loved much, and by her had Donna Theresa Sanches, who was wife to Don Al- phonso Telles, foinder of the towne of Albuquerque, and had also one sonne called D.
Ruy Sancho of Portugall, and another daughter Donna Constance Sanches, who built the Monasterie of Saint Francis at Coimbra. D. Ruy Sancho was slaine in a battaile neere Porto: so as the king D. Sancho had in all fiftene children; nine lawfull, and fixe ba-rards, whereof there were seven sonnes and eight daughters. After the decease of his father, having reigned about foure yeares, when as they began to treat of a League against the King of Castile, whereof we haue made mention, certaine English and French ships being arrived at Lisbon, with many Knights and souldiers, which went to the Land, by the Streight of Gibraltar, being stayed there by foule weather, hee made vie of this occasion; and intreated these passengers to assist him at the siege of Silves, in the countrie of Algarbe; and about the same time there arrived eighteen other ships of war, which his brother-in-law Philip Earle of Flanders sent him, with which forces hee tooke Sylves, and did great harme vnto the Moores of that countrie. It was at that time when the Emperour Frederick Barbarossa, king Philip Augustus of France, and Richard king of England, called Card-Lyon, made their voyage into the East, that this towne of Silves was taken from the Moores, by the helpe of these strangers. This King Don Sancho built more townes, and peopled more countiees then any of the kings of Portugall, whereby he purchased the name of Poblador, which is as much to say, as Builder, or peopler of Townes: Valencia of Minio, Torrel-nouas, Monte-Maior the new, Batellas, Penamacor, Sortella, Penella, Figueira, Couillana, Folgacino, and Montemor, were his works, and with many other places; part of the which hee gaue to the Orders of Saint James and Auis, which began in his time in Portugall: to Saint James hee gaue Alcacar de Sal, Pamela and Almada: and to that of Auis, Valcellas, Alcanche, Geromegna, Alcantade and Alpedrin, with the castell of Mafra. He recovered Yelbes from the Moores which they had taken from Portugall.

Fort of Na-uarre betwixt Logroño and Nageta.

25 D. Alphonso king of Castile, against whom (as wee haue sayd) the other foure Christian Kings of Spaine had made a League, had not yet beene much annoyed thereby in the year 1194, therefore hee thought rather to vndertake some warre against the Moores, then to defend himselfe against his neighbours, of whom he made shew to haue so little feare, as he would not leaue any thing which he had taken, or that were in con-trouersie: nay, hee built a towne betwixt Logroño and Nageta, the which he called Nauarret, to the which he gaue many liberties and freedomes, as appears by his letters granted in an assembly at Carrion, in the year 1095. Notwithstanding all this, the Con-federats did not stirre: but Histories make mention, that D. Sancho suspected the Strong, cealed the year before 1194, and he of Leon, allyed themselves with the King of Castile, for the warre which he intended against the Moores of Andalusia: to beginne the which he sent for Chiefe and General of his armie, D. Martin Arch-bishop of Toledo, a Prelate much esteemed by the Historiographers of Spaine, by reason of his great vertues, honoured among others by Don Rodrigo his succellour, who termes Don Martin Stale, the Diademe of the Church; his wisdom and prouidence, the peace of many; his tongue

A the reformation of discipline, his hands, the releefe of the poore, and his armes, the persecution of Blasphemie, with other such Spanish elegancies, saying in the end, that the Church was happie which had such a Pastor: these are his very words. This Arch-bishop finding armes the fittest means to propagate the faith of Christ, made so furious an entry into Andalusia, as he left horrible markes throughout the whole Prouince, where he filled all with murder, ruine, fire and desolation, and then returned triumphantly, being laden with great and rich spoiles: but this expedition being suddenly made against the Moores, did afterwards bring more miserie and dishonor to the King and his Estate, then it had done profit or honor vnto the Bishop, who had shewed more rage and fury, then valour, reason, or warlike discipline.

B 26 The Arch-bishops exploit, did so incense Aben Joseph King of the Arabians, (bee-ing solicited by the Moores of Spaine) as hauing with great speed leuied a mighty armie of Africane Arabians, yea out of the regions neerest vnto the Negros, hee passed the Streight, and came into Andalusia, where he ioyned with the Moores of Spaine, and marched beyond the mountaine which they call Sierra Morena, against the Christians. King
Don Alphonso the Noble, being aduertised of this great preparation, was come to lodge at Alarcos, a fort at that time (by reason of the situation) of great Importance, whether all his vassalls and men of warre of Toledo, Extremadura, and Castile came, where hee also attended supplies from Nauarre and Leon. The Moores marching with all speede, approached neere vnto Alarcos, the Christians came beeing but weak, hauing not all their forces together: yet seeing the Moores collours flying in the ayre, the king Don Alphonso, and his Knights resolved not to keepe themselves within their rampars & Trenches, but to charge the enemy valiantly, to the end they might haue the honor of such a victorie: but it fell out otherwise, for being come to handie-strokes, the lesser number, which were the Christians did valiantly, but the Moores being the greater, vanquished, and slue many braue men: among the which D. Martin Martinez, the fourth master of the holy Knights of Calarraua dyed. The King D. Alphonso being fore wounded, saued himselfe by flight. The losse of this battaile was the losse of Alarcos, and of many Christians that were within it, who fell into the Moores hands, as many other Townes and strong places did, the Infidels seizing vpon the whole countrie, euen vnto the Ports of Yebenes, which is within fixe Leagues of Toledo. There are to be seene at this day, markes of this battaile, and of other encounters in those quarters, betwixt Ventas of Darafutan and Sacuala, in a plain called Matanga, where there are infinit heapes of stones, and many croc-ses, shewing, that in former times, there had bin much blood spilt in those places. Some charge D. Diego Lopes de Hara, saying, that he retired out of the fight too soone: others say, that hee did it expressly, and led many Knights of Castile with him, being discontented for that the King had compared the knights of Extremadura with them: saying, that they were as good horse-men, and did fight as well as the Castilians. Others accuse the king and his capitaines, that he made too great hast to fight, and had not attended the Nauarrois and Leonois, who were vpon the way, and made hast to ioine with him: so as E the fault of the one and the other, both of King, Capitaines and Knights, was to seek their owne glorie, and not that of God, nor the profit of the common-weale, and the best excuse they had, was, that they shewed themselves more valiant then wife. The kings of Na-uarre and Leon, being aduertised of this defeat, were not much troubled: for he of Na-uarre (without passing any farther) led his men home into his countrie, and the king of Leon sent backe his, the which did much discontent the king of Castile: for they abandoned him at his need, whereas if they had aduanced, they might haue stayde the Conquest, ruines and spoiles, which the Moores made after the battell: yea he noted the little Loue, and bad alliance of the King of Nauarre, who being entred into his countrie, would not vouchsafe to visit him, knowing that he was sicke of the wound, which he had receiued in F the battaile. Don Alphonso king of Leon came to Toledo to see him, although hee loued him not much better then the king of Nauarre. All this hee dissembled for the present, and reserved the reuenge till a convenient time.

The generall Historie of Spaine.

Lib. 10.

The Kings of Castile and Arragon, having not yet forces sufficient to resist so mighty an army, as that of Aben Joseph, kept themselves in the mountains of Palomera about Avila, from whence they returned against the King of Leon, hearing that the Moores were dislodged, from whom they took Alba de Liste, and al that was in the way vnto Astorga, the which having ruined, they came & laied siege to Salamanca, but they tooke it not; only they spoiled and burned the country about it, and that of Alba de Tormes, carrying away the people, and leauing it desolate: in the end they tooke Montreal, and returned victors, finding not any one to make head against them. And such was the desire of King D. Alphonso, to bee reuenged of the Kings of Nauarre and Leon, as the better to effect his will, hee neglected the iniuries and spoiles hee had received from the Miralmunim, and made a truce with him; whereby hee gaue meanes to this King of the Moores, to commit horrible cruelties in Portugal, in the yeere of our Portugal.

The Moores
spoile: of the Gra.

This Realme of Portugal was at that time visited with many afflictions, for besides the spoiles committed by the Moores, there was an extreame famine, with a great plague, whereof many died for hunger, and many left their country, especially in the country of Braga and Porto; besides the Pope did interdict the whole Realme of Portugal, for the marriage of D. Theresa with the King of Leon her kinsman, the which was concluded without his dispensation, and therefore he would dissolve it. Aben Joseph having made a truce with the King of Castille, marched towards Portugal, where hee recovered Sylua in Algarbe and Alcazar de Sal; he ruined Cezimbra and Palmela, with other places, burning and spoiling all the champion country, and carrying away innumerable poore Christians prisoners. D. Sancho King of Portugal, could by no meanes resist this mighty Barbarian King, for beside the Moores forces, hee was prest by the warre of Leon: yet soone after he recovered Cezimbra and Pamela, and repaired them, but not in the same estate they had bene. The quarrel hee had with D. Alphonso King of Leon, was the breaking of the marriage of his sister D. Theresa; In this warre hee had better successe, it may bee, for that hee did affect it with more vehemency, being most commonly seene, that the hatred betwixt kin-folkes and allies is more violent, then that against strangers. He tooke by force from the King of Leon (being otherwise weak) the townes of Tuy and Ponteuedra in Galicia, which hee held for a time. After these things, the Miralmunim of the Arabians, being assured of the King of Castille, by the truce which hee had made with him, retired to Maroc in Affrike, thinking that the Moores of Spaine were sufficient to resist all the enterprises which might bee made by Portugal, Leon and Arragon.

D. Pedro the second of that name the seuenth King of Arragon, called the Catholike.

Arragon

<sup>29</sup> D. Pedro the new King of Arragon, tooke possession of his Realme, in the yeere 1196 by the death of his father D. Alphonso; hee was furnished the Catholike, for that hee was too obedient to the Catholike church of Rome, and gaue much to Churches and Monasteries already built; hee built the Monastery of Elcarpe, vpon the riuer of Cinca, of the Order of Cisteraux, not farre from Lerida. He had three sisters, the which were married during his raigne, as hath bene sayd. As for his brother D. Alphonso who had gotten the Earldome of Prouence, hee had to wife D. Mary Niece to the Earle of Folguier, from whom issued D. Raymond Berenger, who was Earle of Prouence after his father.

Marriages of
of Arragon.

There was an other Lady of the house of Folguier, who was married to the King D. Pedro, by whom hauing one sonne, called D. Raymond Berenger, she died soone after, and her sonne also: after which the King D. Pedro married the daughter of William, Earle of Montpeller, borne of that Princess of Greece, which had bene made free

A to D. Alphonso his father. This second wife was called Mary; and for that shee was not very faire, hee was soone wearie, and would haue put her away: but Pope Innocent the third then raigning, would not yeeld vnto it, for hee was a stricke obseruer and defender of the Ecclesiastical lawes. For this cause D. Pedro went to Rome, where the Pope did him great honour, and crowned him in the church of Saint Pancrace, with a crowne of gold, garnished with pearles and precious stones of great valour; where they say hee renounced vnto the Pope, the right of Patronage to the churches of his Realme, the which his predecessors had enjoyed; and did so much forget himselfe, as to acknowledge his Kingdome to hold of the Pope, and to binde himselfe, and promise for himselfe and his successors Kings, to pay him a yeerely tribute of two hundred and fifty peeces of gold, called the Mahozemutins, of the name of the Miralmunim Aben Joseph Mahozemut, of Portugal to the Pope.

B called the Mahozemutins, of the name of the Miralmunim Aben Joseph Mahozemut, of Portugal to the Pope. These peeces were about six ryals, then current, to which acknowledgement the Noblemen of Arragon did not consent. The King being returned into his country he beganne to leade a dissolute life, and contemning his wife, he fought for those that were faire and pleasing vnto him, wherein hee wanted not men to follow his licentious appetite; wherefore the Queene his wife, who was verie holy, seeing that her husband offended God, and that, not accompanying with her, it was to bee feared the Estates of Arragon and Montpeller would fall to a stranger, for want of issue borne of them, shee found meanes to abuse him with a commendable deceit: for vnderstanding by a groomme of his chamber, called Pedro Flancon (who was sometimes a Minister of the Kings loue) that the next night he should bring him one of his Mistresses, shee wrought so with him, as hee brought her into the Kings chamber, in the concubines place, so as the King, (in this opinion) spent the night with her, but perceiving it in the morning, he was much displeased: yet considering the holy zeale of his Queene, and of those which had serued her in this action, hee was pacified, and tooke it in good part.

Queene Mary
of Hungary.

Soone after the Queene found her selfe with child, and at her time was brought in bed at Montpeller of a sonne, called D. Jaime, which they call Diego in Castille, and Jaques in French, who was heire of Arragon and Montpeller, notwithstanding that Queene Mary had one brother by the fathers side, called William, who contended for the Earldome of Montpeller, and did often attempt to kill the Infant D. Jaime. This matter was long in question in the court at Rome, whether this Princesse went in person, as well to oppose her selfe against her brother, as to end the proceffe which remained yet vndecided betwixt her and the King her husband, who sought still to bee seperated from her by Hugo Tarrogia his Ambassador. There by the sentence of Pope Innocent, William was declared a bastard, and vncapable to succeed in the Earldome of Montpeller. After this sentence, the Queene thinking to returne into Arragon, fell sicke, and died at Rome, where she was buried, at the Patian, in Saint Peters church, neere vnto the tombe of Saint Petroneilla, daughter to Saint Peter as Authors write, and was put in the Catalogue of Saints. This Princesse had bene first married to the Earle of Comingses, by whom she had two daughters Mathilde and Petroneilla.

of Arragon.

In the beginning of the raigne of this King D. Pedro, hee had a great quarrel with the Queene D. Sancho his mother, aunt to the Kings of Castille and Leon, for that the Kings Officers and Courtiers did not regard her as was fit, wherevpon shee seized vpon some townes belonging to her dowry. And for that it might breed great inconueniences, D. Alphonso the Noble, King of Castille, labored to reconcile them, for the which he and the King D. Pedro met in the towne of Ariza, where an accord was made betwixt the mother and the sonne, so as euer after they liued in peace. By this accord the townes of Ariza, Epila and Ambire, with their castles, were given by the Queene Dontager, vnto the King her sonne, and hee gaue vnto the Queene the townes of Tortose and Vazon, with some other places in the principality of Catalogne. There came to this assembly, D. Pedro d'Alagra, Lord of Albarrasin, who had bene much hated by the Kings of Castille & Arragon, but was then reconciled, of whom we haue made mention, this was in the yeere of our Lord 1200. at what time the marriage of D. Alphonso of Leon, and of D. Theresa of Portugal was dissolved by the decree of Pope Innocent the third, for that they

him whereby they might hope of releefe, being extremely preſt with hunger and want of all things they yeelded the towne, the which for the ſituation and fortification was held impregnable. By the taking of Victoria, the King of Caſtill was maſter of that other Prouince of Alaua; the country of Araya yeelded vnto him; he tooke Iruita, Maragon, Saint Croix and all the valley of Campeſo. King D. Alphonſo made this goodly conqueſt in the yeere 1200. part by force, and part by a voluntary yeelding, and did greatly diminiſh the realme of Nauarre, although that ſome places ſubmitted themſelues againe vnder the obedience of the King D. Sancho, neither did the Prouince of Alaua euer receiue any law from Caſtill, except Victoria and Treuigno. To aſſure himſelfe the better of the Guipulcoans, and to gratifie them alſo, the King of Caſtill cauſed to bee re-edified vpon the ſea coaſt of that Prouince, the townes of Guetario and Morrico, the which hee did fortiſie, and indow with great preuiledges: after all theſe things, the King of Nauarre arriued at Carthagea, and ſlip through Arragon into his country, bringing great treaſure with him out of Affrike, at what time D. Alphonſo had newly beſieged Eitella, the which was freed from ſiege vpon the bruite of his coming, (ſo great power and reputation hath the name of a king that is preſent) but if he had ſtayed longer in Affrike his country of Nauarre had bene wholly loſt: hauing viſibly ſene the great harme which the King D. Alphonſo had done him, hee ſent Ambaſſadors vnto him, to deſire him to reſtore him that which hee had taken from him in his abſence, againſt al law and iuſtice, and againſt the accuſtomed manner of making warre in that age full of loyalty: but the King of Caſtill entertained him with delaies and doubtfull answers.

32 Whileſt that D. Sancho conſiders of his loſſes, and of the beſt meanes to reſtore them, the King of Caſtill great, mighty, and redoubted, being allied to him of Arragon, and hauing a truce for many yeeres with Ahen Joſeph, hee beganne to reſtore the ruines which the Arabians had made: he reſtored the city of Plaiſance, Bejar and other places of the country ruined: hee did the like to Mirabel, Segura de la Serra, Monfredo, Moy, and many other places of the realme of Toledo: hee alſo built Aguilar del Campo in Caſtill: and moreouer in Guipulco, hee built the towne of Caltro d' Ordiales, Lareto, Saint Ander and Saint Vincent de la Barquera.

About the yeere 1201. there was a peace treated of betwixt John, ſucceſſor to Richard King of England, and King Philip Auguſtus of France, at Bourauant in Normandy, by the which amongſt other Articles, a marriage was concluded betwixt the Infanta D. Blanche the daughter of D. Alphonſo King of Caſtill, and Queene Elenor, ſiſter to the King of England, with Lewis eldeſt ſonne to Philip, and heire of the realme of France: for the which, Ambaſſadors were ſent from both Kings into Caſtill, & they were made ſure by a Deputy for Lewis, in the city of Burgos, with great feaſting and ſtate, and the Infanta was conducted by the King her father, and other Noblemen of Caſtill vnto the frontiers of Guienne, where the Deputies for the French King did receiue her, for whoſe dowry there was aſſigned by King John her vncl, all the places which were in queſtion betwixt him and the French King, whereof the ſayd French King was in poſſeſſion, in the Dutchie of Normandy, Britaine and Aniou.

At the ſame time D. Alphonſo King of Leon, ſeperated by the authority of Pope Innocent, from D. Therſa of Portugal his wife, ſent to demand D. Berenguela, the King of Caſtills other daughter: whereof (by reaſon of the diſcords which were betwixt theſe two Kings) the father made ſome difficulty; yet vanquiſhed by the perſuaſions and intreaty of Queene Elenor, who deſired as much to ſee her daughter weare a crowne, as a peace betwixt Caſtill and Leon, he yeelded vnto it, and theſe two Princes meeting to that effect in the towne of Vaileddol, the marriage was celebrated, aſſigning her for her dowry, the lands taken the yeere before from the king of Leon, except Carpio and Monreal, which remained to Caſtill. Of this marriage was borne the Infant D. Fernand, who ſucceeded in the Realme of Caſtill and Leon. Thinke, that the Popes diſpenſation was not obtained for this marriage: for being couſin germain ſonnes, children of the vncl and nephew, Pope Innocent the third, did ſeperate them.

In the yeers 1202 and 1203, the ancient preuiledges granted by the Kings of Nauar, vnto

A vnto Saint Sebaſtian and Fontarabie, townes of Guipulco, were confirmed and augmented by the Kings of Caſtill, and their iuriſdiction ſymet, ſpecially of Fontaraby, by the riuers of Oriſgun and Vidaſo, which diuides that Prouince from France, and by the mountaine Pegnadaya, by Leceſa, by Belfa and the ſea, and by Hirun vranu, which is at this preſent a great Bourg, at which time Queene Elenor was deliuered of her laſt ſon, who was called D. Henry, by reaſon of his grand-father by the mothers ſide.

To theſe contents was added a truce betwixt this King D. Alphonſo the Noble, and D. Nauarre, Sancho the ſtrong, King of Nauarre, for the concluding whereof, D. Sancho came in perſon, vpon aſſurance, to Guadalaſara in Caſtill, there it was agreed there ſhould be a ceſſation of armes betwixt the two Kingdomes, for five yeeres, with reſtitution of ſome of thoſe places which the King of Caſtill had taken in Nauarre, and for the keeping of the truce, there were deliuered into the hands of certaine knights, named by both parties, the caſtles of Abufeio, Clauijo and Iuvera, for Caſtill; and Irueta, Inzula and Saint Adrian for the King of Nauarre: and for that the warre betwixt Nauarre and Arragon continued ſtill, the King of Caſtill tooke vpon him to reconcile them, and in the meane time cauſed al acts of hoſtility to ceaſe.

Theſe four Princes being at peace, he of Leon moued new troubles againſt D. Vrraca Lepo, Lepo, his mother in law, with whom hee could neuer agree, ſeeking to fruſtrate her other doury. And ſhe for her part did neuer ceaſe practiſing againſt D. Alphonſo, ſeeking to depole him from the royal throne of Leon, and to aduance the Infant D. Sancho her ſonne; for the which ſhe did continually importune her brother, D. Diego Lopez de Haro, Lord of Biſcay, intreating him to embrace this buſineſſe, the which hee had deſerred vntil that time, when as hee went to field to aide the Queene his ſiſter: but he was not the ſtrongelt for D. Alphonſo King of Leon, being aſſiſted by the King of Caſtill, his father in law, chaſed him into Nauarre, from whence hee made roades into the territories of Caſtill, which made the two vnited Kings to goe and ſeeke him in his owne ſtrength, where they defeated him in bataille, neere vnto Eſtella, where hee was forced to ſaue himſelfe, which towne was inueſted and, as it were, beſieged by the armies of Caſtill and Leon, yet they could not take it. Vpon this occaſion the four Kings of Caſtill, Leon, Nauarre and Arragon met together in Alſaro, whether alſo came D. Sancho, Douager of Arragon, mother to the King D. Pedro, by the which the reconciliations and accords of theſe Princes were confirmed. D. Lepo being deſtitute of all meanes, hee retired in deſpight vnto the Moores pay at Valencia, and from thence to Maroc, where hee was accuſed to the counsell of the Miralmutin, that hee had mounted D. Pedro, King of Arragon, on horſe-backe, being ouerthrowne in an incounter, which hee had againſt the Moores of Valencia, vnder whoſe pay D. Diego made warre, yet hee was abſolved.

The pittifull death of the Infant D. Fernand, brother to D. Sancho King of Nauarre, a Prince well beloued of the Nauarrois, ought to bee regiſtred amongſt the calamities which fell vpon that realme in thoſe daies. The feaſt of Saint Nicholas being celebrated with ſuperfluous bankets and ſports, in the yeere 1207. in the towne of Tudele, according to the cuſtome of Chriſtians, as this generous Prince did tunne on horſe-backe armed, doing ſome exerciſes which hee had inuented, a hog paſſing through his horſes legges, made him to fall, in ſuch manner, as hee bruſed his head againſt a pillar of ſtoone whereof hee died, thirteene daies after, being thirty yeeres old. Of this Prince, whom the Authors commend for a braue and valiant Knight, there is no mention made in the warre betwixt Caſtill and Nauarre: wherefore it is to bee preſumed that the King his brother, doubting leaſt hee ſhould attempt ſome thing to his preiudice, during his abſence, had led him with him into Affrike, although hee loued him deere-ly. Thus are the affaires of this world mingled with pleaſure and grieſe, loue and ſealouſie.

Of the marriage which had bene made the yeere before, betwixt D. Alphonſo Infante of Portugal, ſon to the King D. Sancho then reigning, and D. Vrraca daughter to D. Alphonſo King of Caſtill, was this yeere 1207. a ſon borne called D. Sancho, as his grand-father by the fathers ſide, in whoſe life time this Lady was deliuered of an other ſonne, sonne, who was named D. Alphonso, the which were Kings of Portugal successively. A Aben Ioseph Miralumin of the Arabians Almohades being dead in Affrike, whilst these things past in Spaine, there succeeded in his place his sonne called Aben Mah- mad, surnamed the Greene, the fourth King of that sect, over the Moores of Affrike and Spaine: this surname was given him, for that hee carried a Miter, or some such Ornament on his head, of a Greene colour. In his raigne the truce expired, made betwixt the King of Castile, and his predecessor Aben Ioseph, when as they fell more cruelly to armes them euer.

King of Castile, and thus pressed the King of Arragon to arms them euer.

33. Betwixt both, D. Martin Archbishop of Toledo died, to whom succeed Roderigo Ximenes, borne in Nauarre, the Author of the History of Spain which we read at this day. A prelate of great authority, and much commended by the Spaniards: about the time of his death the riuer of Tayo did rise so high, as it was five foote above the port of Almofala in that city. This was about the end of December, and the yeere before there was to be great an Eclipse of the Sunne, as the day was darkned for the space of sixe houres. At that time King D. Alphonso did two remarkable works in the city of Burgos in Castille: which were the Monastery of Saint Mary the royal, of that Order called de las Huelgas, for the daughters of noble houses, according to the Order of the Cisterciens: and ioyning to this Monastery, hee caused the Hospital royal to be built in Castille: and ioyning to this Monastery, hee caused the Hospital royal to be built in Castille, since the coming of the Moores, and drew many learned men in all faculties thither, from France, England and other places, assigning large pensions to the professors: and as he was a warlike Prince, and could not lie long in quiet, the quarrels rising betwixt the French and English, about the yeere 1209. hee made a voyage into Guienne, for that hee had an interest therein, yet he returned without doing any thing memorable. Returning by the Prouince of Guipuscoa, hee gaue priuiledges to the towne of Guetaria, the which he reformed, granting the like vnto Saint Sebastian. This towne hath a good haueu, couered from all windes, by a little Island which is before it, ryfing in such manner, as it defends the ships from all stormes, and giues them free entry and passage with any winde: that famous pilot John Sebastian del Cano, was borne at Guetaria, in the time of the Emperor Charles the fifth did cōpasse the whole world.

The yeere 1210. being come, and the truce betwixt the Moores and Christians expired, D. Alphonso the noble sent an army vnto the frontiers of Toledo vnder the conduct of his sonne D. Fernand, knowing that King Aben Mahumad was past out of Affrike

A Affrike Into Spaine with great forces of Moores, Almohades, and other his subiects. This young Prince D. Fernand impatient of offencible, began to ouerrunne the Moores country, about Baeca, Andujar and Jaen: but for all this, the Mooye did not leave to besiege and to take within the third month the towne of Saluatierra, with great slaughter of the inhabitants, carrying away them that remained for slaues. The King of Castille had drawne his forces together at Talauera, to diuert him, but not able to come in time, hee retired, and to be after lost his sonne D. Fernand, in Madrid, by sickness, whereat hee was wonderfully grieved; his bodie was carried to Burgos, to the new Monasterie of Las Huelgas, D. Rodrigo the Archbishop accompanying it, with many other Prelats and Knights, yea D. Iheronima Queene of Leon, being separated from her husband by the Popes authority, who would not allow of the marriage, although hee had children by her. It is strange these Princes were no better aduised in the marriage of their daughters, seeing they obayed the Popes restraints.

This warre begunne did much trouble the King of Castille, wherefore hauing called a Parliament of the Lords, Prelate and Deputies of the townes of his realme at Toledo, he reholued to inuite al Christian Princes to his succour, and to demanda of Pope Clement the Indulgences and pardons of a Croisado, for this holy warre, to the ende he might draw into it more Knights and foildiers , for this cause hee sent by the election of the whole assembly D.Rodrigo to Rome; and for that necessity did force him to reforme the excessse and superfluities of his Realmes ; there were orders lest downe for fasting, apparel, and other things . There were also publicke processions enioyned, with fasting, praying, and giuing of almes to pacifie the wrath of God.

In the end commandement was giuing to all his vassalls and men of warre, to bee redie with horse and armes, for the yeare following. The like prouision was made by the Moores in Spaine, every one preparing for the warre: that is, of Extremadura, Andalusia, Algarbes, Granado, Murcia and Valencia, and other lands which they held yet in the territory of Toledo; Iollycinding moreover their King and Miralmmun of Affrike, to repaife into Spaine, with the forces of those great Princes, which he did hold in that part of the world.

Whileſt theſe great preparations were making, the King of Caſtile came to Cuenca, where finding himſelf accompanied with great troops of ſouldiers, he came a road into the Moores country by the river of Xucar, to exerciſe his ſouldiers, and took from thence the fort of Alcala, Las Cúcuas of Algarande, and Tubas, and ſpoiled ſome Bourges in the territory of Valencia, and then hee returned to Cuenca, when the King of Arragon came unto him, and offered to ſuccour him with all the forces of his realme, in this warre; the King of Nauarre in like manner ſent to make him like offers.

In Italie the Archbishop D. Rodrigo, yeld great dilligence, and obtained from Pope Innocent the third a bountifull grant of his spiritual treasors, of indulgences and pardons, to all those that should crosse themselves for this warre, the which was proclaimed in all places, and the Croisadoes preached, especially by the Archbishop of Toledo, in all places as hee returned, with such efficacy, as there came out of Italy, Germany, France and England an infinite number of souldiers into Spaine, who vowed their lives to defend the Christian religion, and to repulle the persecutors thereof: so as hee assembled at Toledo an army (besides the forces of Castille, Arragon and Portugal) of above a hundred thousand strangers, bearing armes, which number is by some augmented, and by others diminished: for there are some Authors which mention, one hundred thousand foote, and tenne thousand horse, others reframe it to fifty thousand foote, and twelve thousand horse, some more, some lesse; but howsoever, there was great and mightie army, the which was lodged neere unto the city, in the most fertile places of the river of Tayo. The King of Arragon came thither, as the Authors of the Arragon History write with twenty thousand foote, and 3500. horse, the number of footemen of Castille, and other countries of the King D. Alphonso's dominions was vncertaine, but they say there were 14000. horse, amongst the which were above fifteen hundred Knights nobly descended. Of them of Portugal the number is not which fel vpon his men, and to thrust himselfe into the presse, where hee saw they gaue a backe, to succour them: so as the Lords and Prelats which were in armes that day, had great labor to keepe him back, D. Pedro King of Arragon had his cuirasse peirced to the quicke, with a lance, but God preserued him. The King of Nauarre did also carry himselfe worthily; but there was a Chanoine Chanter of the church of Toledo, called Domíngo Páscual, who carried the crosse before the Archbishop D. Roderigo (as it is the custome to carry before Primates which did wonders: for hee past and re-past, and ranne through the squadrons of the Moores with his crosse, and had no harme. The tombe of this Chanoine is to bee seene at this day, in Saint Lucies chappel, in the great church of Toledo. It is a pittie the Authors of these histories, haue not bene more iust vnto those valiant men which employed themselves that daie, to maintaine the Christians estate in Spaine, and haue not written many particularities which happened during the fight, which should redound to the honour of families, and their posterities, and should serue as a spurte to generous mindes; wherein the Archbishop D. Roderigo, is chiefly to be blamed, hauing bene present at that battaile. The victorious army pursued them that fled vntill night, and then they went to lodge in the enemies campe, where they found tents, viuals, armes and other riches in great abundance, & there they past the night, giuing thanks vnto God for such an important victory.

Then the King D. Alphonso thought it fit to diuide the spoiles, and to doe publicke honor, after the manner of the ancients, to those great personages, which had carried them valiantly in the battaile. He named for Iudge and distributor of these things, D. Diego Lopes de Haro, a Nobleman very expert in matters of warre: by whom the tent of the Miralumin of the Arabians was giuen to D. Pedro King of Arragon, the which was exceeding rich; yet others say it was allotted to the King of Nauarre for his part; to whom (for that hee with his men had first broken the fortification made with chains, about the Squadron where the great Miralumin person was in battaile) was adiudged all the bootie taken within the said circuit, in the which were many camels with their burthens; for which consideration some say, that the Kings of Nauarre carrie in their armies, chains of gold in a field gueules. Of the rest of the spoiles which were sold without this fortification, there was a good part thereof giuen to the King of Arragon. D. Diego Lopes did adiudge vnto D. Alphonso for his part, the honour of the victory, and to the other captaines, knights and souldiers, what they could get. This diuision was allowed by the Kings and all the rest. Many haue thought that by reason of this victory King D. Alphonso tooke a castle Or, in a field gueules, which are the armes of Castille at this daie, inferring thereby, that the realme of Castille was a fort and assured rampart against the Moores, and Infidels their enemies; in whose blood the Tower seemes to be planted, but there are priuiledges found in the treasury of Saint Dominike of Calçada (the which Caribey reports that he hath seene) more ancient then this battaile, granted by this king, hauing a scale of lead like vnto the Popes, the which hath on the one side a castle, and on the other, the picture of a king on horsebacke, the which doth witness that before the battaile of Muradal, or Tolouse, they used this deuise, or blason in their armessit is like that this King D. Alphonso used it first in his armes, but vpon what else consideration, it is neither easie nor safe to iudge. The Christian Princes making vse of this happy victory, whilst the Moores were amazed and weake, tooke Bicles, Castro Peral, Bagnos and Tolouse: then they came to Baeca, which they found abandoned, the inhabitants hauing carried their wiues, children, and all they had to Vbeda, except some which were fortified in the Megida, the which they burned.

Then they marched to Vbeda, and tooke it by force, putting many of the Inhabitants to the sword, and making slaves of the rest, by the instigations of some Prelats which followed the army, the spoile whereof was giuen to the soldiers; the honor of the taking of Vbeda, is giuen to D. Lope Ferreñch de Luna, an Arragonois; as they went on still conquering vpon this sect of Mahumetists, it pleased God to slay the Christians army: for it began to be full of diseases, the which in the end were contagious: wherefore the kings were forced to retorne with their campe, and re-passing the mountaine, or Sierra Morena, by the same mount of Muradal, they came to Calatrana, where they found the Duke

A Duke of Austria, whose name was Thibaud sonne to Leopold, who being desirous to bee at this battell, was come into Spaine with two hundred knights; but it was too late, wherefore he returned into Germany by Arragon: there the Kings parted with great shewes of loue. He of Arragon meaning to entertaine the peate with Don Sancho of Nauarre, with all sinceritie, he restored vnto him fourteen castles and places of strength which he had taken from him. The King D. Alphonso being come to Toledo, where hee was received with great triumph by the Arch-bishop Don Roderigo; it was obtained; that from that time the memorie of that great victorie obtained against the Moores, in the playntes of Tholouza, should be euery yeare celebrated on the sixteenth day of Iuly, vnder the title of Triumphus crucis, the which is obserued at this day, especially at Toledo; whereas they

B hang vp and display that day in the great Church, many Guidons, Ensignes and Standards of the Moores, which had bene taken then, or others which do represent them: The chiefe men which did accompany the King in this battaile, were Don Roderigo Ximenes Arch-bishop of Toledo, and Primate of Spaine, Don Roderigo of Sigüenza; D. Tello of Palencia, D. Mendo of Ofina, D. Pedro of Auita, D. Domíngo of Plaisance, all Bishoppes, with other Prelates, all which did serue, either for counsell or for armes. D. Pedro Arias, or Aus, Master of the Order of Saint James, D. Roderigo Díaz, master of the Calatrana, D. Gomes Ramires Prior of the Templers, D. Gutierrez or John Gelmirido Prior of S. John, with many Commanders and Knights of their Orders. Of Secular men, D. Diego Lopes de Haro, and his eldest sonne D. Lope Díaz de Haro, of whom it is written, that hauing some feeling, for that his father had absented himselfe out of Castile, after that hee had fought at Estella against the king D. Alphonso, and also for that the losse of the battaile of Alarcos was imputed vnto him, he came and cast himselfe at his feet, a little before the battell, beseeching him to carry himselfe so well, according to the hope which hee had of him, that he might not be hereafter called the sonne of a traitor: wherewith the father being incensed, layed vnto him: It is more to be feared, thou wilt be called the son of a whore: for no man will call thee the sonne of a traitor: which answer the father made vnto the sonne, as the Earle D. Pedro sonne to D. Denis king of Portugal writes in his booke of the Genealogies of Spaine, for that the mother of Don Lope Díaz, a woman of a weake brayne, being fallen in loue with a man of Burgos, which, they say, had bene a blacksmith, or Locksmith, went out of Spain, and wandered through the world with this man, in a disguised habit. With D. Diego Lopes was also D. Pero Díaz his other sonne, D. Sancho Fernandes de Canamero, D. Martin Nùgues de Hinojosa, and Don Trigo de Mendoza, kinsmen or allyed to the house of Haro: moreover, the Earles D. Fernand de Lara, D. Aluar Nùgues de Lara, Don Gonzalo Nùgues, D. Lope Díaz de los Cameros, Ruy Díaz de los Cameros, and his brother Don Aluar Díaz, Don Pedro Arias of Toledo, Gomes Peres the Asturian, D. García Ordóñez, John Gonzalo of Vzero, D. Gonzalo Gomes, D. Gomes Adanrigues, D. Gil Manriques, D. Alphonso Telles de Meneses, and his brethren, Fernand and Ruy Garcia, D. Roderigo Peres d' Auita, William Gizez, D. William Peres and his brethren, Nugno Peres de Gusman, Gonzalo of Quintana, who was afterwards master of the Calatrana, Don John Gonzales, and Don Gonzalo Ruiz and his brethren, Don Ruy Peres of Villalobos, Suero Tellez, Don Fernand Garcia, and many others of the Realmes of Castille and Toledo. Those which accompanied Don Pedro king of Arragon of greatest Nobilitie, were, Don García Frontin Bishop of Tarasone, and Don Berenguer elect of Barcelona, with other Clergie men: and of Knights, Don García Remus, Standard bearer royal of Arragon, Don Ximen Cornel, Aznar Perde, Don William of Peralta, Don Michele of Luceza, D. Sancho Earle of Rossillon, vncle to the King, and Don Nugno Sanchez his son, Don Lope Ferreñch de Luna, Arnold of Alarcos, or Arial of Alagon, William Aguilon of Tarragoba, Don William of Cetiera, Berenguer of Petra Mola, Don William of Catodona, Raymond Foniques Earle of Ampurias, Don Pedro Ahones, Don Roderigo of Liciana, Don Pedro Maza, Don Antorella, and Don Antal de Forci. The Arch-bishop of Bourdeaux came out of France, and the Bishop of Nantes from Britannie, D. Romild Arch-bishop of Narbone, and Thibaud of Blazon, Bishop of Poitou, issued out of Castile: There were many Noblemen and valiant Knights out of Leon and Portugal. Don Alphonso king of Castile did reward the Nobilitie of his countrie with honours and linings, according to the young king was deliuered, and led by him into his Countie, where hee was received and crowned at Monçon, and then tooke and receiued the oath at Lerida. It was ordaind in these assemblies of Monçon and Lerida, that Don Sancho Earle of Rossillon should gouerne the realme during the kings minority, but they gaue him limitation. The kings person was recommended to Friar William of Monredon, Master of the Templers, to whom was giuen for an Assistant, Friar Raymond of Pegnafort, a Castellan, he that compiled the books of the Decretals, and did write arguments in cases of conscience, whereof there shall be more ample mention made. Don Sancho Earle of Rossillon of a Regent, became a tyrant, and did in time much trouble the king Don James. These things past in this manner in Arragon, the yeare after the victory of Muradal, or Tholoufa.

In Nauarre, the king D. Sancho the Strong, at his returne from Castile, found great disorders and mutinies among his subiects, especially in the city of Pampelone, which grew by the young maydens of the towne, who had injured one another: and as oftentimes a small coale kindles a great fire, which burnes a house, yea a whole citie, so these petty brabbles made all the Inhabitants fall into factions, those of the Bourg of Saint Sernin, and Saint Michel, to defend the female kind, fell to blowes and murders, the which could not be prevented in the Kings absence, who by his presence pacified and reconciled them for a time: but being afterwards retired to his castell of Tudele, where he would not see any man, by reason that the incurable griefe in his foot increased daily, the young men of Pampelone renewed their insolencies and quarrels, so as one day those of Saint Sernin and Saint Michel falling to armes, their fury and rage was such, as there were about 800. slaine vpon the place, both men, wiues, and virgins, and many houses were burnt: such was their furious rage one against another, the which caused the King Don Sancho to leaue his voluntarie prison, to pacifie it, as he did.

39 Among other remedies which might serue hereafter, hee found that peace could not continue long among a people, where there was a multitude of idle youth, and that of necessitie there must grow daily quarrels among them, if there were not means found out to employ them. Seeing then that his subiects were giuen to armes, more then to any other exercise, he resolved, seeing there was no warre with his neighbors, to make a garrison vpon the Moores frontiers, whether the young men of the countie should be kept, to be trained vp in martiall discipline, and to practise armes honorably against the enemies of Christ: for this cause he intreated the king D. James, or those which did then gouerne his Realme of Arragon, to sell him the fruites and possession of the townes of Ademus, Castelfabib, Ferreta, Ferrelon, and Calamator, for his life, to make them a scholl for armes: the which hee obtained, confirming also by the same mediators the peace which had bene concluded betwixt the kings Don Sancho, and Don Pedro, some yeares before, the which began to be troubled betwixt these two estates.

D. Alphonsus king of Castile, hauing suffered his soldiers to rest some time in their houses, drew his army againe together, in the yeare 1213. and recovered the Castell of Duegnas, which he restored to the Order of Calatraua: he also tooke the Castile of Ezna Vexor, the which he gaue to the Order of Saint James: from thence hee came and planted his campe before the towne of Alcatras, seated vpon a very high and rough part of the mountaine called Sierra Morena, the which hee tooke without any great difficulty, the Moores being yet amazed at the defeat they had the yeare before, and then hauing feazed vpon many other places with the like ease, hee returned to Toledo, where the Queene D. Elenor his wife, and D. Berenguela his daughter, with the Infant Don Henry attended him. There was a great famine that yeare in Spaine, when as Don Rodrigo Ximenes the Arch-bishop, did much good by his preaching, perswading the rich to releue the poore: for which consideration the King did afterwards giue many places to him and his successors Arch-bishops, the which did much augment the reuenues of that See; honouring moreover the sayd Don Rodrigo, and his successors Arch-bishops, with the title of High Chancellors of Castile.

The Kings of Castile and Leon had bene no very good friends, vpon diuers occasions, but now lately by reason of the diuorce betwixt the King of Leon and his wife D. Berenguela, daughter of Castile, the which was partly the cause why the king of Leon was not at the battell of Muradal: but this yeare (all hatred forgotten) the two kings had an interview in the towne of Vailledolit, whereas it was agreed, that Carpio and Montreall should be restored to the King of Leon, vpon condition, that he should raze them, and that he should make warre against the Moores: for the execution whereof D. Diego Lopez de Haro was sent to accompany Don Alphonsus king of Leon, with a good number of souldiers. The places being ruined, the king of Leon went against the Moores of Alcantara vpon the river of Tayo, on the confines of Portugall, the which hee tooke: whereas since he did institute an Order of Knights, like vnto that of Calatraua. This king D. Alphonsus of Leon, is numbred the tenth of that name by them that mingle the kings of Castile and Leon together. We haue sayd before that he had two wiues, the one was daughter to Don Sancho the first king of Portugall, called Donna Theresa; of which marriage issued Don Fernand, who died before his father, Donna Sancho, and D. Dulce: being afterwards separated by the Popes authoritie, for that they were cousins in the third degree: he married to his second wife Donna Berenguela, daughter to Don Alphonsus the Noble, king of Castile, of whom was borne Don Fernand, who was King of Castile and Leon, and Don Alphonsus who came to be Lord of Molina, and had moreover two daughters by this Lady Donna Constance, a Nunne in las Huelgas of Burgos, and Donna Berenguela, who married with the Earle John de Brenne, whom they termed king of Ierusalem. This second marriage was also dissolved, for that Donna Berenguela was daughter to her husbands cousin-germaine, & therefore Don Alphonsus had a friend, which brought him a bastard, called Don Rodrigo Alphonsus of Leon.

After the taking of Alcantara, Don Diego Lopes de Haro came vnto the king of Castile, who being entred into Andalusia besieged Baeca, which the Moores had rampared: but by reason of the great dearth, he raised the siege, and returned to Calatraua, where hauing left Don Rodrigo the Arch-bishop, to order all things vpon the frontier, he came to Burgos. The Arch-bishop began to build the new towne of Milagro, where the worke-men were charged by the Moores, who made a great slaughter of them, and of many of the people which began to inhabit it: for the which the Arch-bishop provided as well as he could, and made a truce with the enemy in the Kings name. Being returned to the king to Burgos he resolved to make a voiage into Guienne, where hee had some pretensions, in the right of Queene Elenor his wife: Before his departure, hee would conferre with Don Alphonsus king of Portugal, his sonne-in-law, sending to intreate him to meete him at Plaisance, on a certaine day: but being vpon the way he fell sicke in Garci Mugnos a Bourg of Arealuo, where he was forced to stay: then did his griefe increase, by the answer hee receiued from the King of Portugal, who sent him word, hee would not passe the limits of his kingdome, by reason whereof hee was so much moued with choller, as he dyed, in the yeare 1214. the five and fiftieth yeare of his raigne, and the nine and fiftieth of his age: his body was carried to Burgos, whereas his funerals were made, and interred in the Monasterie of las Huelgas, with the teares and griefe of all Spaine.

D. Henry the first of that name, the eighth King of Castile.

41 IN his place reigned his sonne D. Henry the first of that name in Castile and Toledo, who was but eleven yeares old: whereupon the Prelats, Nobles and Commons assembled at Burgos, where hauing declared him king, and taken the oath, they made the Queene Donna Elenora his mother, Gouvernesse of his person and Realme: but the suruiued her husband but 25. dayes, and was interred in the same Monasterie. By her decree Donna Berenguela the kings sister gouerned both him and his Realme, who carried herself verily to the contentment of all the Estates, during her administration. She was Ladie of Vailledolit, Mugnos, Curiel, Gormas, Saint Stephen, of the castell of Burgos, and other places and rents assigned by Don Alphonsus her father. During her regency the Councell of Latran was celebrated at Rome, vnder Pope Innocent the third with a great great concourse of Prelates from all parts of Christendome. Whither there went D. Roderigo Ximenes Arch-bishop of Toledo and Primate of Spaine: the Arch-bishop of Braga, the Bishop of Vic, and other Prelates of Spain. There were about 300. at this assembly, which did exercise chiefly dignities in the church, besides others innumerable of all estates, they did chiefly treat of the means how to uphold the Christians estate in Palestina, or the holy Land: then of the rights of Patronage and reception of fruits and renewes of Churches by lay men. The Archbishop Don Roderigo preached with the Popes leave, in the assembly, very learnedly in Latin, according unto those times: and for that that language was not well understood by all that were there present, he expounded the substance of his Sermon in Italian, Germane, French, English, Castilian, and Biscain, or Navarrais which was his naturall tongue, for the which he was much commended and esteemed, as Garybay saith, next to Doctor Blaz Ortiz, which done, and the Councell freed of the affaires which touched the generall of Christendome: the Archbishop D. Roderigo complained of the contumacie and disobedience of the Arch-bishops of Narbone, Tarragone, Braga, and Saint James, who would not acknowledge the Primacie of Toledo: to prove the which he produced many priuiledges of the holy Apostolike see, especially of these Popes, Vrbain, Gelasius, and Honorius the 2. Lucius the 3. Adrian the 4. and Innocent the 2. granted to the Church of Toledo, and the Prelates thereof, as Primates of Spaine. He alledged many ancient Councils celebrated in Spaine, and iustified the equitie of his cause, by many ancient Histories and authentick Records. The Pope desired to heare the parties interrested: wherefore the Archbishop of Braga being present, answered for himselfe: for him of Tarragone who was absent, the Bishop of Vic, one of his Suffragans presented himselfe, both which denied the Primacie. They of Narbone and Saint James were excused, being absent. And for that the Archbishop D. Roderigo Ximenes was prest to returne into Spaine, the proceſſe remained for that time undecided, yet he obtained from the Pope many great prouisions, which were both profitable and honorable, as to be Legate of Spaine for ten yeares, with power to make legitimate to the number of three hundred, with other ample faculties: right to chooſe and establish Bishops in all the townes which should come into the Christians power, and that the Church of Seuille in that case should acknowledge the Primacie of Toledo, without any fute: and that the Arch-bishop thereof should dispose of all other Ecclesiastical dignities, in places conquered, or to be conquered. This Archbishop D. Roderigo Ximenes, hath written the Historie of Spaine in Latine vnto his time, and in like manner that of the Moores or Arabians since Mahomet.

Travels during the minority of D. Henry king of Cas-
tile.

The young king delivered into the hands of them of Lara.

HE Arch-bishop D. Rodrigo Ximenes being returned into Castile, found the affaires wonderfully troubled by the praesides of D.
Fernand Nugnes de Lara, D. Aluar Nugnes, and D. Gonçalo Nug-nes, his brethren, sonnes to the Earle D. Nugno de Lara, who (as their fathers and Vncles had done during the Nonnage of the king
D. Alphonso the Noble) would haue the person of the young king Henry in their custodie, by which meanes they should haue all au-thoritie and prerogative in the gouernement of the state. These Noblemen, who were great and mightie, wrought so, as they had what they pretended, by the meanes of Garcia Laurens, who had the gouernement of the Prince, and in whom the Queene Regent did rely much. They corrupted him by gifts and promises, so as hee counsellled the Queene D. Berenguela, and caused the Prelates, and other Noblemen of the Realme to allow thereof, that the king should be put into the hands of these Noblemen of the house of Lara: whereunto Don Rodrigo Ximenes the Arch-bishop did also consent, so as they did homage, and did sweare faith and loyaltie in the hands of the Regent, not to attempt nor change any thing in matter of State, were it in peace or war, without her counsell and consent, whom they should honor and respect, as it was fittest should defend her, her estates and goods in all occasions, vpon paine to be held guiltie of high treason. These promises being made by the Lords of Lara, the king D. Henry was delivered into the hands of the Earle D. Aluar Nugnes: but they did not performe what they had promised, for as soone as they saw themselves seized of the Kings person, and therefore reuerenced and feared, they began to pursue many great personages and rich men with all violence, so as some were forced to flee. Moreover, falling vpon the liberties, goods, and reuenues of the Clergie, they made their profit of them: whereupon they were excommunicated by Don Rodrigo Deane of Toledo, Vice-gerent or Substitute to the Arch-bishop, the which did reclaim them from these insolencies, especially against the Clergie and Churches, whereof they promised to become Protectors.

But

A But for that it is a hard matter to retrain great men, when they are once giuen to tyranny, these Earles of Lara turned against lay-men, which enjoyed spirituall liuings, whom they did vex and spoile of their reuenues, so as they grew odious to all sorts of men, and they began to be moued, and to repine much at their excesses. D. Aluar who had bene newly made Earle of Auila, called an assembly of the Estates in the Kings name at Vailledolit, whither came certaine of his confederates, great men of Castile: but D. Lope Diaz de Haro, sonne to D. Diego Lord of Biscay, D. Gonçalo Ruiz Giron, and his brethren, D. Rodrigo Ruiz, D. Aluar Diaz de los Cameros, and Don Alphonso Teles de los Atenses, with many other Noblemen of the Kingdome, detesting this tyrannie, exhorted the Queene to complaine of the extorsions, miseries and calamities, which the people and whole Realme suffered by their meanes: according to which aduice, she did write to the Earle Don Aluar Nugnes, putting him in mind of the faith and homage which hee had sworne to her, and admonishing him to gouerne better: wherewith D. Aluar being incensed, he did all the wrong he could vnto the Queene, and in the end dispossest her of all that the King her father had left her for her portion, yea he grew so insolent, as he commanded her to depart the Court; the which this poore Princesse was forced to do, retiring with her sister D. Elenor, who was yet a mayd, to Ocella, where they remained vntill the death of D. Henry their brother. This violent contempt was not concealed from the young King, who began to complaine, demanding to be deliuered againe vnto the Queene D. Berenguela his sister, but it was in vaine: for he himselfe being forced and resisting all he could, was led from place to place, as it pleased the Earle Don Aluaro: and which was more, he was forced by him to marry D. Malfada Infanta of Portugal, daughter to the King D. Sancho, without imparting it to the Prince, nor to the Princeses of the blood: not to any but to his owne faction: which marriage hee beganne to broach at Palencia, where they were made sure; and suddenly being come to Medina del campo, hee caused them to lye together, wherewith the Queene D. Berenguela was so moued (being not made acquainted with this treaty) as he wrote vnto Pope Innocent the third, aduer-tising him that the married couple were so neere akin, as according to the ordonances of the Church, they could not be ioyned together without scandall, by whose meanes the Pope did separate them: wherupon D. Malfada (who was a very faire Princesse) returned into Portugal very much discontented, as well for the breach of the marriage, as for that Don Aluaro would presume to marrie her, the king D. Henry being an infant. They were cousins in the fourth degree by an vnequall line, wherof the Infanta had the better. Some Authors report it after this manner, that the Queene D. Berenguela hauing sent one to Maqueda, where the king was, to carry him newes of his Estate, the Earles of Lara hauing intelligence thereof, caused him to be apprehended and put in prison, and hauing counterfeited letters, to some priuate men of base condition, from the Queene, as if she would haue procured them to payson the king, they caused this prisoners proceesse to bee made, who was for that cause hanged: yet not any one did beleue, that euer the Queene D. Berenguela, would practise such a trecherie; but held it to be a fraud, deuised by the Earle D.
Nugnes, and D. Aluar his sonne. Wherefore the Inhabitants of Maqueda beganne to mu-tine, which made the King and his Gouernors to go to Huelat: where being arrived, a Knight called Rodrigo Gonçales de Valuerd, who had charge from the Queene D. Berenguela, to steale away the king, Don Fernand de Lara layed hold of him, and carryed him prisoner to Alarcon.

This made the Earles of Lara to keepe a more streight guard about the King, whome they conducted to Vailledolit, and there beganne the warre against them, which held the Queenes partie. Montalegre in the which Don Suer Teles Giron remayned, was beseged and taken: and then ouer running and spoyling the country, Don Aluaro de Lara, chiefe of this warre, came to Cartion, then to Villana of Alcor, who hauing suddenly surprized Don Alphonso Teles de Meneses, without the fort, being ill accompanyed, his men vnhorfed and disarmed some of Don Alphonso troupe, and thought to take him prisoner, but he fled into the fort being wounded, where hee was beleaged by the King in person, and the Earle Don Aluaro, but not able to take it, they retired to Palencia, where the king was lodged in the bishops Pallace.

All things (say they) past before the marriage, which was then concluded in Palence. A
 It being accompanied, the king would go against D. Lope Diaz de Haro, and passing by Burgos, whereas his sister the Queene D. Berenguela was, he went on, and did not see her, and so came to Calaoorra, which fort was taken by Garcia Zapata, from Rais Diaz de los Cameras, and his brother Aluaro Diaz. The king being afterwards returned to Burgos, the Queene his sister began to write, and to sollicite the Pope to dissolve this marriage, which was the cause why D. Aluaro dispossest her of her lands & reuenues, vnder the kings name and authoritie, which she could not resist. Moreouer, the Historians say, that Don Aluaro did pursue a second marriage for the King D. Henry, with Donna Sancha Infanta of Leon, daughter to Don Alphonso by his first wife D. Therefa, by the which it was agreed that after the death of the king D. Alphonso, the king D. Henry should succeed him in the B Realme of Leon, and in the meane time he should giue vnto his father-in law, the vfe and possession of Saint John de la Mota, whereof a Knight called Sancho Fernandes should bee Gouvernor, and answerable for it: the Earle D. Aluaro thinking to fortifie himselfe with the support and fauour of the king Don Alphonso, by the granting of this place, although he repented him afterwards, giuing him in exchange Tiedra in stead of S. John, and about 10000. Marauidis of gold, all to annoy the Queene D. Berenguela, and to disinherit the Infant D. Fernand of Leon his sonne and heire to the Realme, who was with her: for Tiedra did belong vnto the Queene, who was constrained to giue the place vnto the king Don Henry her brother, who demanded it. And then the sent the Infant D. Fernand vnto the king of Leon his father, which done, she retired to Oreilla, and the king C D. Aluaro, was sent with good troupes of horie and foot, against D. Lope Diaz de Haro, who was towards Miranda of Ebro well accompanied: but as they were readie to fight, certaine religious men came betwixt them and parted them: so as the Earle D. Gonsalo returned to the king and D. Lope vnto the Queene, who was soone after beseeged by the king her brother, and the Earle of Lara in Oreilla, but not able to take it, they left it to go to Frechilla, where they razed the houses of D. Roderigo Gonsales Giron, and then they returned to Palence.
 The Queene had in the meane time sent to demand succors, from the king of Leon, sometimes her husband, the which he granted, but the seege being raised, there was no need to send any. These things are written by many Authors very doubtfully and diuersly: how foueuer it were, the realmes of Castile and Toledo did indure much miserie by the wicked D and tyrannous gouernement of the Earles of Lara, the which had an end by the suddaine and miserable death of the king D. Henry, whom they held in their power, and whose au-thoritie they did abuse impudently. This young Prince being at Palencia, lodged in the bishops pallace, as they suffered him to play with certain young children of Noble houses, who serued him and were about the same age, sporting with them freely, and more inconsiderately then was fit for one of his quality: one of them whom they hold to bee of the house of Mendoza, cast a ryle from the top of a tower, which falling vpon the couering of an house, beat downe another, the which fell vpon the kings head, wherewith hee was so grievously hurt, as he dyed the eleuenth day after, in the year 1217 hauing rag-ned two yeares, nine moneths, and 15. daies, in great trouble: his bodie carryed to Burgos and layed in the Monasterie of las Huelgas, neere to his brother D. Fernand, where they do euerie yeare vnto this day, make an anniuersarie for his soule. Such was the end of D.
Henry, by the which D. Berenguela recovered her authoritie, and reigned with her sonne
 D. Fernand, the which she had by Don Alphonso king of Leon, by the diligence and foresight of the Noblemen of Castile, fearing lest the French should leaze vpon the Realme, by reason of the pretensions of the Infanta D. Blanche, the eldest daughter of Castile, maried into France, to Lewis sonneto Philip Augustus, who was mother to the king Saint

D. Fernand

D. Fernand called the Holy, the ninth king of Castile, and third of that name.

The death of the King Don Henry, was very grievous to the Earles of Lara, who sought to keepe it secret for some dayes, but it was in vaine: for the Queene D. Berenguela was presently aduertised, who instantly dispatched D. Diego Lope de Haro, and D.
Gonsalo Ruiz, to Toro in the countrie of Leon, to bring the Infant Don Fernand, who was there with the King his father. And for that she feared lest the King Don Alphonso of Leon, being aduertised of this death, should attempt something vpon the Realme of Castile, the Ambassadors had charge to conceale it, and to fauine that the Queene was stil molested, and readie to be beseeged by her enemies, vpon which pretext they should demand the Infant her sonne with some succors of souldiers, the which the Ambassadors did wisely effect, bringing D. Fernand to Oreilla, where hee was proclaimed king of Castile, Toledo, and Nagera in the open field, vnder an Elme, by the Noblemen which were there present: and presently marched towards Palencia, where as the King, the Queen his mother, with their whole traine, were receiued with great honour by Don Tello the Bishop. From thence they came to Duegnas, which place they were constrained to force, so as the warre began to grow hote: which the Prelates and Noble-men of the countrie laboured to preuent, but in vaine: the Earle D. Aluaro refusing to quit his authoritie, and to lay downe armes, vntill he had the person of the new King Don Fernand in his power;
 as he had had that of D. Henry: but the memorie of his bad gouernement distasted euery man: so as they were so farre from satisfying his desire, as they were all ashamed to haue bene so ill aduised, to giue the authoritie and gouernement of the Realme, to such violent persons as them of Lara: wherefore they fought how to haue the king obeyed by Armes, to the great ruine of the countrey. The King and Queene-mother past on with their troupes to Vailledolit, and so to the riuier of Duero: from thence they went to Coca, where they shut the gates against them: wherefore they came to Saint Iust; where they receiued two aduertisements: the one was, that they should not go to Auila nor Se-gonis: the other, that the Infant Don Sancho Fernandes, brother to Don Alphonso king of Leon, borne of D. Vrraca Lopez was comming against them with a mightie army:
 whereupon they turned backe towards Vailledolit, where they found some alterations against the Queene and her sonne, practised by them of Lara, whom by her wisdom she pacified, There hauing assembled the Noblemen which had charges and dignities within the Realme, she intreated them to aduise what was fit for the peace and publike quiet, offering to do any thing which they should counsell her. They who knew her to be a wife and discreet woman, were of opinion, that she should raigne as lawfull heire of Castile:
 but the desiring more the good and greatnesse of her sonne, then her owne, renounced the royaltie, in the presence of them all, & resigned it wholly vnto her son Don Fernand, the which was a worthy act, and commended of all men. Whereupon the King was conducted vnto the Church of Saint Mary the great, and there with a generall applause and consent was confirmed King, and the oath taken of either side, the King being scarce se-uentene yeares, whose raigne was happie and full of all good.

4 The Moores of Spaine, subiect to Aben Mahomad, Miralumin of Affricke, seeing themselves destitute of his ayde and support, after the losse of the Battaille of Muradal, (as it doth often happen after such inconueniences and losses) grew to haue a bad conceite of their King Mahomad, and did beleuee, or made shew to beleuee, that the battaile was lost by his fault: wherefore all such as had any charges and gouernements reuolted and erected many petty Kingdomes in Spaine. Among them the first and chiefe was the Mi-raluminus owne brother called Zeit Aben-Zeit, who by others is called Zeit Buzzeit, who leazed vpon the towne of Valencia, & the Iurisdictions therof. A cousin of his called Aben Mahomad, when as the Christians army, infected with the plague, returned into

Castile, seized vpon Baeca, who had the citie of Cordoua also at his deuotion, with many other places in Andalusia, and on the confines of Toledo; whom many Moores followed, for that he was defended by masculine line from Abdelmon, the first king of the Almohades, and came of Abdalla one of his sonnes: these two had yet some colour to hold that which their grandfather had conquered in Spaine. But at Seuille there did rise a mightie Moore, called Aben Lalle, vnder whose power the townes of Eccia, Carmona, Xeres, and others of Andalusia did subiect themselves. In Murcia and Granado, there was one named Aben Hat, made himselfe King, beeing of the race of those Moores which had reigned in Sarragossa. In this sort the other Moores made themselves masters of townes and Prouinces in Spaine, where they had beene set for Governours, all which did enter into league with the aboue-named as the mightiest, giuing an end in Spaine to the Empire of the Almohades, and Kings of Maroc, two and fiftie yeares after the passage of Abdelmon. This was the last diuision betwixt the Moores of Spaine and Affricke, the which were neuer more vnitd vnder one Crowne, notwithstanding that there haue many times troupes and armies past out of Affricke into Spaine against the Christians, to succor those pettie Kings of the Moores which raigned there, whereas the Kings of Maroc might hold some sea-townes and forts giuen them by the Kings of Granado, to fauour their descents: yet they neuer after had any great power nor Empire there. From these new erected estates, which were not yet very well vnitd, the King of Castile (as we haue sayd) had taken the strong citie of Alcaraz, and he of Leon, that of Alcantara, in the yeare 1213. Since a truce beeing made betwixt the Christians and Moores for some yeares, these Infidels had leysure to settle themselves, and to fortifie their places.

In the yeare 1217. Don Matheus Bishop of Lisbon, being leader of the armie of Portugal, tooke from them Alcazar de Sal, being assisted by strangers, which were going into Syria, and by the Prior of the Templers, and Prior of Saint John. These strangers were English, French, and Flemings, hauing a fleet of an hundred sayle, being moued thereunto by the admonitions and decrees of the Councell of Saint John de Lasran, held by Pope Innocent the third, which was the fifth expedition made by publike decree and Councell, by the which Andrew king of Hungarie was named Generall of the Christians armie in the West, notwithstanding John Earle of Brenne went in his place.

Returning to Castile, the young king Don Fernand, his mother, and all the Castilians, were much troubled after they had chosen him, for that the King D. Alphonso his father, beeing discontented that D. Berenguela had by policy gotten away his sonne, and seemed to distrust him, and withall being desirous to vnite that realme to his of Leon and to be called Emperour of Spaine, he came into Spaine with a mightie armie: whereupon they sent Don Maurice Bishop of Burgos, and Don Domingo bishop of Auila to beseech the King not to disquiet his sonnes Realme, of whose good he should bee rather glad then forrier: but he was thereby incensed the more. King Don Alphonso marching on as farre as Burgos, spoyling all where he past, found the citie well garded by Don Lope Diaz de Haro and other Noblemen, who were well accompanied: wherefore seeing there was no meanes to enter, he returned, doing all the harme he could. About this time the Queene D. Berenguela, parting from Vailledolit, came to Palencia, whereas the Noblemen about Segobia and Auila came to offer her their seruice. The Castilians being freed from the feare of King Don Alphonso, the new Kings army was ledde to Mugron, where the battary was begun: during the which the Queene returned to Burgos, to the funerals of her brother Don Henry, the which by her Order were very flately. Mugron being taken, and the Queene come to the campe, with the souldiers which were at Burgos, they marched against Lerma and Lara, which places were taken by force. Being returned to Burgos, the army was led along the riuer of Oja, whereas the townes of Villacarrado, Nagera, and Nauarrer yielded vnto the King, but not their castles. In the meane time the Lords of Lara, laboured to make a general rebellion against the king, so as the Prince: being forced to return to Palencia, there was an encounter vpon the way, where D. Aluaro was taken and led prisoner to Burgos, who was afterwards deliuered vpon condition that he should yield vnto the King, all the places and garrisons which were held and maintained by his men at arms, belonging to the Crowne, especially Amaya, Tariego, Cerezo

A Cerezo, Villafranca of the Mountaines of Oca; the tower of Vilhorado, with the castles of Nauarrer, Nagera and Pancoruo, the which was done: D. Fernand his brother did also yeeld Castroxeris, and Orcejon. By this meanes there was a peace betwixt the king and the Noblemen his subiects whom hee receiued into fauour, suffering them to hold their Offices and Governments: but it was a peace of sixe monthes only, for seeing themselves out of credit, they rebelled againe, against whom the king sent some troupes, which forced them to retire to Leon. By reason whereof the warre reuiued betwixt Castille and Leon, but not too hotly: for there was presently a truce made, the Earle D. Aluaro falling sicke, whereof hee died at Toro, hauing first made a vow to take vpon him the habit and order of Saint Lames; wherefore they buried him at Vcles. Presently after D. Fernand de Lara his brother retired into Affricke, where hee was well entertained in the court of the King of Maroc; but hee died soone after, hauing caused himselfe to be carried to a Bourge inhabited by Christians, called Elbora, neere vnto the city of Maroc. Drawing neere his end, he tooke vpon him the habit of the Order of Hospitalliers, thinking it would serue to mitigate his offence, in which habit his bodie was carried into Castille, and buried in the Commanderie of Pont de Hitero, in the Bishopricke of Palencia, by the care of Donna Major his wife, D. Fernand and D. Aluaro his sonnes.

B This age brought forth new Orders of religion, contrary to the precedent Orders of Monkes; for whereas these could not bee satisfied with temporal wealth, which was giuen them by Kings and Noblemen, as it were in emulation one of another, those rejected all riches, making profession to be poore, and not to possesse any thing. The first was that of the preaching friars, which are called Iacobins in France, the Author whereof was that Chanoine of Oisma, which came out of Spaine into France, with his Bishop, to maintaine the authority of the church of Rome, against the Albigeois and their adherents, being pronounced heretikes by Pope Innocent the third, as we haue sayd: the vow and profession of this Order was, to preach against those which should stray from the faith. The Order was allowed and confirmed by Pope Henricus the third: Dominique was borne at Calaruega, and not at Calaroga, nor Calahorra; it is a Bourg in the Diocese of Oisma, betwixt Aranda of Dueto, and Saint Domingo of Silos, and is at this day a Monastery of Nunnes of that Order, the which was built by King D. Alphonso the eleuenth, or last of that name, where they doe shew his fathers house and the font where he was baptized.

The confirmation of his Order was presented by him, in the yeere 1218. vnto the King D. Fernand, hee himselfe hauing obtained it at Rome; and in truth the sea of Rome is much bound to these preaching friars, who haue beene one of the chiefe supporters thereof, the King D. Fernand as an obedient sonne to the Pope, receiued the Order and the Author with great reuerence, and caused the Monasteries of Saint Croix of Segobia, and of Saint Domingo the royal at Madrid, to bee built. Dominique dying some time after at Bologna, Pope Gregory the ninth, did canonize him, in the yeere 1223. there were other friars of this Order Canonized by Popes, as one Manet, Gil, Anselme, Pelagius and Michel.

C At the same time the Knights of the Order of Alcantara were diuided from that of Calatrava, being alike, and subiect vnto it, from which time they had their distinct maisters. D. Alphonso King of Leon, who had instituted this order, was a meanes that Alcantara, with all that this order did hold in the realme of Leon, was giuen to Saint Iuan del Pereiro of Portugal, which was of the same order of Cisteaux, vpon condition that the maister and Order of Pereiro and his successors should remaine vnder the obedience, and be subiect to the site of the Maisters of Calatrava. So in the yeere of our Lord 1219. this order had it's beginning and distinct maisters. Their habit was first a hood, and the Nouices at this day carry a hood of white serge or flamine, and when as they receiue the communion, euery one weares a white cloake. Since they haue taken a greene crosse, in fauour and at the instance of D. Fernand Infant of Castille, sonne to John the first, who was afterwards King of Arragon, in the yeere 1411. as shalbe sayd. Such was the deuotion of that age, ferul of such things.

D. Fernand King of Castille, being freed from D. Alvaro, and D. Fernand Nunez de Lara, which did trouble his realme, he began to taigne in peace; and being now of age fit to be married, the Queene D. Berenguela his mother, with the aduice of such as the knew to be faithful, began to treat a marriage in Germany, with Beatrice, daughter to the Emperour Philip, and cousin to the Emperour Frederic the second King of Naples and Sicile. The Germans say, that she had been married to Ottou Duke of Saxony, who was Emperour after Philip; so as the must of necessity haue bene a widow. To this effect D. Maurice Bishop of Burgos, and D. Pedro Abbot of the Monastery of Saint Peter of Arlanza, with the Prior of the Order of Saint Iohn were sent Ambassadors wel attended, who concluded this marriage, notwithstanding that they held them four months without any resolution: this Princeesse was sent into Spaine through France, whereas Philip Augustus, then reigning, did her much honour throughout his whole realme, causing her to be conducted vnto Guipuscoa, from whence the Noblemen of Spaine which were deputed to receive her, conducted her to Victoria, whereas the Queene D. Berenguela met her, and did accompany her to Burgos: this Princeesse did please D. Fernand, for she was exceeding faire. Three daies after her arrival, the King was made Knight, and did arme himselfe in the Monastery of Las Huélgas, and then he married D. Beatrice the last of December 1220. Of this marriage issued many children, whereof the eldest was Alphonso, who succeeded in the two Realmes of Castille and Leon: the second was D. Frederic, the third D. Fernand, the fourth D. Henry, the fifth D. Philip the sixth D. Sancho, the seventh and last D. Manuel. Hee had also two daughters, D. Eleanor, who died infant, and D. Berenguela a Nunne in the Monastery of Las Huélgas.

The yeere following 1221. the marriage was concluded betwixt D. Eleanor, the King of Castilles aunt, and D. James King of Arragon, who was then but thirteene yeeres old, which argues falsehood in some which haue written that this King before hee married this Princeesse, had contracted a secret marriage with D. Theresa Gile of Bidaurs, daughter of D. Iohn of Bidaurs, of whom hee begot two sonnes, the one called D. Pedro, who was Lord of Aierbe, and the other D. Jaime Lord of Xerica, the which hath no great ground in nature, considering the King was very yong, and we must beleue that the acquaintance he had with this Lady, either as a spouse or a friend, was ten yeeres after, when he was divorced from D. Eleanor. He was in a manner constrained to make this alliance with Castille, hauing need of D. Fernands assistance, by reason of the troubles he had in his country, which grew through the bad and tyrannous government and ambition of his vncl: the which we must relate and fetch farther off. This Prince had bene drawne, as we haue sayd, out of the hands of Symon Earle of Montfort, and conducted into his realme of Arragon, where there was great contention betwixt the Estates, and the Earles of Roussillon, the father, and sonne to D. Fernand, and the Abbot of Montarragon, the Kings vncl:, who in stead of governing the realme, would haue wrested it from him: notwithstanding by the fidelity of the Estates and their authority, together with the diligence of the Cardinal of Beneuent the Legat, right prevailed, and the Infant D. James was acknowledged for lawfull King at Lerida, as I haue sayd, where the Princes contending did not appeere. There were three Gouvernors appointed, two in Arragon, which were D. Pedro d' Ahones, and D. Pedro Fernandes d' Aze-gra, whose Gouvernements were distinct by the river of Ebro, and the third in Cattelogne. Out of all the which D. Sancho, Earle of Roussillon, was appointed superintendent. Thence it was also concluded, that D. Raymond Berenger, Earle of Prouence, a young Prince of nine yeeres of age, sonne to D. Alphonso, should be with the King, vnder the same tutors about mentioned, the which was put in execution: but the Earle soone after, about the yeere of our Lord 1216. escaped from them, and retired into Prouence, where hee married the daughter of Thomas Earle of Morienne, named Beatrice, who was mother of fine Queenes.

To prevent the continual practises of the Earles of Roussillon, and of D. Fernand, vncl: to the young King, it was resolved, about the yeere 1217. that hee should be declared of full age, being then but tenne yeeres old, according vnto some, the which the Earle

A Earle of Roussillon did wonderfully contradict: yet after great contention, he quelt the Regency in the yeere 1218. by the authority of the Estates assembled to that end at Taragone, whereas the Earle receiued certaine places in fee of the King. At this time the authority of the Magistrate (called the Iustice of Arragon) was great, for the defence of the public liberty.

The yeere following 1219. all the continent of Spaine was afflicted with a great drought (wherevnto it is very much subiect) as well through want of raine, as for that the springs were dried vp; so as there followed a great dearth, and pestilent diseases. These calamities were accompanied with troubles and ciuill seditions, by the rebellion of D. Roderigo Lizana, a man of great authority and power, who being incensed for some pretended wrongs against Lope d' Albero, hee surprized him in his house, and shut him vp in a fort of his, from whence the King deliuered him by force; his commandments, nor the decrees of his council preuailling nothing. D. Roderigo despayning to finde grace with the King, retired to Albarazin, to D. Pedro Fernandes de Azagra, whether they sent troupes of souldiers to besiege them, who could not force the place, being strong both by nature and art: notwithstanding D. Roderigo and D. Pedro Fernandes, acknowledging their fault, obtained pardon of the King. In these sieges they used an Engine of battrey made at Huefca, which did cast great stones, making one hundred and fifty shot in a day and a night, with great ruine.

C These things happened in the yeere 1221. whilst they treated of the marriage of the sayd King D. James, with D. Eleanor of Castille, the Mediators whereof were D. Symon Ceraul, William Ceraul, and William Raymond of Moncade, hee which married Garfande, the heire of the country of Berne: for the accomplishing whereof, the parties met at Agreda, where they were made sure, and the contract of marriage drawne, greatly to the Queenes aduantage, from whence they went to marry in the city of Tarascone. Of this marriage D. Alphonso was borne, who died before the father: This marriage was not firme, for being made without a dispensation from the Pope, being cousins in a prohibited degree, it was dissolved by Pope Honorius the second after some yeeres, and the Infanta sent home into Castille; yet some say that shee professed herselfe in the Monastery of Saint Mary de la Vega.

D 9 A little before this, King D. Jaime, had instituted the Order which they call our Lady of the redemption of prisoners, otherwise de la Mercet, by the counsel of his confessor frater Raymond of Pegnafort, or Rochefort, who set downe the rules for the religious of this Order, vnder that of Saint Augustine. Their profession and chiefe vow was to goe into the Moores country, to redeeme Christians that were prisoners, and if any one for want of money could not redeeme a Christian slave out of the hands of an Infidel, and did see him by ill vsage in despaire or otherwise in danger to renounce the Christian faith, they were bound to put themselves in the slaves place, and to serue for him vntill they had paid his Maister the price agreed vpon, which was a rare charity.

E The first brother of this Order, was Peter Nolasco of Barcelona, or Francis according vnto some, who receiued the habit in the chiefe church of that towne, with great solemnity, in the yeere 1218. by the hands of frater Raymond the maister thereof, the King D. Jaime being present. This habit was white, as they carry it at this day, with the armes of Arragon and Cattelogne, which are, a croffe argent, and four bends gueules in a field Or. The Order was since confirmed, in the yeere 1230. at the request of the King D. Jaime and purre of the maister, D. Raymond of Rochfort, by Pope Gregory the ninth, he who confirmed the Order of the friars Mineurs, instituted after that of the preaching friars, by the Seraphicall father Saint Francis vnder the Order of Saint Augustin, but somewhat changed: the Author of this Order was wonderfully persecuted by the enemy of mankind, enuious (say the Spanish Authors) of the great good which should come vnto the Catholike church of Rome, by the erudition and piety of the religious of that Order. This father of Franciscan friars, came into Spaine, during the raigne of D. Fernand King of Castille, of whom we write, who receiued him with great reuerence, and did build many goodly conuents of that Order, and by his example other Kings did the like.

11 Five of the Brethren of this Order, not yet allowed nor confirmed by the Pope A (the which now iſtanding flouriſhed in Portugal, in the latter time of King D. Alphonſo the groſſe) were deſirous to paſſe to Maroc, there to preach the faith of Chriſt, but they prospered not; for the King of the Arabians, offended with the habit, countenances, and importunity of theſe friars, ſlew them all with his owne hand, by reaſon whereof they were put in the ranke of bleſſed Martires, according to their Legend. Of this cruel execution was an eye witneſſe D. Pedro of Portugal, brother to the King, who cauſed their bodies to bee brought to Coimbra, where they were buried in the Monaſtery of Saint Croix.

They ſay that theſe Monkes parting from Portugal, had prophecied to the Queene D. Francia, that ſhee ſhould die in the yeere of our Lord 1220. as it happened. In the B time of the ſame King D. Alphonſo flouriſhed that religious man whom they call Saint Anthony of Padoua, who notwithstanding was borne at Liſbone; and for his great knowledge, according to the time, was called the ake of the holy Scripture. Hee being a Chanoine of Saint Croix at Coimbra, had ſo great a feruency to ſerue God, as he became a friar of the Order of Saint Francis, changing his name, which was Fernand into that of Anthony; hee was a Doctour and a profeſſor in diuinity, and did read in the vniuerſities of Tolouſa, Bologna and Padoua, where he died; of whom Portugal and all Spaine glory much. As for King D. Alphonſo furnamed the groſſe, hee hath not miniſtered much matter to write of his actions: for his raigne was ſhort, and himſelfe in diſpoſſeſſed of his perſon. Hee died in the yeere of our Lord 1223. being but eight and thirty yeeres old, whereof hee raigned eleuen. His body lies in Alcouſa, neere vnto C that of the Queene his wife.

D. Sancho Capello the ſecond of that name, the fourth King of Portugal.

Surname of Capello.

12 D. Sancho his ſonne, called Capello, raigned after him. He was ſixteene yeeres old D when he began to raigne, & was crowned in the city of Coimbra. His ſurname of Capello came by reaſon of the habits which hee ware wide and long, like a Clergy man. It may bee hee ware ſome great cap or hat, as the Portugals doe at this day, who will haue all their apparell very wide and eaſie, euen their buſkins of Spaniſh leather, which are ruſſed downe to their heeles, ſaying that it doth not become a gentleman to carry them ſtraight and ſmooth.

This Prince was more courteous, affable, and a louer of peace then was fit for a commander that will keepe his ſubiects in awe. Wherefore hee was contented by his ſubiects, and held for a coward and baſe minded, ſo as they attempted many things inſolently and audaciouſly, againſt all right or reaſon, without reſpect of Prince, or Iuſtice, the which was ill adminiſtred in his time, his baſeneſſe yielding to the malice of his ſubiects. Hee married with D. Mencia Lope de Haro daughter to the Earle D. Lope Diaz de Haro, Lord of Biſcay the fourth of that name: a Lady of great beauty and an excellent ſpirit, but not much pleaſing to the Portugals, for the King tooke her, being a widow againſt their likings, and beſides ſhee bare him no children: wherefore they vſed great meanes in the court of Rome to diſſolve this marriage.

Amongſt all the Kings of Portugal, as well thoſe which went before, as which followed, hee only was childleſſe, for hee neither had lawfull children, nor baſtards. D. Mencia Lope did gouerne him in ſuch ſort, as no reſpect of the publike good of the Realme, nor the exhortations, intreaties, nor admonitions, made vnto him by the Noblemen, and religious perſons, who were then much reſpected, neither yet any other meanes whatſoeuer, could moue him to bee diuorced from her, wherefore they ſpoke it publiely, that ſhee had bewitched him, what happened you ſhall vnderſtand hereafter.

Returning

A Returning to the affaires of Caſtile, the King D. Fernand hauing ſolemnized his aunts marriage, after all the feaſts and ſports he found himſelfe engaged in new troubles, procured by D. Fernand Ruiz Dias de las Cameros, who had newly croſt himſelfe to paſſe into Syria, to the holy warre; for the performing of which voyage, it may bee his purſe was not very well furniſhed, wherefore hee beganne to taxe and ſpoile the Kings country, which was vnder his command, for theſe conſcutions hee was cired to appeere in court, at Vaileddolit, where hee did in ſome ſort iuſtifie himſelfe.

Afterwards being pricked in conſcience for theſe outrages, being alſo by nature in conſtant, fearful, and with all ill aduifed, hee abſented himſelfe, wherefore the King ſeiſed vpon all his goods. D. Fernand Ruiz ſeeing that they proceeded againſt him with

B all rigour, fortified himſelfe in certaine caſtles, from the which hee did much trouble the Kings affaires, ſo as in the end hee was forced to compound with him and to giue him money.

By this accord, hee yeelded vp the places which hee held, and received ſoutreene thouſand peeces of gold. After him Gonſalo Peres, Lord of Molina did rebel, being moued thereto by D. Gonſalo Nuges de Lara, who beganne to ouerrunne and ſpoile thoſe parts which lay neere his houſes, like an enemy; not ceaſing, for any admonitions or threats made vnto him in the Kings name, vntill that hee was forced to goe and beſiege him in Molina; notwithstanding by the means of D. Berenguela the Queene mother, hee was reſtored to the Kings fauor, and the ſouldiers were drawne from before Molina. But D. Gonſalo Nuges de Lara, who for feare of puniſhment was retired into the Moores country, demanding pardon alſo could not obtaine it: wherefore hee liued the remainder of his daies, which were but ſhort, at Baſca in Andaluſia, where hee died miſerably, as his brethren D. Aluaro and D. Fernand had done, worthy in truth of great puniſhments; for their raſh and ſeditious enterpriſes, being greater and more eminent then all the other Noblemen of the realme. The King being freed from this care, and the realme in ſome quiet, D. Maurice Biſhop of Burgos, an Engliſh man borne, beganne in the yeere of our Lord 1220 to ſet his hand to the building of the great church of that city, according to the faſhion wee ſee it at this day, the which was finiſhed in his time. The Episcopall ſeat was beſore at Saint Laurence. The D Archbiſhop D. Roderigo cauſed them alſo this yeere to worke about the building of the chiefe Church of Talauera, the which was indowed with foure dignities, and twelue Chanoins, and at the ſame time the Churches of Vaileddolit and Olina were built by a Biſhop of Olina, who had bene Secretary to the King D. Fernand. The church of Padronche Biſhops lodging, and the bridge which is vpon Minio were alſo then built, by the care and charge of D. Laurence Biſhop of that place.

It was alſo about the beginning of this yeere 1222. that D. Remy Infant of Nauarre, brother to the King D. Sancho the retired, was made Biſhop of Pampelone, of whole charity Authors write with admiration, that hee gaue all hee had vnto the poore, and the more his riches did abound, the more hee gaue.

E In all the time after the marriage of the King D. James, and D. Eleanor of Caſtile, vnto the yeere 1228. when as the warre of Majorca was attempted, the realme of Arragon was troubled with continual ſeditious; procured by the Infant D. Fernand, the Kings vnde being exceeding ambitious, who hauing entred into League, with D. Nugno of Arragon his couſin, ſonne to D. Sancho Earle of Roſillon, D. William of Moncada (a little before enemies, but now growne friends, vpon this occaſion) Pedro d'Alonſes and others, tooke vpon him againe the Regency of the realme, by force, in the yeere 1223, and diſtributed amongſt his fauourers and confederats the chiefe dignities of the realme, holding the King and Queene, in his powder: but a while after the King eſcaped from Tortoſa, and retired to Hucra or Horta, where hauing conferred with the Nobility, hee raiſed an armie, with the which hee entred the territories of the Moores of Valencia and Murcia being tired with ciuill ſtrifits, ſo as hee ſoted Azabur or Zeit King of Valencia to promiſe him tribute, and in like manner him of Murcia, which was the fifth penny of their imposts. In this warre many commanders of the League, intermeddled, contrarie to the Kings liking. Amongſt others, D. Pedro d'Alonſes discontented discontented that the King had made a truce with the Moores, sought to breake it, and did often lead troopes of souldiers into the territory of Valencia, spoyling all he found: so as the King hauing often aduised and intreated him to containe himselfe, but in vaine hee commanded they should take him prisoner, but D. Pedro seeking to defend himselfe, being pursued by the King and others, was slaine by D. Sancho Martin de Luna, with a lance: the which did put all the townes of Arragon (being already infected) into open rebellion against the King: who marched presently with his army into the countries of Sobrarbe, and Ribagorça, whereas the houses, lands and subiects of D. Pedro were, the which he wasted all he could.

The townes of Saragossa, Huefca and all the rest, except Calatayub, followed the Infant D. Fernand, and the Noblemen of his faction, as defenders (sayd they) of the publike liberty, the chiefe of the Saragossans, was their Bishop D. Sancho d' Abones; brother to D. Pedro, that was slaine. On the other side the Kings army was led by D. Blasco Alagon, and Arial de Luna, who did much annoy them of Saragossa and others. In the end the mildnesse, patience and dissimulation of the King D. James, surmounted all these alterations and mutinies, who could fo winne the Princes and Noblemen, being much troubled to maintaine this warre, as they all submitted themselves vnto him; by whose example the townes were quiet, yet the cities of Saragossa, Huefca and Iacca made a league amongst themselves, for the defence of their lands and iurisdiccions against theetes and robbers, and remainders of ciuill dissensions, and erected a Magistrate, holding a forme of Iustice, like vnto that which they call Hermadales in Castille, yet without any preiudice to the Kings royal prerogative.

Alarcon.

*Prinssal King
of Castille exters Andalusia.*

13 In Castille whilst that the King D. Fernand was busie to suppress his owne subiects, and to dispose of the affaires of old Castille, the Inhabitants of Cuenca, Huete, Alarcon and Moja, being gathered together, made a roade into the territories of Valencia, from whence they brought a great booty. This was an aduice giuen by D. Zenguela the Queene mother, and the prelates of Castille, to the end they might breake the truce which was betwixt her sonne and the petty Kings of the Moores, thinking it high time the King should goe to the warre, and that it was the dutie of a Catholike Prince to pursue these Infidels, with what right soeuer. Wherefore the King animated by this counsel, gathered his army together, and marched into Andalusia, where at his first entry, Aben Mahomad, King of Baeca, made himselfe his vassal, sending to meet the Christians army, when it was at the passage of the mountaine called Puerto del Muradal. Afterwards they came to Quetada, whereas many Moores were slaine, and many taken, the townes of Lacra, Teua and Palhes were abandoned by the Moores, the castles of Elnader, Escamel and Espulei were razed, whereof the two last were yielded by composition. From thence D. Lope Dias de Haro, was sent with D. Fernand Corti, Maister of the Order of Saint James, and D. Goncal Yuannes, maister of Calatrava, to Bitoras, whereas there were certaine bands of Arabians of Affrike, whom they defeated, bringing away many prisoners. D. Rodrigo Ximenes the Archbishop and Primat did accompany the King in this expedition, who after these happy exploits, returned to Toledo, whereas the Queene attended him.

Arragon.

In the meane time D. James King of Arragon, being discontented that the Castilians had attempted to invade the Moores vpon the marches of his conquest, according to the diuision which had been made by the Popes order, entred into Castille by his frontier, where he did some spoile towards Soria, and therefore the peace was like to breake betwixt these two Kingdomes: yet the King D. Fernand being come to Cuenca, the two Kings were reconciled, and had a friendly interview there, yet the King of Castille, to the preiudice of Arragon, had receiued Zeis Abensit King of Valencia to fealty and homage, as his vassal, who being terrified with the great power of the Christians, and moued by the example of the King of Baeca was come to the King D. Fernand to Cuenca.

In the yeere 1224. there was a new army raised, and led into Andalusia, which committed great spoiles, and tooke Andujar and Martos, with many forts and castles of small fame, finding no resistance in field.

And

A And in the yeere 1225. the Christians army was lead againe into the Marches of Andalusia, being drawn thither by their good successe, the King affecting nothing more than this Moorish warre, wherein he tooke exceeding delight. In which expedition Xadax was taken, and other inestimable harmes done vnto the Infidels. Of the fruits of this war the Knights of Calatrava, had Martos, for them and their successors: then was there in Spaine, Legat for Pope Honorius the third, Iohn Abbas Villa, Bishop, Cardinal Sabina who perswaded the King of Castille, not to suffer the Moores in quiet, but to presse them whilst they were waunting: wherefore in the yeere 1226. the army of Castille assembled at Toledo, was lead into Andalusia, where they tooke from the Moores Saint Esteuan, Exnatoraph, and the Tower of Albepe, or Albezo, and besieged Taen, which they could not take, for the towne was great, and well fortified with men, and all things necessary for the warre. In it was D. Aluar Perez de Castro, a banished man of Castille, with 160. horse Christians.

Wherefore the king D. Fernand, rayling his siege went to Priego, where there were many knights of the Almohades lodged, who were very rich: the towne was taken by assault, & soone after the castle yielded by composition. After which, the Christians tooke Loxa, & hauing taken great spoiles, and many prisoners in those places, they came and camped at Alhambra, which was a strong place, seated vpon a steepe rock: but the Moores were so amazed, as without any resistance they abandoned their goods and fled to Granada: whereby it seemes, that that part of the fort of Granada, which is called Alhambra was built and peopled by these Moores; for after that time the towne of Granada began to be wonderfully peopled with Moores, which were chased from such towns & places as the Christians did win in Andalusia. The fort of Alhambra being spoiled, the Christian army did ouerrun the champaign country of Granada, burning and destroying all they found, with great slaughter of the Moores, amongst the which there died a famous captaine, called Harippus, a great enemy to the Christians, & who had done them much harme the yeeres before. The Christians approached fo neere vnto the city of Granada, as the Moores fearing to be besieged, or that they would spoile their goodly building there abouts, compounded and did homage to the King D. Fernand, deliuering him 1300. Christian captiues, which they held. This composition was treated by Almaro Perez de Castro, about mentioned, whom the King D. Fernand receiued then into grace.

D And thinking he had done ynough, he returned with this victorious army to Toledo. D. Rodrigo Ximenes did not willingly loose any one of these voiaiges, yet he could not bee present at this last, by reason of a sicknesse, which surprized him at Guadalquivar, so as hee gaue his troups to D. Dominike Bishop of Plaisance, with power to execute his Episcopall charge in the campe. So did the Prelats in those daies labour in the Lords vineyard, as many doe also in this age. The Garrisons left by the King at Martos, Andujar, and other places of the frontier, among the which was D. Aluar Perez the commander, & the maister of the Order of Calatrava beganne to spoile the territories of Seuille, whereas there reigned a mighty Moore, called Abullalle or Aben Lalle, who hauing drawne a great number of soldiars out of Seuille, Xeres, Carmona and Ecchia, came and charged these Christians, who were neither amazed nor weak; wherefore they did not only withstand the Moores valiantly, but did wholly defeat them, so as there were 20000. slaine vpon the place, yet the Moores hauing repaired their forces, besseged the castle of Garces, and notwithstanding that the Christians, which were nere, did attempt to succor it: and that the King D. Fernand with D. Lope Dias de Haro, with many other knights, did aduance to raise the siege, yet the place was taken: wherefore the King D. Fernand came to Exaltalulla, whether the King of Baeca came vnto him, being accompanied with 3000. horse Almohades, and Alarabes, and a great number of foote, offering both himselfe and his men to doe him seruice. He was welcome to the King, and entertained pawne to the King of Castille, the which he should yeeld vp againe, when hee should be A in possession of the sayd three castles. Burgalhimar was presently deliuered, and 15. daies after Saluatierra (yet with some difficulty) receiued a garrison of Castille: but Capilla, a place in the Archbishopske of Toledo, strong by nature, being built vpon a rocke, would not obey, wherefore three months being spent in treaties and parleys, and nothing concluded, the King returned to Toledo, leauing the frontier well manned; and winter being past, he came and laied siege to Capilla, being stil seized of the castle of Baeca: this place was obtayned defended by the Moores which were rebels to Aben Mahomad, who furnished the campe with victuals from Cordoua, whether he was retired, shewing him felfe faithful in al things to the King D. Fernand. In the end Capilla was yeelded, vpon condition they should depart with ther baggage, and then the King returned to Toie. B do, fixe weekes after his departure. Soone after hee had newes that the Moores, subiects to Aben Mahomad, incensed at the submission which hee had made vnto the King of Castille, and that hee had sent victuals vnto the campe before Capilla, were rebelled against him, and had forced him to flee to the castle of Almodauar del Rio, whereas thinking to enter, hee was preuented and slaine by two Moores, who had carried his head to Aben Lalle, King of Seuille. These murderers thinking to haue done an act very pleasing to this Moorish King, and expecting some good recompence, were deceiued, for the King of Seulle caused both their heads to bee cut off, and cast vnto the dogges.

This happened in the yeere 1227. at that time died Lewis the eight, the French King, father to Saint Lewis, and hnsband to the Queene D. Blanche of Castille. This Lady by the will of the King her husband, was left Regent of the realme of France, during the C by the will of the King her husband, was left Regent of the realme of France, during the minority of the King her sonne, who was but twelue yeeres old: wherewith many Noblemen of France being discontented, banded against her, to dispossesse her of the go-uernment; thinking it vnworthy the name of the French, and ominous for their Estate, to be gouerned by a woman, especially a stranger. The chiefe of the conspirators were Philip Earle of Bologne the Kings vncler, Peter Duke of Brittan, Hugh de la March, Robert d'Euereux, Raymond of Toloufa, and Thybauld of Champagne, who was King of Nauarre: but the Queene, who it may bee found they had more regard to their priuate interests, then to the publike good, resisted them courageously, being supported by other Noblemen of France, so as from words they fell to armes. Vpon this occasion D the King D. Fernand was solicited to succor the Queene D. Blanche his aunt, against the Rebels, whereof he excused himselfe; although hee seemed to be much greued for her distresse: But hee was then so ingaged in warre against the Moore, as it was impossible for him to decide his forces: but you must obserue that by the right of succession the realme of Castille did belong vnto her, the which D. Fernand did hold, so as there was little loue betwixt them. Afterwards all succeeded to the Queenes desire in France, who made frustrate her enemies designs, as the French Histories report, gouerning the realme, and breeding vp her sonne vnder the discipline of the religious of Saint Dominike and St. Francis, who were then in great credit. The King of Baeca being slaine as we haue sayd, new difficulties did arise for the King of Castille, for the Moores of Baeca E being aduertised thereof, they presently put themselves in armes, and began to assault the castle, the which was garded by the knights of the Calatrava: who possted whilst hee defended himselfe valiantly, aduertised the King of his distresse, who possted thither, hauing in his company, D. Aluaro Peres de Castro, & other knights. The brute of his coming did strike such a terror into these mutinous Moores, as they dislodged before they saw him, and fled to Grenado, as they also of Martos did: they coniecture that these did people the Albaycin of Grenado: the King put D. Lope Dias de Haro, Lord of Biscay, in garrison into Baeca, & into Martos D. Aluaro Peres de Castro, and D. Tello Al- phonso de Meneses and others in other places, and so returned to Toledo, whereas that yeer the Archbishop D. Roderigo Ximenes, began to build the great church, as it is at this present different fro that form it was of before, when it was a Mosque for the Moores. F 15 In Arragon the expedition of Majorca was decreed 1228. this Island was held by the Moores, and their King Abobib, whom others call, Retabormbe, who did incessantly spoil the sea, and the coast of Spaine, without any pretext, and did impudently mocke
at

A at the King of Arragon when hee complained of the thefts and robberies committed by him or his men. For this cause, at the Estates assembled at Barcelona, & they consenting and requiring it, according to the customes and preiudges of the Arragonois & Catrelans, a war was resolu'd against this King of the Moores, and the Majorjans: for the which there were 15. vessels of al sorts prepared, the which transported the army to Pa-lombata: the chiefe commanders were, D. Berengaire Palox, Bishop of Barcelona, D.
Nuguo of Arragon, Earle of Rossillon, William of Moncade, Lord of Berne, William Ray- mond of Moncade his cousin, Gessry of Roccaberin, Oliuer Thermes, William of Saine Martin, Gerard Cernillon, Raymond Allemand, William of Clermont, Hugues Mataplane,
William of Saint Vincent, Raymond Bellos, Bernard Centillas, William Masfogio, Berengaire
B of Saint Eugene, and other great and valiant Noblemen of Arragon and Catelogne:
the first which leaped to land, was one named Bernard Argemone. At their first aboard the Arragonois were incountr'd, and sharply repulsd by the Moores, with the losse of the Lord of Beany, of D. Raymond his coulin, Hugues of Mataplane, and many other knights and good souldiars which were slaine vpon the place: but when as the whole army was landed, and had better meanes to discouer both the enemies and the country, the Moores were beaten backe into their towne, and besieged: the which was with great diligence and fury battered & assaulted; notwithstanding the siege was long and difficult; for it continued fiftene monethes, til in the end after much toyle and losse, the city of Majorca came into the power of the Arragonois, hauing bene valiantly and obstinately defended by the Moores: the King Abobib, & a son of his, and many Moores were slaine in this warre, and the city of Majorca forced: the spoile thereof was diuided by the Bishops of Barcelona and Lerida, by the Earles D. Nuguo of Rossillon, D. Ponce
Hugues of Empurias, D. Pedro Cornet, and Symon Perre: but whether they shewed themselves partial in this diuision, or for some other occasion, the souldiars mutined, and spoiled the tents and baggage of these Bishops and Noblemen: al the Island being won, except some mountaines and forests, whether the remainder of the Moores which had escaped were retired, Majorca was made subiect for the spirituality, to the Bishop of Barcelona, but in such sort as it should haue a particular bishop, which was then named by the King: which bishop being dead, the nomination should belong to the bishop and D Chapter of Barcelona, who sayd this right had bene long due vnto them. The first that was named to this dignity, was D. Raymond Torella: an other. son of the King of Major-cas, was a while after baptized, and was named James; he married a lady of the family of Alagon, daughter to D. Martin Roulard Alagon: from him is descended the house of Gottorio, so called of the place which was given in fee to this Prince of the Moores, by the King D. James; his sonne was Blasco Gottorio, and of him was begotten Michel Peres Gottorio. They of Minorca being terrified by the taking of Majorca, offered tribute to the King of Arragon; and not long after D. William Mongeri conquered the Island of Yuifa, sometimes called Ebusus and the Islands of Fromentaria and Cabrera, & yielded also through feare. They hold that there were in armes in these Islands, during this warre, about 40000. Moores footmen, and 50000. horse. The Earldome of Vrgel hauing bene long in sure, betwixt William of Moncade, Lord of Beany, together with Ponce Cabrera, &
Armbixis, daughter to Arminges; the last Earle of Vrgel, in the end, sentence was giue of her side, who was married to D. Pedro of Portugal, son to the King D. Sancho the first, to which married couple, the King D. James did afterwards giue in exchange of the Earldome of Vrgel, the Islands of Majorca and Yuifa, to hold them during their liues, and many places in Catelogne in propriety. Notwithstanding the county of Vrgel returned sometime after to D. Ponce de Cabrera, and the Islands Pyticeles, Yuifa and Fromenta-ria, were giuen in fee to the Archbishop of Tarragone.
In the same yeere 1228. D. Tello Alphonso de Meneses, and other captaines Castillans, Mores F commanders of the garrisons vpon the Moores frontiers, went to field, and ouerran the territory of Seulle about Baena, Lucena & Castro del Rio: and Aben Lalle, King of Seuille, assailed the Christians, towards Buioras, Baeca and Martos, seeking to diuert them which foraged his country: the King D. Fernand arriving, the Moore fainted, and made himselfe tributary, promising to pay him three hundred thousand Marauidis of gold.

Aben Hus
King of Murcia
was a worthy theft of Almohades, in Spaine.

The death of Aben Mahomad King of Bacsa, gave way to the raigne of Aben Hus A who was of the race of the Kings of Saragossa, and enemy to the faction of the Almohades: this King seized vpon the fort of Ricot, in the realme of Murcia, and tooke occasion of their religion, publishing that that which the Almohades had brought in, was false, and inuented by wicked, turbulent and mutinous persons, whose rash impiety the soueraigne God had shewed was displeasing vnto him, by their vnfortunate euent in the late warres of Spaine: wherefore they must returne to the simple beliefte of their auncestors, and reiect that prophane Almohade, with his King Abdelmeu, and their followers. Vpon this quarrel hee intituled himselfe King of Murcia, and beganne to persecute the sect of the Almohades, so as all hee could get into his hands, he put to a miserable death; hee caused the Melquites or Melgides to bee purified and washed, with exorcismes and superstitious ceremonies, as hauing beene polluted and violated, in seruing the new sect of the Almohades.

So vnder collour of restoring the ancient beliefte and knowledge of the law of Mohamet, hee was wonderfully followed, and was respected, feared and honoured, as King in the realme of Murcia and part of Andalusia, the country of Granado, Almercy, Cordoua and Eccia: yet hee found Zael who made head against him, a Moore who had newly usurped the realme of Valencia, and chased away Leit Aben Leit, for that they sayd hee had laied a plot with the Pope, and the King of Arragon, to become a Christian, and that hee had had conference to that end with the King D. James at Calatajub, whither hee had also carried his sonne. This Zael was sonne to Modes and Nephew to King Lobo: Aben Lalle King of Seuile made the like resistance, yet Aben Hus troubled them all, and tooke from them a part of their countries, so as hee became the most powerfull of all the Kings of the Moores in Spaine, beeing otherwise a bountifull Prince, and a good Iusticer. The new sect of the Almohades was thus rooted out by him, and the ancient interpretation of their Alphurcan restored in Spaine, eighty and one yeeres after that Almohad, had past.

Leon.

Yet the first attempt he made against the Christians, succeeded but ill; for D. Alfonso King of Leon, being in the country of Extremadura, where he had made warre, whilst that D. Fernand his sonne did ouerrunne Andalusia and their tooke the townes of badajos, Caceres and others, this King of the Moores presumed to dislodge him from Merida, before the which hee was camped, to which end hee came towards him with a mighty army: King D. Alfonso notwithstanding that hee was very old, gaue him battle, and defeated this King of the Moores, forcing him to saue himselfe by flight: and returning to the siege, he tooke the towne of Merida, in the yeere 1229. which was the last of his exploits: for being now very old, and much broken, he died soone after, in the yeere 1230. at Villanoua of Sarrio, hauing raigned forty and foure yeeres in Leon Galicia and the Asturies: whose body was interred at Saint James.

Castille and Leon united.

16 The King D. Fernand who was then in Andalusia, at the siege of Daralferza, beeing aduertized of his fathers death, tooke counsell of the Noblemen which were with him in the army; who were all of opinion, that hee should goe with all speed into the realme of Leon, which by hereditary right did belong vnto him, before his sisters children did seize thereon, who pretended an equall right with him: for so had the King D. Alfonso ordained by his will, to preiudice his sonne D. Fernand, whom hee had alwaies hated and pursued to the death; yea a little before hee died, hee sought to marry his daughter Donna Sancha to D. James King of Arragon, who by the decree of Pope Honorius the third, had put away D. Elenor of Castille his wife. Don Alfonso offering to giue in dowry with the Infanta the Realmes of Leon, Galicia and the Asturies, after his decease, to deprive the King of Castille his sonne, but his death prevented the effect: wherefore the King D. Fernand following this good counsell, came to Toledo, to passe from thence into Leon; vpon the way, hee met with the Queene D. Berenguela, his mother, at Orgaz, who came to hasten him, and returned with him to Toledo: from thence hee went with speed into the territories of Leon, where hee was receiued and acknowledged in all places where hee past for their lawfull King, vnto the city of Toro, which did him all the honour hee could desire, hauing sent there Depu-

A Deputies to meete him vpon the way, in the which hee was proclaimed King of Leon.

In the beginning the other townes and castles did not allow of this election of them of Toro, by reason of the Infants D. Sancha and D. Dulce or Douce, who would in the confidence which they had in their cause, dispute their interest and put it to the triall of law: but all well considered D. Alfonso will tooke no effect; for D. Fernand was sonne and right heire to these realmes before the daughters, who were forced to agree with their brother, and had 30000. doubloons euery yeere during their liues. This accord betwixt the King Don Fernand and the Infantes of Leon his Sisters, was wrought and concluded betwixt the Queenes D. Berenguela the Kings mother, and D. Theresa, mother to the Infants: after that the King had bene crowned in Leon, the chiefe city of the Kingdome, in the presence of the Bishops D. Iohn of Oueydo, D. Roderigo of Leon, D. Nugno of Astorga, D. Martin of Salamanca, D. Michel of Cit, Roderigo and D. Sancha of Coria. By this accord the King D. Fernand did peaceably enjoy the Realmes of Leon, Galicia, & the Asturies, hauing raigned thirteene yeeres in Castille, the re-union of which Estates made this yeere, 1230. 73. yeeres after their last diuision, hath remained firme euer since, without any further leperation. From Leon, the King came to Beneuent, whereas the Infantes his sisters met him, and there did ratifie the accord made by the two Queenes, renouncing all pretensions to the sayd Realmes, and to the testament made by the King D. Alfonso their father. Then the King went to visit the Prouinces, Townes and Forts of his Kingdomes, where without any contradiction he was receiued & intainted with great ioy and acclamation of the people, as it was fit.

This death of the King of Leon, tell out happily for D. Fernand, to couer his retreat from Daralferza, with some honourable pretext. In the meane time they made light skirmishes, with the taking and recouering of castles, vpon the frontiers of Toledo and Andalusia.

In the yeere of our Lord 1231. Quesada was recouered by the Christians, and for a reward of their valour, in recouering thereof, was giuen to the church of Toledo, but it was afterwards lost and recouered againe diuers times. The King of Castille continuing his warre, there was established vpon that frontier, that which they call Adelantamiento of Caloria, by the taking of Pilos, Toya, Lacra, Agolino, Font Julian, Tour de Lago, Higuera, Maulula, Arcola, Dos Hermanas, Villa Montin, Niebla, Caloria, Concha and Chelis, all which places were by prodigality and inconsiderate zeale (altogether vfed in those religious times) giuen (in a religious acknowledgement to the Apostolike Sea) by the King D. Fernand to the Archbishops of Toledo, the which the haue enjoyed vnto the assumption of the Cardinal D. Iohn Tanera to the Arch-bishoprike, who gaue this country to the Marquis of Camaraca, whose successeur Don Iohn Martinez Silesio Cardinal, had by reason thereof great and earnest sute against the Church of Toledo; but notwithstanding that the Church had diuers sentences (by reason of the great sway the Church of Rome bore at that same time) in its fauour, yet could they neuer gette possession of any of those places, for certaine speciall reasons which are not specified.

17 At that time the realmes of Naples and Sicile were held by the Emperour Frederic the second, who married Yoland, the only daughter of Iohn de Brenne, who called himselfe king of Ierusalem (which is the reason why the Kings of Naples and Sicile haue euer since intituled themselves Kings of Ierusalem) by which alliance they vnted the titles of Naples, Sicile and Ierusalem, which the descendentes of this Noble Princeesse haue carried.

F This Iohn de Brenne beeing chosen chiefe Generall of the Westerne succours, which by the procurement of the counsell of Latrian went into the Country of Syria, and obtained amongst them the first and soueraigne degree, and was called King of Acre or Prolemaide: yet hee did neuer hold the city of Ierusalem: but hauing neede of greater forces to resist the Turkes and enemies of our faith, hee was forced to returne againe into Europe to sollicite the Christian Princes to assist him. Being arrived into Italie, hee married his daughter as wee haue sayd, and then passed into Sapine, in the yeere of our Lord 1232. to visit the sepulcher of Saint James, which was a pilgrimage of greatest merit after that of Ierusalem. Passing through Castille, hee was received with great honour by the King D. Fernand, who in confirmation of their friendship, gaue him D. Berenguela, his sister by father and mother in marriage.

Nauarre.

The Realme of Nauarre was at that time but ill gouerned by reason of the Kings solitary life, who was retired and did not speake with any man, but his household seruants, and would not heare of any affaires. This mischief was increased by the death of D. Ramir his brother, Bishop of Pampelone, who by his authority and respect might something haue restrained them that would haue troubled the state, were they home-bred or strangers: wherefore about the yeere of our Lord 1231. D. Lope Diaz, Lord of Biscay, who had some lands in the souerainty of Nauarre, prouoked and supported by D. Fernand King of Castille, hee found an occasion to commit some spoiles in the Kingdome.

Impatience of
of Champagne
to rage.

18 On the other side Thibault Earle of Champagne, pretending right to the sayd realme by his mother D. Blanche, daughter to the King D. Sancho the wife, had feigned practises and Intelligences in Nauarre, to bee admitted to the Regency of the realme, during the life of King D. Sancho the retired: whereof hee being aduertised, after great negligence, in the end hee beganne to discouer it, to his great preiudice, wherefore being much discontented at these attempts, both of the King of Castille, and of the Earle of Champagne, he resolved to frustrat both of their pretensions, and to be reuenged, especially of the King of Castille; he therefore gaue D. James King of Arragon to vnderstand, that hee had some matters to impart vnto him, which would redound greatly to his profit: and therefore he intreated him to come to Tudele, excusing himselfe that hee had not come vnto him, by reason of the indisposition of his person: The King of Arragon sayd not to come to Tudele: and for that the King of Nauarre could not stirre out of his chamber, hee entred into the castile, where they conferred together.

The King D. Sancho complaining much of D. Fernand King of Castille, that not content to hold the Lands which his predecessors had wrested from him, had againe invaded and spoiled his country, hee demanded his aduice and helpe to bee reuenged: and hauing in like manner discouered of the disobedience and little respect of Thibault Earle of Champagne, who had attempted to play the King in Nauarre in his life time, hee concluded, that if hee would make a firme alliance with him, and betwixt Nauarre and Arragon, to invade the realme of Castille, and not to cease vntill they had forced the King D. Fernand to restore the Lands of the riuers of Oja, Bureua, Alaua, and Guispucoa, or being conquered, to yeeld him the fruits and reuenues thereof, and to pay the charges of the warre, hee should bee content to harken to a mutual donation of both realmes, very profitable for the King of Arragon, and his sonne D. Alphonso, which was, that the suruiour should inherit both Kingdomes of Nauarre and Arragon. The King D. Jame liked well hereof, for hee was in the floure of his age, and his sonne also likely to liue, whereas the King D. Sancho was above threescore and eight yeeres old, and moreouer hee was so fat, and full of humors, and so tormented with a canker, as hee expected hourly to leaue this world. This Accord being made betwixt them, they concluded that the troups of both Realmes should bee ready against the next yeere, and should meet at the Rendezvous in May. The King D. Sancho desired nothing more then to recouer the Prouince of Guispucoa, imagining that since the separation thereof, the realme of Nauarre had lost one of the chiefe commodities which a country may haue that lies vpon the sea.

The Noblemen and chiefe of the King D. *Sancho*s counsell at this accord were F. D. Garcia Almoravid, D. Sancho Fernandes of Montague, D. William Baudouin, and D. William Iustice of Tudele, which is a principall dignitie. These and other Noblemen, with the Deputies of the Townes of Nauarre, signed the conuen-

A conuention and accord betwixt these two kings: the which the Noblemen of Arragon, which held the chiefe charges, did in like manner: among the which are named D. Pedro Fernandes d'Açagra Lord of Albarazin, Athou de Foces, L. Steward, William de Moncade, Rodrigo Lizines, Arial de Lune, Simon Perca, Blasco Maca, Pedro Peres Iustice Maior of Arragon, and Pedro Sanches Secretarie of State in Arragon. For the defraying of this warre, D. Sancho was forced to imploy his treasure, which was very great: for hauing liued long in this solitary life, hee might easily gather together, haue no caufe of expence. He therefore deliuered to the king of Arragon, an hundred thousand solz of gold, besides at such time as the army was to march against Castile, newes came vnto the king of Arragon, that the Iland of Maiorca had rebelled: wherefore being more carefull to keepe his owne, then to take from another, he made vse of those souldiers which hee had leauied for the warre of Castile, and led them into Maiorca, so as the king of Nauarre found himselfe too weake to attempt any thing against Castile, whereas the Earle D. Lope d'Haro was in armes to fight with him at the passage. He was of opinion that the King D. James had mocked him, so as falling into a great rage, he would breake the accord which they had made. King James was aduertized of all that he sayd and did, by some Knights of Nauarre, which were false vnto their Prince, and discontented with this strange and disdainfull manner of liuing, of the which D. Pedro Ximenes of Valtierra was one. The warre of Maiorca being soone ended, the king Don James returned to Tudele to excuse himselfe, and to offer satisfaction hereafter, yea to furnish 2000. horse, with other forces for the warre of Castile, but the King Don Sancho would by no means enter into conference with him. Moreouer, Don Garcia Almoravid and Don John Peres de Barzan, captains of the armie, which was vpon the frontiers of Castile, being in fight of the enemy, were reduced to that extremitie by Don Lope Diaz de Haro, as they feared every day they should be forced to fight, he neglected both them and all they did: and they write, that a Gentleman being sent from them to acquaint the king with the estate of their affaires, and to demand two hundred horse of Supply, with the which they should be able to give battell vnto the Castillians, he attended foure dayes, and could neither haue entry nor audience. This strange and disdainfull behaviour caused the king Don James to returne into Arragon much discontented, whereupon the Castillians spoiled Nauarre, the which he might easily haue prevented, whereupon he grew wayward, and insupportable euen to his household seruants, who could not please him. This waywardnesse and distemperature, together with the burthen of a repleate and ill-disposed bodie, his long incurable disease, together with his many yeeres, brought him to his graue, in the yeare 1234. hauing reigned nine and thirty yeeres, nine moneths, and ten dayes. He was buried in the royall Monastierie of the Chanoinis of Saint Mary of Roncevaux, the which hee himselfe had caused to be built.

D. Thibault first of that name, the 22. King of Nauarre.

17 The Nauarrois sent into France to Thibault Earle of Champagne, the sonne of D. Blanche, sister to the deceased king, to aduertise him of this succession, and to aduise him to make halt, before that Don James King of Arragon should leaze thereon, in vertue of the pretended rights, by reason of the mutuall donation past betwixt the two kings at Tudele, and also by meanes of the intelligences which he had within the Country: wherein the Earle was nothing slouthfull, for hauing many partizans in Nauarre, who had aduertised him of all that had past betwixt the two kings, and in the end of the death of his vncke. The Ambassadors found him already in order, and ready to march towards Nauarre, where hee arrived happily, for the well effecting of his designe, by reason of some lets which restrained the King Don James, the which were more fitting for him to A care for, then to pursue the donation made vnto him in preiudice of the right heire of that Crowne, without any reason or proportion, by a king troubled with violent passions both of body and mind. But it is very certaine, that the king of Arragon did little respect it: yea some haue written, that without any difficulty, he discharged the Nauarros (they requiring it) of the oath, fealty and homage, which they had iuror, when as the contract betwixt him and the deceased king D. Sancho, was past at Tudela: others say, that afterwards he gaue all his pretensions and right to D. Pedro his sonne, to pursue it when opportunitie did serue, as a matter whereof there was but small hope. Thus D. Thibault Earle of Champagne, was receiued, proclaimed, and crowned King of Nauarre, to the great ioy and content of all good Nauarros.

The king of Arragon was then by the aduice of all his faithfull Councillers, entred in- to the conquest of the Realme of Valencia, hauing a fit opportunity offered, by reason of the diuisions which were in the kingdome, betwixt the factions of Zeit Aben Zeit, and Zael or Zsen, which were both strong. This Zeit Aben Zeit seeing himselfe pursued, hee made open declaration of that which he had long before designed, and making himself vassall to the king Don James, he became a Christian, and was called D. Vincent de Bellui. He afterwards married a Lady called Dominick Lopes of Sarraçossia, of which marriage was borne a daughter called Lude Fernandes, who was married to Blaize Ximenes d. Arenos.

21 The warre of Valencia being reloued, the Generall of the army vnder the king was D. Blaico Alagon, by whose valour and diligence Morelia was taken, a place which was held impregnable: Buriane was also besieged, and with great difficulty taken: Penicola, Chiuer, Ceruera, Polpes, Alcalaena, Albufera, Almenara, Vxo, Noles, Castro, Alfandecho, Paterna, Bulla and other places, some by force, some by composition, and partly by the meanes and intelligences which king Zeit had, and by the fauour of such as held his partie, came into the power of the king D. James, so as by degrees hee enuironed the city it selfe, cutting off their victuals and all other commodities. In these expugnations they did then vse rammes, mooring towers with many stages, and other sorts of engins. The resistance of the Moores which held Zaens partie was very great: neither were they abandoned of their friends, nor of the kings raigning in Affricke, for twelue galies, and fixe vessels called Zabres of Tunez, shewed themselves often, as if they would land, or assaile the places held by the Arragonois along the coast, but without any effect. The Estates of Arragon and Cattelogne were assembled at Monçon in the year 1236. for the continuance of this warre, and the conquest of Valencia, without the which it was not lawfull for the king to vnderake any matter of importance. The President at these estates was Pedro Perez Iustice maior of Arragon, where there assisted D. William of Montgrin, co-adiutor to the Arch-bishop of Tarragone, the Bishops of Barcelona, Saragossia, Vic, and Tortosa, the Master and Prior of the Templers and Hospitaliers, Friar Raymond of Pegnafort, a most famous Iacobin, Roger Bernard Earle of Foix, and Don Fernand the kings vncle, D. Ponce Cabrera Earle tutelarie of Vrgel, D. Pedro Vgo Earle of Ampurias, D. Nuño Sanchez Earle of Rossillon, D. Gerard Vicount of Cabrera, D. William of Cardona, D. William, and Pedro of Moncada, Berenger Puçuet, William and Berenger Anglesol, Bernard Portella, Hugues Mataplana, sonne to Hugues, Gislerand Pinos, William of Laquila, Raymond of Peralta, Peter Vicount of Villemuir, Raymond Villiam Odena, Berenger Erille, and William Ceruera, all Knights and Noblemen of Cattelogne. And of the realme of Arragon, D. Pedro Cornel Lord Steward, Bernard William, Garci Romeo, Simon Vrrca, Artorella, Artal de Lusa, Blaico Alagon, Roderigo Lizana, Blaico Maza, Berenger, Gombaid Entenza, Simon de Foces, Alfaisa Gualis, Fortun Verga, Simon Lueza and others. The meanes to defray this warre, besides the Croisados, pardons and indulgences, were ordaind to be leuied vpon the people, by the imposition of a custome called Morabentine and the exaction of the Impost for cattell. In this assembly it was decreed, that all peeces of gold and silver coyned, should be of one goodnes and weight, in Arragon and Cattelogne: to the obseruation of which Edict for coynes, all were bound to tieware, that were about 14. yeares old. During the sege of Valencia many Noblemen, and common souldiers strangers, French and English came to D. James his campe.

The

A The Authors of the Arragon Historie write, that the Kings army, at the hottest of the siege, might bee 60000. foot, and a thousand horse (meaning Knights and Masters) fol- lowed according vnto the Order and Discipline of warre in those dayes, by their vassalls, besides the forces at sea. This warre was long, and the sege troublesome: yet it was at- tempted, battered and assaulted, and the Moores within it brought to so great extremity, as Zaen the Vlturper of that Principalltie, being nor yet well fedled nor assured of the peoples wile, abandoned it, and retired to Denia. The citie was yecledd the 28. of Sep- tember, 1238.

The King Don James had in the year 1232. bene diuorced from D. Elenor of Ca- stille his wife, and yet had declared D. Alphonso their son, the lawfull heire of the realmes of Arragon and Maiorca, the lands of Cattelogne, Virgel, Montpellier, and others: ap- pointing for Gouvernors of his youth, the Bishop of Tarragone, the Masters or Priors of the Templers and Hospitaliers, and William Ceruera: ordainning, that he should be bredde vp at Monçon: and if he should chance to die, then did he substitute vnto his Realme of Prouence his cousin. Notwithstanding the king Don Pedro during this warre of Va- lencia contracted a new marriage with the daughter of Andrew king of Hungary, named Violant, by whom he had a sonne called D. Pedro, who was king, after him, of Arragon and Valencia, and Prince of Cattelogne: he had moreover the Infant Don Jaime, and a third was king of Maiorca and Minorca, and Earle of Rossillon and Montpellier, and a who called

C Don Sancho, who was Arch-bishop of Toledo, and Primate of Spaine. Hee had also fixe daughters by her: D. Isabell married to Philip the third King of France, sonne to Saint Lewis: D. Violant who was Queene of Castile and Leon, wife to D. Alphonso, King of Castile, D. Constance married to Don Manuell brother to the sayd D. Alphonso, King of Castile, D. Mary and D. Elenor who dyed young. The dowrie of Queene Tolant or Violant, as Su- rities writes, was ten thousand Markes of silver, and two hundred of gold, for her mothers rights, for the which the Duke of Austria became answerable. Moreover, a portion of the Countie of Namur in Flanders, and the lands and rights which her Predecessors had enioyed in France, with certaine places which she did then possesse in Hongarie, and others that were fallen to her in Bourgoigne, by her mothers right and succession. This

D Princesse was conducted to Barcelona in the year 1235. by the Bishop of the fixe Churches, and a kinsman of his called Cont Denis, who remained in Arragon, and was the Author of the noble family of Denis, which is vnto that of Vtrez, hee had two sonnes Amour and Gabriel Denis. Don Pedro the eldest son of Queene Tolant, was married young to Constance, daughter to Manfroy, bastard to the Emperour Frederick the second, whom they called Prince of Tarentum, which was a degree to attaine vnto the succession of the Realmes of Naples and Sicily, and by the marriage of his daughter Isabell with Philip the Hardy, sonne to Saint Lewis the French king, the Kings of Arragon obtained (as the hi- stories of Spain report) a full freedome of the Principalltie of Cattelogne, and Earldome of Barcelona, to enioy it from that time in full proprietie and Souerainty, without acknowledging themselves any more vassalls to the Kings of France: the which was done at Clermont in Auvergne, whereas both Kings met in the year 1260. In recompence the King of Arragon did also quit for his part the rights of Souerainie which he preten- ded to Carcaffone, Rhodes, Beziers, Locate, Albi, Amillaire, Nismes, Saint Giles, and other lands in France, the which he assigned in dowrie to his daughter D. Isabell, with the reuenues of Carcaffone and Beziers: and moreover, he quit all right which he could pre- tend to the Earldome of Prouence, Folquaquier, Arles, Auignon and Marselilles, in fa-uour of Queene Marguerite of France.

E The death of D. Sanche king of Nauarre, the beginning of the warre of Valencia, and the second marriage of D. James King of Arragon, happened all in the year 1234. by rea- son whereof, and to giue order for the affaires of the Infanta D. Elenor, whom he had put away, by reason of the strict allyance which was betwixt them, according to the Popes decree, there was an interview of this King of Arragon, and of Don Fernand king of Ca- stile, in the Mouasterie of Huerta, vpon the confines of Castile; where it was accorded, that the Infant Don Alphonso, whom Don James had by Donna Elenor, named King of Arragon, if he had liued, should remaine in the custodie of the Queene his mother, to whom for an increase of her dowrie, the towne of Hariza was given, to enioy it during her life, but in case shee should marry againe, then should it returne to Arragon. These and other things being friendly accorded betwixt the two kings, they parted with great loue, to make warre against the Moores, euery one apart. Some haue left in writing, that D. Thersa of Bidaure, with whom the King D. Lames had had familiar acquaintance, before he married the Queene D. Yolant, and had children by her, sued him vpon a promise of marriage before the Pope, where she lost it for want of proofes, and D. Yolant was declared his lawfull wife. There the Bishop of Gironne then the kings Confessor (hauing vnderstood by his confession of this matrimoniall promise) had reuealed it vnto Pope Innocent the fourth, but to what end he did it, it is vncertaine: but his testimonie alone was not allowed. The king being wonderfully incensed against the Bishop, hauing sent for him into his chamber, caused his tounge to be cut out. For this outrage committed vpon the Bishop, notwithstanding that he were faultie, hauing reuealed the Kings confession, the Pope made great complaints, being at the Councell of Lyons, and in the end did interdict all the Realme of Arragon, and excommunicate the king D. Lames. To free them from this interdiction, and to get absolution, the king sent the Bishop of Valencia vnto the Pope to carry his excuse, and to make an humble petition, wherewith the Pope being somewhat pacified, he yielded to send two Legates into Arragon with full power. Hauing assembled a Synode of Bishops at Lerida, they caused the king to come thither, who confessed his fault vpon his knees before these Fathers, with great submission and teares: who gaue him absolution, vpon condition, that he should cause the Monastery of Bienface, neere vnto Torrofa to be built, (the which hath bene since a Conuent of Charrtous Monkes) and to indow it with an hundred and forty pounds of siluer of annuall rent. And moreover, that he should endow the hospitall of Saint Vincent of Valencia, with foure hundred pounds waight of siluer by the yeare for the nourishment of the poore: and that he should giue a Prebendarie to the great Church of Gironne, for the maintenance of a Masse-priest. Then fell he to the loue of this ladie againe, and entertayned her during the life of this Queene D. Yolant.

Castile and Alouet.

23 As for the king D. Fernand, he was affronted with the power of king Aben-Hut, who was mightie: but seeing his forces increased by the succession of the Realmes of Leon, which were fallen vnto him, he was in hope to effect his desseignes. Wherefore he assayed him towards Baega which he held, and went and layed seage to Vbeda, a neere towne, strong, and well fortified, yet he prest them in such sort, as the Garrison compounded to depart with their liues: into the which the king D. Fernand entred the same yeare 1234. in the which his fortunes were seasoned with some bitterness, according to the condition of humane things: for he lost the Queene D. Beatrix his wife, who died in Toro in the kingdom of Leon: her body was carryed to the Monasterie of las Huelgas of Burgos, and buried neere vnto the king D. Henry. Vpon this subiect the king D. Fernand came into the territories of Leon: during his absence the garrisons vpon the frontier tooke certaine Moores Almogueres (for so they call their Mortepaiez) of the citie of Cordoua: and for that they were in quarrell with the Inhabitants thereof, they were easily corrupted, promising to giue entry to the Christians into the citie of Cordoua. The plot being layd, and all things disposed accordingly, there came a good troupe of Christians in the night with ladders, the which they planted vnto the wall neere vnto the tower and Bourg, called Axarquia, where by the helpe and fauor of those Moores whom they had wonne, Aluaro Colodro, and Benoist of Bagnos entred first, being well followed by their companions, without any discourie of them of the towne, who slept without feare or apprehension vntill the morning, when as they saw the Christians had seized vpon the tower, and there did fortifie themselves, attending succors from Don Aluaro Perez, whom they had sent vnto being at Martos, vpon their entry: and as men expecting some great resistance, they had also sent to aduertise the King Don Fernand of their enterprize and happy successe, to the end he should approach neere to fauour them. The Moores of Cordoua seeing themselves surprized, went to armes, and beleaged the Christians in this tower, where they defended themselves: the combat was furious, and often condue fur-prised by the Christians.

A often renewed, euery one doing his best indeauour, wherein they spent some dayes, yet could they not chase the Christians out of the tower, which they had intrenched from the rest of the towne. In the meane time, the king D. Fernand aduanced with all speed, giuing order for the rest of his forces to follow, and passing by Extremadura, neere vnto Bienguerencia, the Gouernor a Moore, furnished the kings armie with victuals as it pass, yet being summoned to deliuer the fort vnto the king, he made answer, that when he had taken Cordoua, it should be at his commandement, and in the meane time he would keep it: Wherefore the king of Castile passed on, and arriving at Cordoua, hee found that D. Aluaro Perez de Castro, and other Captaines and souldiers in great numbers, were already come to succour his men. King Aben Hut being aduertised of all these things, and of D. Fernands arrival with small forces, although there came great troupes afterwards, thought it fit to prevent him, if he could, or at the least to strike some terror into the Christians, and force them to retire from this seage. He had in his armie which lay about Ecacia, a Christian Knight, a banished man called D. Laurenz Suarez. Hauing imparted his desseigne vnto him, he resolved to send him one night vnto the campe, vnder colour of seeking to recover the kings fauour: but it was to espie, and to discouer vnto him the true estate of the Christians armie. This Knight hauing obtained a passport, came vnto the campe, and spake vnto the king, doing the contrarie to that which he had in charge: for he discouered vnto the King D. Fernand, all the Moores desseignes, and what forces hee had: wherefore being assured from the king, of his grace and fauour, he retired to Aben Hut, to whom he concealed what he had seene and vnderstood, telling him that the Christians army was much stronger then it was indeed. Wherefore king Aben Hut durst not attempt that which he had resolved, and thinking that they of Cordoua would hold good for a time, he resolved to employ his forces to succour king Zaen, who was prest by the king of Arragon towards Valencia, thinking after that he had repulsed the Arragonois, to returne fortified with Zaens forces, and cause the Christians to retire from before Cordoua. Being arrived at Almeria, to imbarke his army, a vassall of his, whom hee did much esteeme, called Aben Arramin, invited him to supper, where he so feasted him, as being drunke, he cast him into a great vessell full of water, and there drowned him: whereupon the army disbanded, and D. Laurenz Suarez whom king Aben Hut had ledde with him, retired to the king of Castile, who receiued him graciously, notwithstanding that he had betrayed him who had entertayned him during his exile. This death of this Moorish king, being generally knowne, especially at Cordoua, the beleaged depayred of succors, so as they yielded the citie vnto the king of Castile, the sixt moneth of the seage, in the yeare 1236, which was 522. yeares after that it had bene first taken by the Moores. The king Don Fernand caused a crosse to be set vpon the tower of the great Mesquide, in token of our redemption, and neere vnto it the standard of Castile, which Mesquide was purified (being one of the goodliest buildings in Spaine) and made the Cathedral Church, of the which Don Lope de Histero of Piquerga was made bishop: The king did indow it with rents and reuenues like the rest, and so did the Arch-bishop Don Roderigo in his returne from Rome, where he had bene during the seage, and was not at the taking thereof, to his great griefe, but affaires of greater Importance had kept him absent: in the meane time Don John Bishop of Olma was his Vice-gerent and Chancellor to the King. There the bells of Saint Lames were found, which the Alhagib Almanzor had taken away in the yeare 975. and placed them in this great Mesquide, making them to serue for lampes, which the king Don Fernand caused to be transported to their ancient mansion. The affaires of this great citie, which had bene the chiefe of the Moores estate, were ordered by the king, both for religion, iustice, and for the guard and safety thereof, with great care. Don Tello Alphonso de Menezes, was made Gouernor of the citie, and Don Aluaro Perez de Castro of the whole frontier.

The kingdom of Granado.

BY the losse of Cordoua and the death of king Aben Hut, the Moores were wonderfully dismayed and voyd of Councell: wherefore they returned to their old course every one respecting his private interest: so as the Infidels estate was dismembred into many parts. Aben Hudiel among others, seized vpon the Realme of Murcia, Zeit and Zarnbo yet in warre, and contending for the realme of Valencia. In the country of Algarbe, whereof Niebla was the chiefe city, Aben Isafon reigned, who had for his successor Aben Amarin, and then another called Aben Mosad. Those of Seuille would haue no king, but only a Gouvernor: where one Axatuf was in great authoritie, and it was he which lost it. But aboute all the power of Mahomad Alienahagmar or Aben Alamar was great; so called for that he had a red face: who from a shepheard hauing followed armes, had attained to the chiefe places of honour, and was in such credit by reason of his valour, force, and stature, as in these tumults, the Inhabitants of Arjona, where he was borne, chose him for their king, and then other people submitted themselves vnder him, especially the townes of Iuen, Baeza, which was ill guarded, and Guadix, and in the end the city of Granado, which he afterwards made his royall seat, and the chiefe of all his country and Seigneuries. This was the first king of Granado, whereas vntill that time there was no kingdom: it was erected at such time as Cordoua the chiefe citie of all the Moores Estate in Spain was made subiect vnto the Christians.

25 Whilest that the king Don Fernand is busie at this honorable enterprize of Cordoua, and D. Jaime or James king of Arragon, at that of Valencia, which was nothing inferior, Thibaud the new king of Nauarre had meanes to settle his affaires without any difficulty, for he found all the Estates of the Kingdom willing to obey him. At his reception he did sweare and confirme the liberties and priuiledges of the country, the which he did also augment. This was the beginning of the second masculine line of the Kings of Nauarre, the first ending in D. Sancho, the which since D. Garcia Ximenes had continued 518. yeares. Successions of States and Soueraignties falling to women against all lawe and presidents of well ordered kingdoms, in the first ages, is the cause that strange and vnknowne Princes, of diuers humors, come to raigne ouer Nations, which sometimes haue succeeded well, but very often great troubles and inconueniences haue followed. At this time the Nauarrois were not vnfortunate, to haue a king of the French nation, who was a meane to augment the power and dignitie of that Crowne, by many accessories from France: his mother D. Blanche daughter to the king D. Sancho the Wife, and sister to the last Sancho, was the first which brought the succession of women into Nauarre, although he did not raigne, beeing dead before the king Don Sancho the Strong her brother. D. Pedro Ramires of Pedrola, Bishop of Pampelone, among others did faithfully maintaine the rights of this king Thibaud, who was called the Elder, to distinguish him from his sonne and successor, being also of the same name: of whose deedes wee haue no great instructions out of histories, only we haue gathered out of some writings and records tending to other ends, that which we shall relate of him. He was thrice married, as the Spaniards write. First, he had to wife a Lady of Lorraine, daughter to an Earle of Metz, fro whom he was diuorced by the Popes authoritie hauing no children. His second wife was daughter to Guichard Lord of Beaujeu, who it may be was the 3. of that name: from which marriage issued Blanche, who was married to Iohn Duke of Brittainie, furnished thered. Thirdly, he married Marguerite daughter to Archembaud one of the Earles of Foix (it may be there is some error in the name, for there is no mention made in the Histories of that time, of any Archembaud of Foix) of whom he begot Thibaud and Henry, who succeeded one after another in the Realme of Nauarre, and one daughter called Donna Leonora, and Don Pedro Lord of the house of Murugabal (which is now ruined) neere vnto Mendegoria, so called in the Biscaine tongue, which signifies a redde mountaine.

All

A All these marriages, or at the least the two first, were before his coming to the crowne of Nauarre, which was in the 33. yeare of his age. The manners of this Prince are commended by the Spaniards, saying, That he was liberal, modest, a great builder, louing musicke, curious of matters belonging to tillage, by reason whereof he planted his country of Nauarre with many sorts of vnknowne frutes, the which he caused to bee brought out of France: so as there is yet a kind of Pearre of Nauarre, which they call Thibuatinas, or Thibaudines: he was a great catholike, and zealous of the Romish Religion: the castell of Treuas was of his building.

Dis. of King Thibaud.

In his time there was a great sute ended betwixt the blacke Monkes Benedictines, and those of Cisteaux, for that the deceased king D. Sancho, would haue changed the ancient Monkes of Saint Sauueur of Leyre, and placed them of the Order of Cisteaux there, the which he could not effect, being violently oppugned by the Benedictins: who during the raigne of king Thibaud lost their cause: but notwithstanding that they were condemned and dispossessed, yet they gave it not ouer, vntill they were restored to their ancient possession: the which was after the death of Thibaud the second, Henry his brother raigning, to whom they bound themselves to pay 600. charges of corne yearly, vntill they had deliuered the summe of 8500. Maraudis of gold. Finally, to end the new instances which were daily made by the one or the other, D. Sancho Archb. of Toledo, Infant of Arragon, and he of Tarragone, hauing authority from the Apostolike see of Rome, commanded the Monkes of S. Benet to perpetuall silence, and restored them of Cisteaux to the possession: and after the death of the king D. Henry, the Gouvernor of Nauarre freed the Monks of this tribute, for the discharge of the Kings conscience, as an excoffine & vnusit Impost.

Thus the Cistercian Monkes of S. Bernard, remained in quiet possession of the Monastery of S. Sauueur of Leyre. By reason of the contentions of these Monks, there were many letters, remembrances, and records of this Monasterie lost, the which did serue much in those times for the illustrating of matters of Nauarre. The Christian affaires in Syria being ill managed, and their estate in those parts declining much, Pope Gregory the 9. caused a Croysade to be preached throughout all Christendome, by the Monkes of the Orders of S. Dominick and S. Francis: wherefore many Princes and great Personages of France and other countries inrolled themselves, of which expedition Thibaud king of Nauarre was the chiefe. The Noblemen and Knights Christians, desiring to passe their troups by sea, could not be accommodated by the Commonweales of Genoa and Pisa, who were then very strong in shipping, by reason of the mutuall warre they had together, to the great preiudice of Christendome. The Venetians in like manner troubled with the affairs of the Empire of Greece, gaue them no meane to performe this voyage. Wherefore king Thibaud and his troupe were forced to take their way by land into Syria, where beeing arrived at Antioch, after infinit toyle, hauing to encounter with hunger, diseases, and want of all things, besides the enemy, who had seized vpon the passages in the streights of Mouit Taurus, he found that two parts of his souldiers which had come out of France, Nauarre, and the frontiers of Germany, were wanting, beeing either dead by the way, or slaine by the Turks: the remainders of these poore Christians arrived at Acre, which is the ancient Ptolemaide, where they began to make war against the Turks with small successe.

A little before this expedition, the Emperor Fredrick the 2. had bin in Palestina: and as if he had had no other occasion to make this voyage, but ambitiously to seeke to ioyne the vaine title of king of Ierusalem, to the rest which he carried of many kingdoms, he entered the city of Ierusalem without any resistance, hauing purchased the fauor of Coradin Sultan of Egypt: and hauing caused himselfe to be crowned there, he returned presently into Italy, hauing made a truce with the Infidels. Iest some Germane souldiers in those countries to supply the garrisons, who had no good correspondency with the king of Nauarre nor his men, neither could they cuer draw any succors from them, for that they held the French to be affected to the Pope, with whom their Emperor had had great quarrels: wherefore they were forced to make war alone. And the more to crosse K. Thibauds good fortune, it fell out that many Noblemen which came in his company disbanded, and returned home, among the which was the Duke of Brittainie: so as the king D. Thibaud, after many vnfortunate encounters, was forced to returne by sea into the weill.

Beeing

Being arrived in France, he made some abode there to visit his lands, and then he past into Nauarre. Don Thibaud king of Nauarre made not this voyage in the company of Saint Lewis the French king, as some write: but some yeares before, being in the yeere 1238. where as that of S. Lewis was ten yeares after, or twelue, as some affirme, as it appears by the histories of France.

Valencia.

26 In the same yeare 1238. the city of Valencia, hauing beene long besieged by Don Jaime King of Arragon, and reduced to great necessitie, was yielded vnto him by Zen the Moore, who had viurped that Principalltie, who retiring to Denia, left it without men or goods, leading with him about 50000. Moores, who carried with them (according to the composition) their gold, silver, armes and all their moueables: so as that citie which was held one of the richest and most stately of all Spaine, was to be peopled anew, if they would keepe it: wherefore there were chiefe men appointed by the king D. James, to distribute the houses and buildings, lands, and possessions to the new Colony, which was sent out of the countreys of Cattelogne and Arragon. These were D. Berenger Palatit Bishop of Barcelona, D. Vidal Canelis Bishop of Huesca, Don Pedro Fernandez de Agagra, and Don Symon d'Yrraca, knights: who disposed of the places vnto those that should people this great citie, according vnto euery mans ranke, dignity, and merit.

There were 380. heads of families, among other men of make, or old fouldiers, (hauling faithfully and valiantly carried armes, as well as this seage, as in former warres) then to this effect inrolled, to hold the first place and prerogative among the Inhabitants thereof, and there were primate lawes made for them of Valencia: yet the Gentlemen of Arragon, who were appointed for this new Colony, did insist, that they and their inheritors might enioy the priuiledges of Arragon, the which did afterwards breed troubles and dissensions betwixt them and the rest of the people. The Episcopall see was restored to this city, and D. Ferrer of S. Martin was the first bishop, being made subiect to the Arch bishop of Tarragone: notwithstanding that in the Goths time, that church did acknowledge the Metropolitan of Toledo. D. Rodrigo Lizana was made the first Viceroy of Valencia, by the king D. James: there were many Christian families found in it, who did exercise their religion in the church of S. Sepulcher, called at this day S. Bartholomew. It was then of a round forme, and but weakly walled, at this day it is enlarged and made square, and hath 12. gates, where as it had but 4. The chiefe citie of this realme being now in the power of the king of Arragon, he soone recovered all the other places and fortre, which was a goodly conquest, and a great increase to his other Estates. The other places continued peopled with the ancient inhabitants, who were contented to liue vnder the king of Arragon, enioying their religion.

Castile.

Don aluarez
de liu.

The affaires of Spain being in this estate, D. Fernand king of Castile, after the death of D. Beatrix his wife, married a French Lady called leanne, daughter to Symon Earle of Ponthieu, who was somewhat allied to the house of Castile, by the mothers side; for that her mother, wife to Count Symon, called Mary, was daughter to Adella Countesse of Ponthieu, grand-child to king Lewis the 7. and D. Isabella of Castile, daughter to the Emperor D. Alphonso. This Lady was very mild, and greatly beloued and honored of the Spaniards. The king had by her the Infant D. Fernand, Iurnamed of Ponthieu, one daughter called D. Leonora, and another son, whose name was D. Louis. The marriage being consummated, the king led his new spouse through the townes of Castile and Leon, whereas great honours were done vnto her. In the meane time he disposed of all necessarie prouisions vpon the Mores frontiers, where they were continually annoyed by their incursions, to prevent the which, the Gouvernor D. Aluaro Perez de Castro, a wife and polittick Capitaine, omitted not any thing that might concerne the duty of his charge. The Mores were so insolent vnder their new king Mahomad Aben Alhamar, as D. Aluaro Perez was forced to come in person to conser with the king at Aillon, and to acquaint him with the affaires of that frontier: where the Mores were the stronger, and had a little before his departure, besieged Martos, the which (without the succors which D. Tello Alphonso de Meneses brought, had bin taken, and in it his wife, whom he had left there. Whereupon the king commanded he should be supplied with all things that were needfull: but as this knight returned into Andalusia, he dyed at Orgas, in the yeare 1239. whose losse was great: and at the same time there

A there dyed also D. Lopez Diaz de Haro, another valiant and wise knight, leaving one sonne, heire of the teigneury of Biscay and other lands, called D. Diego Lopez the 3. of that name. The good successe which the kings of Spaine had in their conquests, made them and their subiects the more superstitious. They of Arragon shewed great deuotion at that time, to an image which was found during the war of Valence, to the which there was a Monastery built at Puig, and it recommended to the Monks, called de la Merced. Then was the Episcopall seat of Calaoarra remoued to S. Dominick de la Calçada, by the procurement of D. John Perez the bishop, who spared not his paines to go to Rome, where he obtained what he pretended from Pope Gregory the 9. the holy Father providing, and giuing power vnto the Bishop to take his Diocesses, for the defraying of his charges. If this touched the glory of God, or the edification of his church, let the wife indigent this did not hold, for some yeares after the church of Calaoarra was restored to her former dignity, and yet that of S. Dominick remained a Cathedral, being in former time but a Collegial, yet one bishop holding both vnto ourtime. At that time there liued a Doctor called Hugues Candido a Iacobin, of whom Spaine makes great account. After the death of D. Aluaro de Castro the king of Castile, hauing led an army in person into Andalusia, and giuen order for the safe keeping of the citie of Cordoua, he tooke partly by force, partly by feare, and partly by accord, the citie of Ecchia, and the townes of Estepa, Almodonal del Rio, Sietefilla, Lucena, Luque, Porcuna, Core, Moron, Castellar, Marchena, Coerros, Cabra, Oluna, Baena, Monraquilar, Tenexir, Ballar, Bute Morgu, Pardal, Casra, Ormaqueles, Mirabel, Fuentequemel, Moratilla, and S. Ella, most of which places the knights of Calatrana, they of S. James, and the Prelates obtained from the king, and was giuen to the Noblemen and knights. The kings affairs were much advanced by the taking of a Moore Almoade, who had past out of Affrick into Spaine, to challenge that which the kings of his race had enioyed there. Caid Arrax then reigned at Marroc, being grand child to Aben Mahomad the Greene, borne at Buxaf, who dyed while his father liued.

In the yeare 1240. a truce was made betwixt the king of Castile, and Mahomad Aben Alamar of Arjona, who reigned in Granada. Vntill this time Don Roderigo the Archbishop and Primate hath written the historie or Chronicle of Spaine. The title which Don Fernand king of Castile gaue himselfe at that time, was, king of Castile, Toledo, Leon, Galicia, Cordoua, and Baeça, leaving that of Nagera, and other small places, for the which he tooke those of the great townes which he had conquered from the Moores. Hee gaue the like titles to the Queenes his mother and wife, as it appears by that which was written of him in Latin the same yeare, as the custome was then: where particular mention is made of the infants D. Alphonso and D. Frederick, D. Martin Gonzales of Mijancas, being Merino Maior of Castile. Besides the Art of warre, wherein the king was very expert, he was also very careful to maintaine Iustice in his kingdomes, with all other good gouernment, by reason whereof, he transported vnto Salamanca the Vniuersity which D. Alphonso his grandfather had instituted at Palenca, as a place more commodious for the good of all Spaine, and in a country more fertile, and abounding with all things necessary, to which Vniuersity this king, his sonne D. Alphonso, and others their successors, haue giuen great reuenues, priuiledges, and exemptions, so as it is thought there is no Vniuersitie in the world where as the professors haue greater pensions.

Whilest that he busied himselfe in these good and honorable actions, hee had some troubles by the means of D. Diego Lope de Haro, who was retired into his country of Biscay, discontented with the King, yet after some little warre attempted against him, by the Infant D. Alphonso, the king was aduised not to estrange from his seruice a Nobleman of so good a race, from whom the kings of Castile had receiued so good seruices in their wars against the Moores: wherefore D. Diego Lope was receiued into more fauor then before.

The truce made with Mahomad Aben Alamar, expired in the yeare 1241: wherefore the Infant Don Alphonso was sent vnto the frontiers of Andalusia: being arrived at Toledo, hee found the Ambassadors of Alboaquez, or according vnto some, of Aben Hacer King of Murcia, who went vnto the King Don Fernand, to offer him the Realme of Murcia, whom hee caused to returne backe, marching himselfe with them to receiue this realme, which was voluntarily offered vnto him, hauing in his company Don Pelayo

Some write, that the Earle came to Lions, to kisse the Popes foote, and accepted from A his hands the charge of Gouvernor of Portugal, and afterwards at Paris he sware the Articles and capitulations which were made in that behalfe: from whence he went into Portugal with the Popes Briefes, where he was received by the subiects but not by D. Sancho, who would not obey the Popes commandement, but retired into Castile. The Authors do not agree well about the time of this retreat: some saying, that it was during the raigne of Don Fernand: others attribute it to the time of D. Alphonso his sonne, which is the most likely; wherefore continuing to treat of the affaires of Castile in D. Fernand time, we will afterwards returne to the Estate of Portugal.

The yeare 1245. was the last of the life of Don Roderigo Ximenes Arch-bishop of Toledo, a Prelate of great esteeme among the Spaniards. He dyed in his returne of a voyage from Rome, vpon the confines of Castile and Arragon, in the Monasterie called Our Lady of Huerta or Horta, where he was interred: famous for his doctrine, good life, great experience, and rare eloquence, according to the time, and especially for his hatred against the name of the Mahumetits and Moores, to whom hee made warre with all his power, spirit, body, and wealth: he was a fauourer of the rents and priuiledges of the Clergie, the which he did much augment in Spaine, especially in his owne Sea, and built and peopled many places which had beene ruined. Don Iohn the second succeeded him in the Arch-bishopricke of Toledo, Primacie of Spaine, and Chancelorship of Castile. About the end of Don Roderigo Ximenes dayes, mention is made of a Booke found by a Jew in a stone, in the which it was contained, without any shew of ioyning together: it was written in three languages, Hebrew, Greeke, and Latin, the which made mention of three worlds from Adam vnto Antichrist, shewing the nature and disposition of the men of either world: and in the beginning of the discourse of the third world, it contained, that the Sonne of God should be borne of a Virgin, and suffer for the saluation of mankind: and (the which seemed more then wonderfull) it was written in this booke, that it should be found during the raigne of Don Fernand. Whether this were a thing done of purpose, or accidentall, by this strange inuention, rather then for that which the Booke contained, this Jew was moued to become a Christian at Toledo: for hee might haue learned the comming of the Sonne of God in Isay, and other bookes of the old Testament, and in the Gospell, if he would haue read them.

In Segobia there was a stranger accident of a woman Jew, who had a great deuotion to the Virgin Mary in secret, who being wrongfully accused by her husband of adultery, as by the order of law she was ready to be cast downe from a high rocke neere the town, she recommended herselfe to the blessed Virgin, who preferring her in the fall, layd her at the foot of the rocke without any harme. This Jew being ill instructed in her religion, and worshipping that of the Christians, published this miracle vnto the people, and was ledde with great admiration vnto the church of S. Mary the great in Segobia, where being baptised, she was named Mary that leaped from the rocke: these are the tales of Friar Alphonso d'Espina in his booke called Fortalitium fidei.

An. 1246. The King Don Fernand hauing a great desire to chase the Moores of Seuille, about the yeare 1246. prepared an armie at sea in Biscay and Guisufcon, whether hee sent a Captaine of great experience, called Raymond Bousface, borne at Burgos, inioyning him to be at a prefixt time vpon the coast of Andalusia, that he might at one instant beseege the citie both by sea and land. In the meane time he so annoyed the towne of Carmona, as he forced them to some submission: hee tooke Constantine, the which he gaue to the city of Cordoua, and to the towne of Reyna, wherewith hee endowed the knights of the Order of Saint James, the which is at this day a goodly Commanderie. The towne of Lora hauing yielded for feare of a seege, the king gaue it to the Order of Saint Iohn of Hierusalem: he afterwards tooke Cantillana by force, where there were aboute seven hundred Moores slaine: Guilena yielded by composition, so as they sped well for that time, but rebelling afterwards, it was razed. Hereupon the king fell sicke, which stayed the course of his victories, for that he could not be in person in the army, the which is of great importance: yet Alcala del Rio was taken after a long seege, and a great resistance.

The king hauing recovered his health, they treated a marriage betwixt the Infant Don Alphonso,

A Alphonso and D. Violant Infanta of Arragon, daughter to the King D. Jaime, and the Queene D. Violant his second wife, the which was consummated in the towne of Valladolid, whether the Princeesse was brought this yeare 1246. By this marriage all quarrels betwixt these two Kings were reconciled: for the King D. James held himselfe wronged by him of Castile for many respects, but especially for that hee had assisted and supported his sonne D. Alphonso, who had conspired against him some yeeres before, with the Nobility of Arragon and Valencia, for that the King D. James, hauing in the yeare 1243. propounded vnto the Estates, assembled at Daroca, to allot portions vnto his children which he had by diuers ventures, that he might leaue them in peace after his death: he had assigned vnto D. Alphonso the eldest, the crowne of Arragon, and to D. Pedro, which he had by Queene Violant, the Principality of Cattelogne: which Prouince notwithstanding he would restraine by the river of Sigro, leauing by that meane the towne of Lerida, in Arragon, whereat the Cattelans seemed to be much discontented, and the Infant D. Alphonso more, who would not haue this principality dismembered from the crowne; this businesse being referred vnto the Estates which were held sometime after at Barcelona, the limits and iurisdiction of Cattelogne were extended vnto the river Singra, so as Ribagorze and Pallars were contained in Cattelogne: notwithstanding the King persisting to leaue D. Pedro his younger sonne heire of that Prouince, the Infant D. Alphonso conspired with D. Fernand his great vncke, D. Pedro of Portugal, D. Pedro Fernandes d'Araya, D. Iohn Goncal of Heredia, and drawing vnto him all the Nobility of Arragon and Valencia, he had taken armes, and being aided and fauored by D. Fernand King of Castile, he had caused great troubles in Arragon, the which the King using by good counsel somewhat pacified, hee was this yeare reconciled to the King of Castile, by meanes of this marriage, many Noblemen of both Kingdomes hauing beene mediators therein, yea and some learned men, whereof there were many in Castile, for this King D. Fernand was the first of the Kings of Castile, which did honour his counsell of Estate with learned men, choosing twelve, which were well read in the law, who did alwaies accompany him, the which was initiated by many Kings his successors.

D By these graue and learned men, was then begun, by the Kings commandement, the bookes of the lawes of the realme, called Las Siete partidas, the which was finished in the time of D. Alphonso his sonne: a worthy worke, copious and full of variety: this assembly of learned men was continued for a time, and then changed, mingling sometimes church-men amongst them, and knights that were not learned, for the affaires of the Estate. In the end they did conuert it into a Chancery, whereas suites were decided, the which was as a court of Parliament following the King, and afterwards it was diuided into two Courts or Chanceries, one seated at Grenado, and the other at Valladolid, as welles in our time. In like manner D. James King of Arragon, caused the lawes and customes of Arragon, to be reduced into writing; as it were in one body, hauing til that time bene obserued by tradition, which volume was confirmed by the Estates held at Huesca, in the yeare 1247.

The King being at Alcala del Rio, he was aduertised that his Admiral Raymond Bousface, was come into the mouth of the riuier of Guadalquivir, with thirteene ships of warre, which had bene set vpon by twenty Moores ships of Seuille, Centa and Tanger, whom the Christians had vanquished, taken three ships, broken and disarmed the second, and sonke one, the rest hauing recovered the sea. Of which danger the King hauing intelligence before, and that there was a fleet of Moores at sea, which attended his army, hee had sent some troupes of horse and foote vnto the sea coast to fauour them, if they should bee forced to run on shore: but they arrived after the victory: these thirteene vessels keeping the mouth of the riuier, the land army came and camped about the city of Seuille, in the mouth of August 1247, not without great and bloody skirmishes against the Moores, who fallied out vpon them which made the approaches, especially towards the sea, vntill many politike stratagems to fire the ships which lay at anchor within the riuier, which attempts the Admiral Raymond Bousface did valiantly withstand, and repulsd the Moores, so their great losse and shame.

The

The beginning of this sieg was so prosperous for the Christians, as the garrison and Inhabitants of Carmona, being but sixe leagues from Seule, resolved to yield themselves to King Fernand, supposing that if they did protract it any longer, they were vndone. The city being enuironed, and all passages stoppt, so as there could no victuals enter, they were daily in fight both by land, and sea, where the Moores were most annoyed, and therefore they had a great desire to burne the navy, but they found good resistance. Hec amongst the commanders which did most feats of armes, was D. Pelayo Perez Correa, maister of the Order of Saint James, and of the Knights Garcia Perez de Vargas, of Toledo.

Whilst they were busie about this sieg of Seule, the Infant D. Alphonso of Castille was in the realme of Murcia, where he sought to take the towne of Xatua, which is not farre from Valencia, hauing already seized vpon Enguerra; but the King D. Jaime, his father in law, crossed his conquests, saying that he attempted vpon his right, for that Xatua and other neighbour places belongeth vnto him, according to the last limitation. And for that the Infant D. Alphonso did not retire his forces, the King of Arragon tooke Villena and Saix in the country of Castille, the which were held by the knights of Calatrava; and from the Moores he tooke Capdetes and Burgarra, places belonging to the conquest of Castille. These differences being like to cause greater troubles, some great personages interposed themselves, procuring the father in law and the sonne to meet at Almisra, where they reconciled them: yet the King of Arragon shewed himselfe very strict against D. Alphonso, refusing to giue him leaue to conquer Xatua, the which he promised to hold in doury of his wife Tolind. There they did assigne the lands which should belong to either Realme, appointing for the frontier to Murcia against Valencia, Almansa, Sarazul, and the riuer Cabriul: and to Valencia, Castralla, Biar, Saxons, Alarch, Finefrat, Torres, Polop, La Menle lez d' Aguas, and Altea, with their confines. The mediators of this accord were the maister of Saint James, the Prior of the Temple, and D. Diego Lopes de Haro, who returned with the Infant D. Alphonso of Castille, and all their troupes, to the campe before Seule, where the King of Granada arrived also, well accompanied, and there were some succors sent from the King of Arragon; at this sieg there were great and dayly skirmishes, especially about a bridge of boates which was betwixt the city, and the Bourg of Triana, vpon the riuer of Guadalquivir, the which in the end was broken by the Christians, hauing taken the opportunity of a great and violent winde, in the which they let slippe two great boates, the which came with such violence as they brake the bonds wherewith the bridge was tied: the which did wonderfully amaze the Moores.

This great city was so straightly besieged as they began to want victuals, and therefore doubting they should not be able to defend it long, they demanded a composition, the which was granted them vpon these conditions. That the city should be deliuered vnto the King D. Fernand, and that all the Moores that would should depart, with their goods, to whom there was left for a retreat the townes of Saint Lucar, Aznalfarache, and Niebla: and for that they should haue time to depart, the King nor his garrisons should not enter but a month after the making of this accord, and in the mean time the fort or castle of the city should be deliuered vnto the King. According to these Articles there went out of Seule about a 100000. Moores of all ages and sexes, which past into Affrike, besides such as remained in Andalusia and Granada. Thus the King D. Fernand got this goodly great city in the yeere 1248. hauing continued his sieg sixteene monthes: it was not commanded by any King, but only by a Gouvernor called Asatuf.

The first thing the King did was to provide for matters of religion. He went in a sollemne procession to the great Mesquite, the which was cleansed and hallowed, and a Mass song by D. Guttiere elect Archbishop of Toledo, successor to D. John deceased. D. Raymond Lozano was chosen Archbishop of that church, the king resolving to enrich it with great reuenues like vnto the rest. The greatest personages which were at this sieg with the King D. Fernand, were his children, D. Alphonso, D. Frederic, and D. Henry, D. Guttiere Archbishop of Toledo, see of Saint James, called D. John Arias, D. Garcia

Ruy Goncalves Giron*, Arias Goncalves Quixada, D. Alphonso Telles de Meneses, D. Gomes Reis de Manzanedo, D. Rodrigo Aluarez of Toledo; D. Rodrigo Froles, D. Fernand Yanez, Ruy Goncalves, first Alcaide or capitaine of Carmona, Garcia Perez de Vargas, of Toledo, D. Laurence Suarez, and Diego Martinez Adalia: all these were in the Land army. In that B at sea was Ruy non Boniface Admiral, with many knights and Squiers of Biscay and Guipuscoa, with whom there ioyned many mariners and souldiers Basques, from about Bayonne in France: all that had done the King any seruice in this warre, were rewarded according to their merits and callings, much land, and many houses were giuen to the Nobility, wherein the Clergy was not forgotten. And for that the city was vnpeopled, the King inuited people from all parts, with gifts, preuiledges, and great immunities, so as it was loone full of inhabitants.

Soone after this prize, the King sent part of his victorious army against some places of strength thereabouts, the which were made subiect vnto him, some by force, and some by a voluntary composition, as Medina Sionia, Alcala Bejel, Alpechin, Aznalfarache, Arcos & Lebrina and others towards the sea. By this conquest the King D. Fernand was free from all warre behinde the limits of his Prouince, for hee ment to entertaine peace and friendship with King Mahomad of Granada, who had alwaies carried himselfe faithfully towards him: wherefore he began now to conceiue in his imagination the conquest of all Affrike, and resolved to passe the Straights in the spring, with a great army, against Caid Arrax, Miralmumin of Maroc, but death preuented him, in the city of Seule, newly conquered, in the yeere 1252. hauing reigned in Castille about fise and thirtie yeeres, and in Leon one and twenty. There were present at his death, his sons, D. Alphonso, D. Frederic and D. Henry, D. Alphonso Lord of Molina, the deceased Kings brother, and the Archbishop D. Raymond. Hec gaue many admonitions to his sonnes, touching concord and the publike peace, recommending the Queene Donna Ieanne very straightly vnto them.

This King was reputed a Saint among the Spaniards, but he is not canonized by the Popes, yet he was a great fauoror of the Sea of Rome, and of all the Clergy in General, whom he advanced to honour and riches, as much as any of his predecessors. He did wonderfully persecute the Albigeois, who descouered themselves in his countries, burning them aliue, and he himselfe setting fire to them. In his raigne and during the life of D. John Archbishop of Toledo, Saint Lewis King of France imparted vnto the church of Toledo, some of the singularities which he and others had brought from the holy land, from Egypt and other places; as, of the wood of the true crosse, one of the thornes of our Sauours crowne; of the Virgin Maries milke: a peece of the purple robe wherewith Christ was couered, some of the towel wherewith he wiped the Apostles feet, of the sheet wherein he was buried, and of the toyes wherewith he played when he was little, with other such reliques, whereof the Princes, Arabians and Turkes, yea and they of Constantinople, made rare presents vnto the French, who (about all other Christians) did reuerence these things, and did afterwards distribute them to other nations. These goodly Jewels were receiued by the Spaniards with great deuotion, and of this subiect there is a letter found written by that King Saint Lewis, in Latin, to the Chapter of Toledo, with a seale of gold, giuen at Ettampes in the yeere 1248. The death of the King D. Fernand was much lamented by the Christians, and by the Moores also of Granada, who did mourne with great teares and lamentations after their manner.

32 Soone after the decease of D. Fernand, died Thibault King of Nauarre, the first of that name, in Iuly in the yeere 1253. in the towne of Pampelone, leauing the realme to his sonne Thibault the second. After his returne from Syria, he had great troubles and difficulties with the Nobility and commons of his Realme, or that held in fee of him, whom whom he desired (as it was needfull, beeing new come and a stranger) to content, the A which he did by his wisdom great patience and dexterity. Those which crost him most were D. William Vicont of Sola, D. Raymond Arnaud Vicont of Tartax, and D. Gaston of Moncade, Lord of Bears, who made great complaints of the King; but he gaue them the best satisfaction he could. To the Vicont of Tartax, he gaue Ville-neuue, with all the land of Miexa, and Hostauares, and to the rest he gaue other things, so as he pacified them all.

The King had great controuersie with D. Pedro de Gasolas Bishop of Pampelone, for the rights and immunities of his church, the which proceeded so farre, as the Bishop presumed to excommunicate the King, and did not onely interdict his owne Diocese of Pampelone, but the whole realme of Nauar, where by reason of his pretensions and B controuersies, there was no Masse nor Mattins sayd, but whereas the King did force them, from the which they did appeale: and in the meane time the Bishop kept at Nauardun in Arragon: from whence going sometimes forth, the King caused him to bee taken and put in prison as a traitor, but it was too hardy an attempt, the people could not endure it, so as he was forced to set him free. These stormes continued three yeeres, whereas the Spaniards lay all the blame vpon the King. In the end by the mediation of Noblemen, Knights, Prelats and some good religious men, the King and the Bishop were reconciled. The King acknowledged his fault, and the interdiction was taken away, and some affirme that he went in person to Rome to demand absolution, the which he obtained of Pope Innocent the fourth. As we haue sayd, this King died in the yeere 1253, and was buried in the great church at Pampelone. About the same yeere there C died also D. Blanche of Castille, Queene mother to Saint Lewis King of France, leauing vnto her sonne a good title to Castille (if he would haue followed it) and to his descendants: she was buried at Saint Denis neere Paris.

Castile.

THe Moores of Spaine were reduced to that extremity, as they did all obey the Kings of Castille and Arragon, as their vassals, every one in their iurisdiction, the yeere that D. Alphonso the eleuenth came vnto the crowne: but they continued not long in this Estate, for as liberty is the most pleasing of all things, when as they found any subiect of alteration they embraced it. Yet in the beginning they kept themselves quiet, seeking to confirme the alliances which they had made with the King D. Fernand deceased: and for that King Mahomad of Granada shewed himselfe ready to doe this homage, the King D. Alphonso, who was alwaies bountifull, abated him 50000. Marauidis of gold of his yeerely tribute, being in the city of Seuille, where hee was proclaimed and crowned King of Castille, Leon &c.

The first Ordonance he made, was to decry the money which was then current, called Pipions, in place whereof he caused an other peece to be coyned, which they named Burgaleses,

A Burgaleses, every one being ninety deniers, six deniers making a solz, and fifteene solz a marauidis of gold, so as the Burgalois and the marauidis in gold were all one in value. This change of money made all things deere in Spaine; whereupon the King did much augment the Estates fees and ordinary pensions of his followers. The first alteration which happened in the Moores countries, was in Tareada, but they were easily suppressed, for the petty King of that place, called Amet, was so amazed, as hee quit the place vnto the Christians, and fled into Affrike.

We haue sayd before that King D. Alphonso had married D. Violant daughter to D. Laime or Lemes King of Arragon, by whom hauing no children in six yeeres they had liued together, he intended to leaue her: whereupon hee sent into Denmarke, to treat a marriage betwixt him and Christienne, the Kings daughter, attending the returne of his Ambassadors at Toledo, where he was againe visited by King Mahomad of Granada. The King of Arragon hauing some intelligence of this diuorce, which D. Alphonso pretended to make, was much discontented, and in a manner ready to proclaime war against Castille, if he had not bin diuerted by some noblemen and great personages of his realm, notwithstanding their subiects, vpon the frontiers, did for a long time spoile one another, & their was a league also made betwixt Arragon and Nauarre, which did incense them more.

Thibaud the second of that name, and three and twentieth King of Nauarre.

 T His league was to defend the realme of the young Thibaud the second, who had succeeded his father in the yeere 1253, being not yet 15. yeeres old, whose government, and the Regency of the realme was in the hands of Marguerite of Foix his mother. The Histories of Nauarre say, that the King of Arragon came in person to Tudelle to visit the Queene widow, and King Thibaud her sonne, whereas they made an offensive and defensive league: the King D. Laime offering vnto the widow and to this Pupil, whatsoever hee could doe, or they demand, alwaies reseruing the rights which he pretended in Nauarre, the which he would end friendly, when as King Thibaud should be come to age, and in the meane time it was agreed that being of full yeeres, he should marry D. Constance or D. Sancha, daughters to the King of Arragon, and if King Thibaud died, then should D. Henry his brother marry one of them: the King of Arragon promising moreover not to marry his daughters into the house of Castille, without the consent of Queen Marguerite: she promised also for her part, to do her best endeauor that the King her son should not marry with any of the daughters of Castille, lawfull, nor bastards, especially of King Fernands second marriage. In this league was comprehended the French King, and the Emperour, by Queene Marguerite: and the King of Arragon would insert a condition, that this present league should be allowed and confirmed by the Popes authority, within a certaine time, and great penalties and censures set downe by him, for them that should breake it. The Queene mother was assisted by D. Garcia Almoraid, D. Sancho Fernandes of Montagu, D. Garcia Gomes of Agoncillo, D. Gonçalo Yuaues of Bazan, D. Corbaran of Leet, D. Martin Gares of Eusa, D. Pero Gonçales of Morentiu, D. Martin Gonçales of Morentia, D. Guerrero Siere, Symon Gires, D. Pedro Ximenes of Valtierra, and D. Lope Arce, Deane of the Collegiall church of Tudelle, who did all solemnly sweare to obserue the Articles of this league. The company being gone from Tudelle, the King of Castille was presently aduertised of the league which they had made; whereupon hee sent many companies of horse and foote vnto the frontiers of Nauarre, pretending that the realme did belong to him, and that hee would pursue his right by armes. On the other side Queen Marguerite the Regent, manned the townes & forts ioyning vpon Castille with good garrisons, being also succored by the King of Arragon; so as the Castilians passed no farther at that time. In the meane time King Thibaud grew to be full 25. yeeres old, wherefore they thought it fit to declare him of age, & to crown him, the which was done in the yeere 1254. in the great church of Pampelone, where where he did sweare to obserue and augment the preuiledges of the country. Being in possession of the government, he would haue the alliance and league which his mother had made with the King of Arragon newly confirmed, for the effecting whereof, the two Kings met in the church called our Lady of Montaga, where they did capitulate: and it was sayd that the King D. Laine should defend the realme of Nauarre against al, and that not any one of the two Kings should make any peace or truce without the consent of the other, for assurance whereof, especially of the aboue mentioned marriages, there was deliuered in pawner, for King Thibaud, the forts of Gallipienço, Arguedas & Monreal: and for Arragon, the castles of Rueda, Sos and Vncastillo: which places should remaine in the hands of certaine knights of Nauarre, who notwithstanding should be discharged by the King of Nauar of the oth which they did owe him, and with his consent should take an oth to the King of Arragon, with a reseruatiou and promise to yeeld the places to him against whom the other had made the offence: all this was promised and sworne by both Kings, and the chiefe of their subiects; for the King of Nauarre, by D. Sancho Fernandes of Montaga, Seneshal of the realme, D. Garcia Almoravid, D. Gil of Rada, D. Gonzalo Tuanes of Baztan, D. Martin Ximenes of Ayuar, Fernand of Lect, Ramir Perez of Aronon, D. Corbarran of Lect, D. Arsal of Luna, D. Pedro of Varillas, and other knights, with six Bourgeses of Tudela: and for the King of Arragon, D. Alphonso Infant of Arragon, D. Garcia Bishop of Tarrasone, D. Garcia Romeo, D. Pedro Cornet, D. Symon de Efferes, D. Frederic Lizana, D. Pedro Martinez de Luna, D. Sancho d' Antilla and others. In this league were comprehended and named by the King of Nauar, the King of France and his brethren, and by the King D. Laine, Charles Earle of Provence, brother to the French King. This being concluded betwixt these Kings, the warre grew hot and furious vpon the frontiers of Nauarre and Castille; where the King of Arragon did more willingly assist, for that the same yee the Moores of the country of Valencia being rebelled to the number of 60000. vnder one Alardus their leader and capitaine, the King of Castille did support and aide them vnder-hand, vpon a secret hatred which hee bare vnto the King D. James: yet by the diligent endeauors of some great personages, there was a truce made for some months, during the which the King D. Laine being come into Nauarre, D. Diego Lopes de Haro, Lord of Biscay came vnto him, and made himself his vassal, being discontented with the King of Castille, which was no smal aduantage for the affaires of this league against Castille: for D. Diego was a braue & valiant capitaine. King D. Alphonso pretended the realme of Nauarre by ancient right from his predecessors, or at the least that D. Thibaud should doe him homage, as the king D. Garcia Ramirez, and the kings D. Sancho, his sonne and Grandchild had done to King D. Alphonso the eight, Emperor of Spaines, and to other Kings of Castille; the which King Thibaud refused, alledging that it was a forced acknowledgment, without any reason, and that he was so far from submitting himselfe to the Kings of Castille, as he pretended to recouer the territories of Bureua, Rioja, Alaua, Guipuscoa, and other lands in old Castille which the predecessors of D. Alphonso had vsurped of the crowne of Nauarre: these were the causes which made these Kings enter into warre, who (the truce being expired) went to fight with their forces: the Nauarrois and Arragonois assembling the body of their army about Tudela; and the Castilians towards Alfaro and Calaterra.

The Kings of Castille and Arragon lead the contrary armies, and were so nere one vnto the other, as they expected the houre when they should ioyne: but there were many good men which laboured to preuent this disorder, amongst Christian Princes, so neere allied: The King D. Alphonso gaue him of Arragon to vnderstand, that it was an vnworthy thing, and beyond all expectation, to see him that was his father in law, carry armes against him, hauing done him no wrong; wherefore he intreated him not to hinder him in his iust pursuit of the right which he had to the realme of Nauar, which the Earle Thibaud detained from him. The King D. Laine answered, that he could not in conscience, nor duty, abandon the defence of a young Prince, which was recommended vnto him, whose affaires he esteemed as his owne. Many Prelats and men of great authority hauing employed themselves in vaine to make a peace betwixt these Princes, a simple gentleman of Cattelogne, borne at Besalu, of the house of D. Violant Queene of Castille, preuailed

A preuailed more then al the rest. This gentleman came to the King of Arragon, and persuaded him with such liuely reasons, as he yeilded to a peace. Hauing done this good office with him, he did the like to the King of Castille, and was so happy in his negotiation, as they promised to confer personally together of their disputes and quarrels, wherefore certaine Tents being pitched in a plaine betwixt both armies, the three Kings met, and embraced one another louingly, where they feasted each other, and made a good accord before they parted. Yet notwithstanding the league made betwixt the Kings of Nauarre and Arragon, and the courage which the young King Thibaud did shew, he yeilded to doe homage to the Kings of Castille, as his predecessors had done for the realme of Nauarre, for the King of Castille thinking that he had won the King of Arragon, his father in law, by this interview, the which in truth did auail him much, for that the Queene Donna Violant his wife was there present, he demanded of King Thibaud the hardest conditions he could, desiring nothing lesse then to make an accord with him: but nothing being refused, they compounded, King Thibaud remayning vassal to the King D. Alphonso: and it was sayd that he should entertaine a Lieutenant in the court of Castille, and that whensoever the King of Nauarre should bee called vpon any occasion of warre, he should be bound to come and serue himselfe in person, or by his sayd Lieutenant with two hundred horse. The young King yeilded to all these conditions, either for that he was not able to resist his aduersary, or else doubting that the King of Arragon was wonne, or it may be in consideration of the public quiet; besides hee did not new thing, but what his predecessors had done before him: yet D. Sancho Fernandes of Calcante, and other knights of Nauarre dissuaded him from it, the like did the Inhabitants of the Bourg of St. Sermin of Pampelone, who after that all the Prelats, knights and commonalties of the realme had approued this peace, they still disallowed it, and would not subscribe, wherevpon the King did punish them by fines, as multitudes, yet his choller being past, some few daies after he considered that those of Pampelone were good and faithfull subiects, louing his honour and greatnesse, and that they had resisted his will by a true zeale, and loue, which they bare vnto the crowne of Nauarre, so as he caused their money to be restored vnto them againe, wherevpon there grew a custome which continued, that in matters concerning Castille, this Bourg did not let to their seale.

Castille.

4 The diuorce which D. Alphonso King of Castille pretended to make, as we haue sayd, from the Queene D. Violant, could not take effect, for that the cause of sterility, which he objected against her, did cease, being the wil of God she should be with child, in the yee 1254. and yet the Ambassadors which were sent into Denmarke, had wrought so, as they brought the Princesse Christienne to Toledo, wherewith the king D. Alphonso was wonderfully troubled, so as not knowing how to couer this fault, D. Philip his brother presented himselfe vnto him (being Abbot of Vailledolit, and Cuenca Rubia, and designed Archibishop of Seuille, for which cause he had bene brought vp in studie, and had remained sometime in the Vniuersity of Paris) and demanded this Princesse in marriage. It greeued the King much to giue D. Philip a portion, yet finding no better meanes to saue this disorder, hee caused him to marry her, and in fauour of this marriage allotted him great rents and reuenues, but it was short and vnfortunate, for this Princesse Christienne thinking her selfe contemned and scorned, was so oppressed with griefe as shee pined away and died. Thus the marriage of D. Violant of Arragon with the King D. Alphonso remayned firme; to whom afterwards shee gaue an ample off spring. Her first child was D. Berenguela, then D. Beatrice, D. Fernand, surnamed de la Cerde, D. Sancho, who was King: after the father, D. Pedro, D. Iohn, D. Laine or James; of all which wee will hereafter make ample mention, and in the end these had Donna Isabel, and Donna Leonora: Besides these lawfull children, the King had D. Alphonso Fernandes, whose mother is ysknowne, and D. Beatrice, begotten of D. Major Guillen of Guzman, daughter to Don Perez of Guzman, in which familie the Kings of Castille haue often found Ladies for their seruice: This daughter D. Beatrice was Queene of Portugal. Genealogie of Castille.

D. Sancho, whom the Spaniards hold to bee an Infant of Castille, sonne to the King D. A. Fernand deceased, and brother to this Alphonso, but it is not verie certaine. D. Pascal successor to D. Gutierre, had bene Archbishop before him. The same yeere there arrived at the Court of Castille, Edward, sonne and heire to Henry the third, King of England, who according to the custome of those times, was armed and made knight, by the King D. Alphonso.

Moore.

As for the Moores, they were, as wee have sayd, diuided into petty States, except Granado: all which had done homage to D. Alphonso King of Castille. In Algarbe there reigned in this quality Aben Mofad, who held Niebla and Xeres: a Lady a Moore ruled at Lebriza, or Nebriſſa, and Arcoſ: Murcia was held by Mahomet Aben Hudiel, and other places by other captaines and Lords, which did al hold of the King of Castille, whom notwithstanding, when occasion serued, they shewed no great loyaltie: wherefore in the yeere 1256. King D. Alphonso dispossessed al these petty Kings, & he received

Xeres of the frontier, by a voluntary yielding, where D. Nugno de Lara was made Governor, and Garcia Gomez Carrillo, a hardy knight, his Lieutenant. Arcoſ and Lebriza, following the example of Xeres, yielded also to D. Henry the Kings brother, who was sent thither from Xeres. The yeere following 1257. the King came into Algarbe, where he tooke the towne of Niebla, and appointed lands about Seuille for King Aben Mofad, and many rents in that city, so as by this means he had al the rest of the country of Algarbe: that is, the townes of Gibralcon, Huelma, Serpa, Mora, Alcabin, Castro, Martin, Quina, Faro and Laule, al held by Moores, who did not in any sort acknowledge the King of Granado, with whom D. Alphonso entertained firme friendship, so as hauing ordained an Annuity in the city of Seuille, for the King D. Fernand deceased, the which was celebrated yeerely in the Cathedral church, King Mahomet Aben Alhamar, sent many of his chiefe Moores thither, with a hundred footmen, carrying so many great torches of white waxe, the which they set about the dead kings tombe.

All matters betwixt Nauarre and Castille, were in outward apparence quiet, but the effects shewed this yeere 1257. that peace betwixt Princes, is most commonly entertained by no other bond, but their pleasures and commodities, without any respect of records, othes or promises: for the king of Castille hauing rayſed a mighty army, vnder collour of some doubt he had of the Moores, caused it to turne head towards the frontiers of Nauarre, to make some notable breach there, before they suspected him. Wherefore the two Kings, D. James of Arragon and D. Thibaud of Nauarre, went sodainly to armes, and soone after D. Henry Infant of Castille, the Kings brother, and D. Diego Lopes Dias de Haro, sonne to D. Diego Lopes Dias, who was dead a little before, at the bathes of Bagnerets, came vnto the King of Arragon, being at Estelle, with whom they made a league against Castille, the Infant making great complaints against the King D. Alphonso. With the young Lord of Haro, there came D. Diego Lopes de Mendoza, Nichol Iniguez de Saaga, Inigo Ximenes of Nanclares, Sancho Gonçales of Heredia, Ruy Sanchez of Landa, which were al principal Noblemen of the Prouince of Alaua: Lopes de Velasco, Gonçalo Gomes of Aguero, Lopes Garcia of Salazar, Lopes Iniguez of Orozco, Sancho Garcia of Salzedo, D. Gonçales of Cauillos, great Noblemen in the Mountaines, who came al with D. Diego Lopes Dias their Lord, & did there homage to the King D. Jaime, promising to follow him against al Princes whereoeuer he would lead them. The affaires standing vpon these termes, likely to breake out into an open combustion, those which loued peace labored in such sort, as the Kings of Castille & Arragon had an interview at Soria, where a new accord was made.

And for that the Estates which king Thibaud had in France, that is to say, Champagne & Brie, required his presence, or of some great personage, Queene D. Marguerite went thither, but he died in the towne of Prouince, from whence he was carried to the Monastery of Cleruaux, and there buried: for this cause the king was forced to go himselfe, wherefore he recommended his country of Nauarre to the king of Arragon, and left a French knight for Seneschal and Governor thereof, his name was Jeffrey of Beaumont, of whom the Nauarrois made no great account, and lesse of the king of Arragon, to whom they would yeeld no obedience, so as there began to be a breach of friendship be-

A twixt the Nauarrois and Arragonois, in the yeere 1257. at which time D. Gil de Rada, a knight of Nauar, did homage to the King D. Jaime for his castle of Rada, for him and D. Maria de Leez his wife. The Seneschal seeing the costury, which was committed vnto him, ready to fall into a combustion, came vnto the King D. Jaime, who was at Barcelona, and obtained of him an assurance of peace, for a certaine time betwixt the two Estates.

The King of Castille finding himselfe in peace with all his neighbors, both Christians and Moores, he tooke care for the good government of his subjects, who at that time made great complaints, for that by reason of the altering of the value of coines, al things were growne exceeding deere, which thinking to prevent, by setting a certaine price vpon al wares that were sold, he wrought a contrary effect; so as the death increased, wherefore he disannulled that law, and gaue them free liberty to sel their viduals & wares at their pleasures. About that time there was great trouble in the Empire of Germany, betwixt Conrade sonne to Frederic the 2. King of Naples and Sicile, and William Earle of Holland, both which carried themselves as Emperors. The death of Conrade happened, who as the Italians write, was poisoned by Manfroy his Lieutenant and bastard brother, who usurped the realmes of Naples and Sicile, which the Popes would draw vnto them since Frederic their time, and exclude the house of Soaue: notwithstanding that Conrade left Conradin his son and heire, in whose preiudice Manfroy made himselfe king, suggesting that he had newes of his death in Germany, hauing in the meane time corrupted some to poison him, as he had done the father, but they failed him their vowed seruice. William Earle of Holland had bin chosen Emperor by the praistiles of Popes against Frederic who held that title vnto his death, which was soone after that of Conrad: for hauing war against the Friscons his rebels, he was defeated by them and drowned in a Marsh. He being dead, the Electors of Germany were diuided, some struing to haue a Prince of Germany chosen, according to the lawes of the Empire; and the others (it may be corrupted with money) fought to haue some forraigne Prince placed in the Imperiall dignity, that he might pacifie the troubles and tumults which did afflicke Germany, and Italy. Two Princes were then vpon the file: Richard sonne to John King of England, and brother to Henry the third, then reigning; and D. Alphonso King of Castille. Conrad Archbishop of Cologne and Lewis Count Palatin of Rhin Electors, praistied by the English man who was present, did chose him King of the Romans, where vnto the Archbishop of Mentz consented:

But Alphonso duke of Saxony, the Archbishop of Treues, and the Marquis of Brandeburg, disallowing of this Election, they named the king of Castille, who was absent, who being aduertized of this Election by a sollemn Ambassage, yet would he not go into Germany, hearing that Richard would force obedience by armes, & that the war was hotter among the Germans then before, wherefore attending the euient, he kept himselfe within the city of Toledo.

The same yeere of our Lord 1257. D. Sancho Capello King of Portugal, whom they had deprived of the government of the realme; to giue it to his brother D. Alphonso of Bologne, came into Castille, to King D. Alphonso the wife (according to the most certain Authors) intreating him to aide him in the recovery of his dignity, and to punish his rebellious subjects, who had made his brother their King in his life time: wherevnto the King of Castille was well affected: but a priuat respect made him to abandon the cause of the afflicted, for the Earle of Bologne, Regent of Portugal, knowing that his brother made this purpose, intreated King D. Alphonso by his letters, not to trouble him in the charge wherevnto he had bene called by the Estates of the realm, for lawful considerations, the which had also bin allowed and confirmed by the authority of the Roman sea. That if he would forbear to annoy him; he promised to marry D. Beatrice his bastard daughter, which was then of age to be married, & would be divorced from the Countesse M. hault his wife, & moreover did reuue the ancient homage which Portugal did to Leon. These offers made king D. Alphonso to open his eares, who entreating the king D. Sancho with good words, concluded the marriage of D. Beatrice, with the Regent his brother, to whom he gaue in doury the country of Algarbe, newly taken from the Moores. This union of the realm of Algarbe to that of Portugal, was the cause that from that time the kings of Portugal carried in their armes; a border guesles semed with castles or

D. Alphonso of Portugal married his sister, and so by this means the Countesse of Bologne, to marry with Beatrice of Castille.

D. Sancho Capello being out of al hope to raigne in Portugal, died soone after in Castille, where for that short time he was entertained in a royal Estate, by D. Alphonso King of Castille, whose case was like vnto his some few yeeres after, for he was dispossest by his owne sonne D. Sancho, where it was happy for him to haue preferred the friendship of the Moores: for there was not any Christian Prince, that did either fauor him or aide him. Whilst that the King D. Sancho of Portugal liued, the city of Coimbra resisted D. Alphonso his brother, and would neuer acknowledge him for Regent, and much lesse for King. And the writers of Portugal say, that the newes of the Kings death being published; he which commanded within the towne, whom some call Fleet, demanded a passport to goe vnto Toledo, to informe himselfe, of the Kings death, and that the tombe wherein he had beene laied, being opened, he began to sigh, and to lament the aduenture of this Prince, and to protest of his loyaltie vnto him, and of the affection of the citizens of Coimbra, and laying the keyes of the city vpon his hands, he sayd, that seeing he had receiued them from him, with the charge and gouernment thereof, he deliuered it vp vnto him againe: and then resoluing to acknowledge King D. Alphonso for his lawfull Prince, and to draw the citizens therevnto, he returned into Portugal.

D. Alphonso the third of that name, the fifth King of Portugal.

By the death of King D. Sancho Capello, which was the fifth yeere of his age, hauing

raigned foure and thirty yeeres, leauing no children, the realme of Portugal felte D. Alphonso his brother, without any dispute, who was crowned King in the city of Lisbon, in the yeere 1257. and being married to two wiues, hauing no lawfull cause of diuorice from the first, he was the cause of many troubles and miseries to the realme of Portugal, for the preuenting whereof he had beene called. He had children by the Countesse Mahault: Fernand, who accompanied his mother into Portugal and there remained, and Robert who succceeded his mother in the county of Bologne. Fernand, whom some call Peter, lies in the Monastery of Saint Dominike of Lisbon which this King built.

The Countesse his mother led him with her, when as being aduertised of this second marriage she came into Portugal, to know the cause why she was thus abandoned. She landed at Calcais, a sea towne at the mouth of the riuer of Tayo, fise leagues from Lisbon, and from thence sent to intreat, exhort, and to summon the King her husband of his duty: for want whereof she made the protestations ordaind by the Canons in that cause: but she could haue no other reason nor answere from the King, but if it were lawful to breake the lawes, it was for a kingdome; and that if he thought to augment his dominions by marrying againe, he would euery day take a new wife. These were the fruits of her voyage, and D. Alphonso shewed himselfe so rigorous vnto her, as hee would not vouchsafe to see her, nor to heare any counsel that was giuen him by his seruants, who had a regard to Iustice, & feared God more then him; wherefore this poore Countesse returned, and left this sonne in Portugal: being in France, she made her complaints of the disloyalty of her husband to the King Saint Lewis, and sent some to doe the like to Pope Alexander the fourth, that by his Ecclesiastical censures, D. Alphonso might be forced to leaue D. Beatrix, and take the Countesse his lawful wife againe. The Pope did what he could, exhorting, commanding, yea and excommunicating the King, and interdicting his realme, but D. Alphonso was so obdurate as he suffered the realme of Portugal to remaine interdicted ten or twelue yeeres, as long as the Countesse liued. During the which time the Portugals had leisure to forget that which they had learned in religion, when as the King finding himselfe free, he was absolved by Pope Clement the fourth, retaying D. Beatrix without any let, who in the meane time brought him foure children, the Infant D. Denis, so called for that hee was borne on Saint Denis day,

Contumacy of D. Alphonso King of Portugal.

A in the yeare 1261. who was king of Portugal and Algarbe: the Infant D. Alphonso who was Lord of Portalegre, Ronches, Murban, Castile de Vide, and other lands, and had to wife D. Violant daughter to D. Manuel of Castile, sonne to D. Fernand the third, and two daughters D. Blanche, who was a Nunne in the Monasterie of Lorban, and afterwards Abbess of Saint Mary de las Huelgas de Burgos, and D. Constance. Besides these lawfull children, this king D. Alphonso had one bastard sonne called Fernand Alphonso of Portugal, and one daughter whose name was D. Leonora of Portugal, married to an Earle called D. Goncalo. Whilst he stood excommunicated, he made warre against the Moores which remained in Algarbe, in the yeare 1260. and chased them out of Faro, Laule, Algezir, and Albofera, and augmented his dominions therewith. Hee built the towne of Castro of Portalegre and Extremos: he repayed Veja, and other places which had beene ruined by the Moores. He did not leaue to build Monasteries and religious houses during the Interdiction: for he finished that of the preaching Friars of Saint Dominike at Lisbon, and did build that of Saint Clara, of Saint Iren, and others: he gaue great almes, and did many charitable deeds, to expiate the sinne which he intended, by the taking of a second wife, not being separated from the first. Moreouer, to ease the people, and to haue greater store of fruites in the country, he caused certaine barren and waste ground to bee tilled: neither did he forget to maintaine Iustice, punishing theues and malefactours, whome his brothers carelesnesse had made insolent. To conclude, although hee were defective and blemished in his marriages, yet was hee a profitable Prince for his country.

C Whilst these things passed in Portugal, and that the warre continued in Germany against the fauourers of Richard clea king of the Romanes, D. Alphonso king of Castile sent an Ambassage of certaine Clergi-men to Pope Alexander the fourth, the which were D. Dominike bishop of Auila, D. Garcia bishop of Sylues, and John Alphonso Archdeacon of the church of Saint Iames, learned men, and of great authoritie, who demanded assignation of the time of his Coronation, and also to contradict the election of Richard, who did not care to prosecute his right by iustice, but by force and armes. Attending the euent of these troubles, and the returne of his Ambassadors, D. Alphonso king of Castile ordered some things touching the policie of his Realm, he decayed those sorts of money which he had coyned, called Bourgalos, and caused others to be made, which they called blacke pence, and in old Spanish, Prietos, fiftene of which were worth a Marauidis of gold: and he made other lawes which were profitable to the Common-weale. Whilst he was buisie about these things, and irresolute of his voyage into Germany, hee had another crosse which stayed him more: for his brother D. Henry a turbulent Prince, and an enemy to all quiet, committed many insolencies at Lebrixa, where he did remain; tending to open rebellion: wherefore he sent D. Nuño de Lara from Seuille to suppress him, by whom he was vanquished, and forced to fly to Valencia, from whence the king Don Jaime caused him to dislodge, for that he would not discontent his sonne in lawe: wherupon he past into Affrick to the King of Tunes. This Prince foure yeares after croft into Italy, and was made Senator of Rome (which is the chiefe dignity of that city) and grew to haue great authority and credit in the estate of Italy, in the time of Pope Clement the fourth, who was successor to Urban the fourth.

E The king of Nauarre, who was come into France, finding his affaires in great disorder, sought to settle them, & to maintain his rights in the Counties of Brie and Champagne, being in controuersie, the which he preferred by the fauour and authority of the King Saint Lewis: and moreover a marriage was made betwixt him and Isabel of France, the kings daughter, at Melun, whom he led into Nauarre. D. Iame king of Arragon was the mediator of this marriage, who in a manner at the same time gaue his daughter Isabel in marriage to Philip the Hardy, sonne to the king Saint Lewis, and heire to the crown of France, promised vnto him long before. King Thibaud had not any children by this Prince, wherefore his brother Henry succceeded him in the Realme of Nauarre. He had one bastard daughter called D. Marguise, whose mothers name was D. Marguise Lope de Rada, who we may coniecture was allyed to that Gil de Rada, who it may be for this iniurie left Nauarre, and retired into Arragon, where he did homage to the King D. Iame for his castell of Rada. This daughter was afterwards married vnto Don Pero Fernandes Lord

Lord of Ixar, sonne to the King D. Iaime, and to D. Thereja Gil of Bedaura, whom he had A secretly married, as we have sayd.

9 It was at that time that by the commandement of D. Alphonso king of Castile, many learned men laboured to reduce into one body, the booke of the lawes of Castile, commonly called las siete partidas, which the King D. Fernand had caused them to begin, and which since hath beene augmented by the succeeding kings, with many ordinances, the which was reviewed againe by Pero Lopes Alcocer, Doctore Escudero, Pero Lopes Arrieta, and in the end by Bartholomew of Arrienza, Lawyers: these are the lawes by the which the Realmes of Castile and Arragon are gouerned, and the administration and practise of Iustice in those countries.

This King Don. Alphonso giuen to study, it may be more then was fit for a Prince B which had so great a kingdom to gouerne, caused also those famous Astronomical tables to be made, which carry his name, hauing drawne into the city of Toledo a great number of men learned in the Mathematickes and Physickes, as well of his owne countries, as out of Affricke and other parts, both Christians and Arabians, where he comprehends a certaine supputation of the heavenly motion of the starrs, and planets, and of their aspects and encounters, setting downe for a rule and fundamentall point of all astronomical account, the situation of Toledo, where he consumed an infinit treasure. Hee did becausethese goodly Sciences of Physicke and Philosophie, causing the writings of the Arabians, and other Ancients to be put into more familiar tongues: whereby he deserves, that thankfull posteritie should maintaine a commendable memorie of his vertue: yet he is to be blamed, for that these honest exercises did so rauish his spirits, and hindered the care he ought to haue had of the affaires of State, that hee shewed himselfe so slacke and negligent, as thinking to be Emperor, he found himselfe not onely excluded from that dignity, but also dispossest of his owne Realme, hauing reaped no other fruites of his studies, but the vaine surmase of Wife and Learned. Which doth admonish Princes to preferre action before contemplation, yet ioyning the one to the other with moderation. He left some markes of him in the Province of Guipuscoa, in the town of Mondragon, the which was so called by him for certaine caules, whereas the auncient name was Arracate: and did indow it with great priuiledges, whereof the letters are to be seene at this day, Giuen in the towne of Exnorafe, called at this day, as the Spaniards say, Adelantamiento de Caçorla, which are the most ancient letters which are to be found in the Castilian tongue in all Spaine: for vntill this Kings raigne, all records, instruments, and publike writings were made in Latin: but he brought in the Castilian style, in all sorts of writings, causing many bookes, yea of the holy Scripture, to be translated into that tongue, whereby it was much beautified. In this priuiledge there are many assistants or witnesses named, as well of his owne Realmes, as strangers: which shewes, that his Court was frequented (as if hee had beene peaceable Emperour) by Princes and Noblemen of the Empire, which are there named his Vassalls: as Hugh Duke of Bourgonie, Guy Earle of Flanders, Henry Duke of Lorraine, Lewis Earle of Beaumont, and other Princes holding their Lands and reuenues in fee of the Empire: Many Princes of the Moores are there also named as Vassalls to this King. In the same qualitie are named in this priuiledge, Gaston Lord of Bearne, Guy Vicount of Limoges, who (it may bee) had some times in Spaine, or depending of the Empire. Many also are named in this priuiledge as Benefactors: Queen Violant, his children Don Fernand, and Don Sancho, according to the custome of the Kings of Spaine: and of windeles a great number.

This king Don Alphonso did also cause a collection of the Histories of Spaine to be made, the which is read at this day, called a generall Chronicle. Being by reason of these things in great reputation, and esteemed among strangers, by the report (as it is likely) of learned men, whome he did cherisn in all countries. The Sulcan of Egypt, a Turke which raigned then, called Alaudexaner, sent him presents of cloth, and beastes of Egypt, Lybia, Ethiopia, and other neighbor Countries strange vnto the Spaniards, the which were requested by him with other gifts.

Being thus respected by Barbarians afarte off, hee was contemned by them which

A which held their lands, dignities and liues of his bounty: for in the year 1261. there being an assembly at Granado, of all the Princes Moores, which held any lands in Spaine, they made a league together, and conspired all against him, and without any long delay, being long before prepared, they went to field and forced the townes of Xeres, Arcos, Bejar, Lebrixa, Medina Sidonia, Rota and Saint Lucar, king Mahomet Aben Alhamar of Granado being the chiefe, against whome Caria Gomez Gouverneur of Xeres defended himselfe valiantly, but it auayled not. This reuolt did much annoy the elect Emperour Don Alphonso, yet hauing sent some troupes of horse and foote, the Moores which were disperst in the Christians countrie, were soone suppressed.

The Realme of Valencia had beene subdued by the king of Arragon, so as that time D. Simon de Foffes being Vice-roy, there was no alteration in those parts by the Moores: yet this Prince was neuer in good quiet with his subiects, by reason of the importunite and contumacie of his eldest sonne Don Alphonso, who did continually stirre vp new tumults, vpon colour of portions betwixt him and his brethren: a question which had bin handled, but not decided in many Assemblies of the Estates, and by Iudges appointed by them during D. Alphonso's life-time. He died about the year 1260. soone after his marriage with Constance daughter to Gaston Lord of Bearne. In the year 1261. the marriage of the Infant D. Pedro was consummated (who then tooke the degree of the eldest) with Constance daughter to Manfrey Prince of Tarentum, soone after the celebration of the marriage of his sister D. Isabel with Philip of France, at Clermont in Auvergne. After which solemnities the question for the Infants portions was reuiued, with as bad successe as it had beene when Don Alphonso liued: for Don Pedro could not indure that any thing should be dismembred from the Crowne, nor that any lands or titles should bee assigned to his brethren, but would haue them to depend wholly vpon him, the which the King their father did not hold fit for the quiet and tranquillity of the Realme, knowing wel the rough disposition of Don Pedro, who was cruell and inexorable: wherefore notwithstanding the protestations of Don Pedro, which were ordinarie, refusing to allow of Order in that respect, but by constraint, and to obey the king his father. It was decreed, that after the decease of the king Don Iaime, the Infant D. Pedro should succede in the realme of Arragon and Valencia, and should haue by the same right the Principalltie of Catterlogne, limited from the riuer of Singa vnto Cap de Crux. That Don Iaime the younger should haue, with the title of a King, the Ilands of Majorca, Minorca, and the Pityules, and moreouer the Counties of Rossillon, Collobre, Conflans, Cerdagne and Vallespire, with the rights of Montpellier, with charge to acknowledge the Soueraigntie of Arragon for these Segenries vpon the maine land: but Don Pedro did complaine wonderfully at this portion which was assigned to his brother D. Iames. There were other quartels pretended by the Nobility of Arragon, complaining that the king D. Iaime did breake their priuiledges and liberties: by reason whereof they made many leagues and factions. The matter being debated in the Estate of Sarraçossa, and then at Exea, in the year 1265, there were orders made for the pacifying of those troubles: As not to giue any honors or militarie fees to any but to Gentlemen of race, and borne in the country. That no Gentleman should be subiect to the tribute of cattell, nor to any other. That in all controuersies which the Nobility might haue against the king, or among themselves, the Magistrate, called the Iustice Maor of Arragon, should be Iudge, being assisted by the Councell. That the King should not giue the fees and military rewards, affected to them that do him seruice, as a recompence of their vertue and valor, to any of his lawfull children, who by right haue their portions in the realme. In this assembly of the Estates the King was solicited by the Pope to roote the Moores out of his Dominions, the which was hard to effect, neither was it done.

The warre in Germany began to grow cold by the absence of Richard, who for want of money was forced to dissolve his army, and to go into England, to make a supply, whereas he found his brother Henry engaged in ciuill warres, whereby he stayed there, and neuer returned into the territories of the Empire: so as Don Alphonso by his delays lost many good occasions to effect his desseignes. Approching neare vnto the Moores frontiers with a great army, he built a castell in the territorie of Alarcos, which hee named Vill

Villa Reall, and since called city Reall by the king D. John the second. The place where A it was built, was before called Pozuello of Saint Gil. Leaving all care of the Empire for a time, he made violent warre against the Moores of Granada, Murcia, and other confederates, so as Mahomet Aben-Alhamar was forced to flee to Aben Joseph Miralumin of Maroc for succors, who sent a thousand genets or light horse Arabians into Spain, in the year one thousand two hundred, sixty three, which was the first succors which past into An. 1263. Spaine since that the kings of Maroc had abandoned and lost it, one and fifty yeeres after the rout in the fields of Toloufa, or Muradal in Andalusia. The towne of Xeres was recovered by the Christians, and manned with a great garrison: Bejar, Medina, Sidonia, Rota, and S. Lucar were in like manner taken, as also Arcos and Lebrixa, from whence the king chased the Moores and planted Christians. Port S. Mary was built, and other small exploits of warre done whilest the good time lasted. Winter coming on, the king dissolved his army, the which was exceeding great: for he had called all such as had in former times bene at the warre, and had horse and armes, exempting them of the village of Martiniega, from the Custome of cattel, and other Tributes and Impositions, besides their ordinary pay. The king with some Noblemen stayed at Seulle: during this warre which was in the year 1264, his father-in-law D. Jaime of Arragon met with him in Alcaras, with good troupes of footsiders, to second him against the Moores of Murcia, the which with their king was reduced vnder the obedience of the king of Castille, the year following 1265.

Accord betwixt Castile and Granada.

Castile.

The king of Granada was so ioyfull of these succors which were come vnto him out of Affricke, and gaue such great entertainment to these Arabians, at his subiects charge, as many began to murmur against him, in so much as the Captaines of Malaga and Guadix, off friends became his enemies, and many of his followers holding themselves less esteemed then these new come, conceived a great hatred against him, so as hee began to feare a revolt of his subiects. And for that he would not be engaged in two wars at once, one ciuill, another forraigne, he laboured to make his peace with king D. Alphonso, coming vpon assurance vnto him to Alcalá de Benaide, and there sware his fealty and homage anew, in the presence of Mahomet Alamir his son, promising to pay him 200000. Marauidis of gold for a yearly tribute, and renounced the allyance of Aben Hudiel king of Murcia. Wherefore king D. Alphonso did more easily subdue him, who yielded with all his townes, demanding pardon for his offence, the which he obtained by the intercession of the king of Granada newly reconciled: his life was saved, and some rents assigned him, but his royal dignity was taken from him, in the which the king of Castile placed another Moore, called also Mahomet, brother to Aben-Hut, who had bene slaine in Almerie, to whome he gaue the third part of the revenues of that Realme. As for the Captaines of Malaga and Guadix, D. Alphonso had promised vnto the king of Granada by this last accord, not to fauor them against him, the which he kept at that time, & did procure a truce betwixt them for a season. During the which Mahomet Aben Alhamar came vnto D. Alphonso at Murcia, to intreate him againe (the truce being expired) not to support these two Captaines, which had rebelled against him: wherein the king of Castile dissembled, refusing to promise him directly, for he had an intent to bridle him by this meanes, and in the end to ruine him. Whereupon the king of Granada returned discontented: being in his country, he sought to corrupt the captaines of the king of Castiles forts, which were neere vnto him: namely, Don Nugno Gonçales sonne to the Earle Don Nugno de Lara, who was discontented for the wrongs and grieuances which his father Don Nugno de Lara, and his Vncle Don John Nugner had receiued from the king, perswading him to rebell against his Prince, with assurance that he would fauour him, and would giue him succors vpon all occasions.

During these actions king D. Alphonso, Emperor elect, had newes of the death of Richard his competitor, who had bin slaine in England, at the siege of a towne of smal consequence, being greatly sollicit by his partisans and fauorers to go into Germany, assuring him that he should be receiued without any contradiction: but he excused himselfe, either for that he wanted courage or money, or else being stayed by the aduertisements he had of the king of Granados practices: yet he called a Court in the city of Burgos, to con-

A ferre of this voyage with the Estates of his countries, who did exhort him to march, yea offering him money, whereof he had then need, but there was no meanes at that time.

He had sent Ambassadors into France, for the marriage of his son D. Fernand surnamed de la Cerda, with the eldest daughter of the king S. Lewis, called Blanche, as her grand-mother, in the end of the year 1267: this Princeesse being not full ten yeares old, according to some Spaniards, and the supputation of Garrybay himselfe, who makes profession to be a great obseruer of times. By this marriage was decided a great contentiouse betwixt the house of France, and that of Castile, for the succession of the Realmes of Castile and Toledo, the which by right, and the custome receiued of the succession of the elder, did belong vnto the king S. Lewis: for that after the decease of the king D. Henry the first, who dyed without children, being slain with a tyle which fel vpon his head, the succession came to his eldest siter D. Blanche, mother to this S. Lewis; and not to D. Berenguela the yonger mother to king Fernand the 3. whom she had by the king of Leon. But the Spaniards disdaining to be governed by a stranger, did easily frustrate this right, through the carelessness of the king S. Lewis, choosing D. Fernand his cousin germaine for their King. In fauor therefore of this marriage made betwixt D. Fernand de la Cerda, son to D. Alphonso the wife, K. of Castile, and D. Blanche daughter to the king S. Lewis, he did quite renounce al the right and interest which he and his successors kings of France might pretend to the crowne of Castile and Toledo, transferring it to Don. Fernand and to D. Blanche his spouse, and to their heires. This accord was made in France betwixt the king S. Lewis his counsell, and confirmed by him, and the ambassadors of Spaine, with whom the Princeesse was sent thorough the country of D. Thibaud, who had married Isabel her siter some ten yeeres before.

Marriage of D. Fernand with Blanche daughter of France.

S. Lewis quits the right he pretended.

The Princeesse and her conductors were honourably intertained by the Nauarrois, al though that they and the Castillians were no great friends: yet for that theee was their Queenes siter, they spared not any thing that belonged to duty and honesty. D. Thibaud was then in France, during his absence there were many things done in Nauarre by excellence, or through the error of Governors, or the policy of neighbor Princes. One of the principall knights of Nauarre called Gonsalo Tunes of Baztan, retired to the king of Arragon, and made a fort vpon the frontiers betwixt Arragon and Nauarre, which hee called Boeta, from whence he made great spoyles in the country of Nauarre. Notwithstanding the friendship which was betwixt the kings of Arragon and Nauarre, yet there wanted no grieuances and subiect of quarrels betwixt them. One of the most apparent pretensions, which the king D. Laine had, was, that he sayd, that to succor the king D. Thibaud hee had made great expences, whereof he would be rembourised: making alwaies vse thereof when there happened any disorder. The summe which he demanded was so great, as neither K. Thibaud nor his brother Henry, who reigned after him could euer acquit it. About that time, or soone after was the passage of the Princeesse Blanche into Castile, whom the king D. Alphonso her father-in-law receiued at Logroño: the king D. Thibaud arrived in Nauarre, where he labored to set some good order in his affairs, and to prepare all things necessary for his voyage beyond the sea, which he pretended to make with the king S. Lewis his father-in-law. He did somewhat repaire the breach of friendship which had bin betwixt the K. of Arragon and him, and renewed the accord with him of Castile: and hauing left his brother Henry Earle of Ronay, for Governour in Nauarre, he came into France, leading with him D. John Nugner de Lara, eldest son to D. Nugno Gonçales de Lara, and many other knights of Nauarre and Castile. He also led Q. Elizabeth or Isabel with him, whom he left gouernesse of his Counties of Champagne and Brie, and then he parted with the king S. Lewis his father-in-law, who imbarked at Marfilles, with his whole army in May, 1269, to go into Syria: but he was forced by foule weather to land in Sicily, from whence hee past into Affricke, tooke Carthage, and besieged Tunes; but the issue of this expedition was vnfortunate, as we may read in the Histories of France.

An. 1269.

F Some monthes before D. Laine, or Lames K. of Arragon, moued with the like zeale to make war against the Infidels in the East, and to free himselfe of a vow which he had made, had imbarked himselfe, but he was driuen back by a storme to Aiguemortes. Hee had by reason of these enterprises, familiaritie, and treaties with the great Cham or Emperor of Tartaria, sending a Bourger of Perpignan, called Alain, Ambassadour vnto him. He consulted sulted of the voyage at Toledo in an assembly of Princes, where hee did protest to go in person, although he were very old. King D. Alphonso promised money, Michel Paleologue Emperor of Constantinople offered ships and victuals by his Ambassadors, but he could not put it in execution. Yet his children D. Pedro, and D. Fernand proceeded in their voyage, and arrived in Palestine, where they stayed not long. At their returne they landed in the Island of Sicily, then enjoyed by king Charles the first brother to S. Lewis, from whom they received great honour and good wages: there the infant D. Fernand was made knight by the hands of king Charles, whereas D. Pedro his brother took occasion to hate him, and neuer after loved him. As soone as K. Thibaud was gone out of Nauarre, whether hee neuer more returned, the king D. Jaime forgetting not the right he pretended to this realme, made donation and transport thereof to D. Pedro, resigning all his interest to him, by vertue of the mutual donation made betwixt him and the last king D. Sancho the Strong.

Castile.

In Castile there was nothing but feasting for the new marriage of the Infant D. Fernand, at the which (being as statelly as any had beene scene in Spaine) there were present D. Jaime of Arragon, Philip eldest son to S. Lewis king of France, Edward eldest son to the king of England, who had beene armed knight by the king D. Alphonso: D. Pedro Infant and heire of Arragon, and Mahomet king of Granado, not yet proclaimed an enemy with other Princes Moores: the king D. Alphonso himself, Emperor elect, his brethren and children, with his vncl D. Alphonso de Molina, and a great number of Prelats and Noblemen of his countries, and of France, England, Italy and other places: who did then conferre with the Lords of Lara, D. Lope Diaz de Haro, and other mal-contentes, who whither also came the king of Granado, and concluded a dangerous league with him. Of this marriage were born the Infants D. Alphonso and D. Fernand de la Cerde, of whom we will make mention in the discourse of this Historie.

The feast being ended, D. Alphonso Emperor Elect, began to thinke afresh of his passage into Germany, whither they called him by ordinary messages: but whether feare or necessity did hinder him, he could not begin it. It may be the quarrels of Germany seemed too dangerous vnto him, being also loth to charge his subjects with the expences, for the conducting of an army into Italy and Germany: for that his prodigality had exhausted his treasure, and emptied his coffers. For besides the great expences which hee had made in searching out the Mathematickes and other commendable things, which amounted to so great summes of money, as a Spaniard writes, that for the compiling of the work which they call Tabulas Regis Castille, hee spent more then the revenues of S. Peters patrimony could amount vnto in ten years. He gaue at one time an hundred and fifty Kintals of siluer to the Empreffe of Constantinople, who came vnto him to Victor, to beseech him to ayde her, to redeeme the Emperor Baudwin her husband, prisoner among the Turkes, from whom Michel Paleologue detained the Empire. And withall it is likely, that he spared not any money to practise the Germaine Electors, by whom hee had beene chosen: together with the feasts, triumphs, gifts and presents of his sons marriage: and the prouision for war which hee honoured him to make, to defend himselfe against the treachery of the Moores, and of those that were vnto them. All which things kept him low, as he had neither means nor courage to pursue that which he had ambitiously affected. The rebellion of D. Lope Diaz de Haro, Lord of Biscay, the first of that name, who had beene made king during the fore-sayd marriage, and of D. Nugno de Lara, and others, may in some sort excuse him. These with other their confederates were entred into a secret league with Mahomet Aben-Alhamer king of Granado, who for his part had openly broken the truce with the capitaines of Malaga and Guadix, vassals to the king of Castile, annoying them all he could by open force: wherefore king D. Alphonso came to Seulle to oppose himselfe against this king of the Moores, and to prevent the designs of these conspirators, calling an assembly there of all his knights and other his faithfull subjects. Having a great army readie, and an occasion being offered, hee did assaile and suddenly take the town of Cadiz ill garded, and the Island which was vnder the protection of the K. of Maroc, where the souldiers got great spoiles: but for that there wanted people, he left it still in the Moores hands. This was in the year 1269.

Portugal.

The King being at Seulle, D. Denis infant of Portugal came vnto him, being well accompanied

A accompanied by the Noblemen and Knights of the country, who besought his grandfather to make him knight, and moreover, that he would discharge the Realme of Portugall, of the homage and vassalage it ought to the king of Leon. King D. Alphonso was desirous to gratifie this young Prince, soonne to his daughter D. Beatrice: but thinking it would be taken ill by the Noblemen his subjects, hee aduised the Infant to propound it in an open assembly, the which he called to that end. The demand being made in the name of Don Denis, who was yet a child of eight yeares old, by a Knight of Portugall, the opinion of D. Nugno de Lara (who had not yet declared himselfe) was, that by no means he should diminish the authority and greatnesse of his Crown, the which he should do, if hee did quit this homage to the king of Portugall, and that in any other thing he was of opinion, the king should gratifie his grand-child D. Denis: wherewith the king seemed discontented against the Earle D. Nugno: wherefore the rest seeing that he would haue it so, they aduised him to do it. Whereupon the Realme of Portugall was freed from all homage and obedience due to the kings of Leon and Castile, this year 1269. And D. Denis being made Knight by the king, he returned ioyfull to his father, who about the same time was absolved, and the generall Interdict, in the which the Realm had beene for twelue yeres space, taken away by Pope Clement the fourth.

This prodigality with some other reasons, did much discontent the Noblemen of Castile: and made the Earle D. Nugno to run into open rebellion, for that the king had taken it ill, for deliuering his opinion freely in open Councell. After these things audience was giuen to the Ambassadors of the Miralumin Aben-Isoph, who were come to complain in their Masters name, for the taking and sacke of Cadiz, and to demand reparations: but they were sent home with good words: King D. Alphonso being pained from Seulle to come into Murcia, being at Villa Reall, he was abandoned by his brother D. Philip: the Earle D. Nugno de Lara, D. Lope Diaz de Haro, and other Noblemen & Knights which came into Castile, to put the League in execution which they had made with the king of Granado against their king, and to seeke to draw others vnto them, making the ground thereof to be the dismembred of Portugal from the Crowne of Leon: which league was renewed in Lerma. Many other Noblemen and knights ioyned with them, the chiefe whereof, besides the Infant D. Philip, the Earles D. Nugno de Lara, and Lope Diaz de Haro, were D. Estenun Fernandez, D. Fernand Ruiz de Castro, D. Ximen Ruiz de los Cameros, D. Jean Nugno, and D. Nugno Gonçales de Lara, children to the Earle D. Nugno, D. Aluar Diaz, D. Diego Lope de Haro, brother to D. Lope Diaz, D. Lope de Mendoza, D. Gil Ruiz de Roa, D. Aluar Diaz de las Asturias, and D. Roderigo Rodriguez de Saldagne, all discontented with K. D. Alphonso: some for one cause, some for another.

The first thing they did, after they had sworne the League, was to send the Infant D. Philip into Nauarre, to see if he could draw D. Henry the Regent of that Realme to ioine with them, for the interest he had to pull downe D. Alphonso, who detained so many Provinces belonging to the Crowne of Nauarre, the Confederates promising him (yet without any such intent) to ayde him in the recovery thereof. If hee would fauour them with the forces of the Realme which he had vnder his command, where they pretended to stay, and there assembled all forces, friends and means. The Regent Don Henry hauing duly considered of the consequence of this enterprize, being wise and well aduised, excused himselfe, that he was but Lieutenant to his brother, to whom hee must yeeld an account of his gouernement, and that he desired nothing more, then to restore him his Realme in the same estate that he had deliuered it him, without attempting to trouble his Estate by any new enterprises, vpon a vaine hope of bettering it. Don Philip returned into Castile with this answer, being frustrate of his expectation. Soone after D. Henry had newes of the death of his brother K. Thibaud, which happened in the town of Trapani in Sicile, in his returne from the voyage of Tunes, whereas the king S. Lewis was also dead, and the army forced by pestilence, and other discommodities, to returne, hauing done nothing of consequence.

D. Henry

D. Henry the Groffe, first of that name,
24. King of Nauarre.

DOn Thibaud hauing held the Crowne of Nauarre 17. yeares and about foure moneths, and dying without any lawfull children, Don Henry his brother succeeded him in the year 1271. he was surnamed the Groffe, for that he was exceeding fat. And although the common opinion be, that fat men are most commonly of a soft and mild disposition, yet this was of a lower and froward conuersion; the which he did especially shew to Don Armingol Bishop of Pampelone, whom he did afflict much. D. Ihabel the Queene Dowager who was in France, when as D. Thibaud her husband dyed, receiued his bodie (the which was carried with that of the King S. Lewis) and caused it to be buried in the Church of Prouins: and whether it were for the griefe of her husbands death, or some other infirmity, she liued not long after him. The Confederates of Castile, seeing Don Henry receiued king of Nauarre, sent to Don Philip againe, to sollicite him to ioyne with them in league. The new king Don Henry made answer, that seeing he was now absolute, and was not to make accompt of his actions to any one, hee was very willing to receiue the Confederates into his Realme, and to assist them with all his power: but vpon condition, that they should in like manner come with all their forces and friends, to put him in full possession of the lands of Bureua, Rioje, Alaua, Guipuscoa, and others, the which king D. Alphonso had vniuilly vsurped and detained, belonging to the crowne of Nauarre.

Answer of the king of Nauarre
to the Confederates of Castile.

This demand seemed great and difficult to the Infant Don Philip; and as one which had not reiected all loue of Brother or Country, he refused this allyance which would be so deare and burthen some, and therefore he made answer, that neither he nor his companions had any such power, as to accomplish that which he demanded, confessing freely that he would not do so great wrong vnto the King his Lord, as to dispossesse him of so great a country. The king Don Henry hearing this answer, would not enter into their League, being loth to breake the accords which Nauarre had with Castile, but vpon great aduantage: wherein he did wisely not to incense so mighty an enemy against him. Don Philip returning into Castile, met with his Confederates, to whom he related what he had done, the which they allowed.

Castile.

King D. Alphonso was wonderfully perplexed, during these practices, employing all his friends to pacifie and to diuert these conspirators from their enterprise. First he sent Don Henry Perez of Arana with letters of credit vnto them: the king went in person to Valencia with Queene D. Violant his wife, to intreate the king D. Jaime her father to mediate an accord for him, or to keepe him from ioyning with the Confederates: with whom Don Henry Perez labored in vaine, aduertising the king of all that past, as many of the Councell of Castile did in like manner wherefore after many messages of either side, and many fruitlesse negotiations, which did rather kindle the fire then quench it, king D. Alphonso was forced to come to Burgos. The Confederates did not onely sollicite the king of Portugal to enter into their league, but also Aben Joseph of Maroc, promising a safe access and all fauor against this Prince: the which was discouered by a letter written by this Moorish king in the Arabian tongue to the confederates: In the meane time the king of Granada began to make open war against Castile, ouer-running the country of Andalusia with the horsemen which he had out of Affricke: against whom he sent the Infant D. Fernand de la Cerde. D. Alphonso being come to Burgos some of the rebels came vnto him vpon passport, where there were diuers conferences, the king shewing himselfe tractable in many things, for the desire he had to go into Germany: but all prevailed not, notwithstanding that there was an assembly of the Estates at Burgos for this pacification, the which was held without the towne, for the safety of the Conspirators, who reiecting all treaties of peace, retired to Granada, their troupes committing infinit spoiles where they past without any respect, loue, and charity of their country, yea in the country of Guadix, whereas the Captaine a Moore was enemy to Mahomet Aben Alhamar: and they say, they entred into Granada with about 5000 catel, and many carts laden with spoile which they had taken.

Mahomad

Mohomad Mir, the second King of Granado.

WHile these fugitiue Knights were at Granado, the king there dyed, which was in the year 1273. hauing reigned 36. yeares, and some moneths. By their support and assistance, his sonne obtained the Crowne, being also called Mahomad as his father, but surnamed Mir Almus-Lemin, otherwise Abekille & Abasditke, and Alamir Aben Azar: for after the death of Aben-Alhamar there were great diuisions vpon the election of a new king: some demanding a younger brother to this Mahomad Mir, who was called Ioseph Aben Alhamar, others would haue one of the Captaines of Malaga or Guadix, desiring thereby to make them leaue the allyance of the king of Castile, to the end they might vntie all the Moores of Spaine. For the fauour which the Christians did herein to Mahomad Mir, he caused a pallas to be built, which was called the pallas of D. Nuño. Such as had held the party of Ioseph Aben-Alhamar escaped, and retired with him to Malaga, from whence he went & spoiled the country of Granada; But the knights which were with king Mahomad, hauing assembled some forces, went against them, and defeated them neere vnto Antequera.

King D. Alphonso was come neere vnto Toledo, alwaies negotiating a peace, for the which they assembled the Estates againe at Auala, whither came D. Fernand Ruiz de Castro and Roderigo Rodriguez de Saldaigne, who abandoned their companions. Nothing being concluded, the King resolved to make war with all violence: he came to Requena, whereas D. Jaime king of Arragon should meet him. During his abode there, he had intelligence from his Agents in Germany, that the Electors, tyred with his delays, and desiring to settle a good peace in Germany, had proceeded to a new election in the person of Rodolphus Erie of Habsburg and Holfcia; against the which his said Agents had objected many things, and protested in his name of nullity. These newes did much trouble king D. Alphonso, who was ingaged in these ciuill dissensions, the which he then resolved to compound, at what price soeuer, to the end he might go into Germany to recouer his imperiall authority by armes, the which he had let slip by negligence. Wherefore hee sent the Queene D. Violant his wife to Cordoua, with some of his Councell, to treat a peace with the king of Granada, and with his owne rebellious subjects, and likewise with the Miramumin Jacob Aben Joseph, who threatened to passe into Spaine. He intreated and conuined the king of Arragon to ayde him to subdue them, if they would not yeeld to reason, the which he promised, and he sent Ambassadors presently into Italy to Pope Gregory the 10. to make new protestations against the Election of Rodolphus, and to lay open vnto the Pope his pretensions and reasons. The Ambassadors were Friar Aymar a Iacobin, & Fernand of Zamora, Chancellor to the king, and Chantoine of Auila, who deliuered their charge in open Consistorie: yet the negligence and little regard which the king their master seemed to haue of the Empire, did make good the election of Rodolphus, so as they returned into Castile, without any effect.

Pope Gregorie hauing afterwards called a Councell at Lyons, whether he came in person for the reformation of Christendome, especially for the reconciling of the Greeke Church with the Romaine or Latin, and in like manner to releue them in the East, who went to ruine. He aduised king D. Alphonso, and admonished him by the Bishop of Astorga, to desist from his pretension of the Empire, where hee should do nothing but spend, and thrust himselfe and his kingdoms into open danger, without any hope of benefite: which aduice could not please the King, who being aduertised that the Queene, who was at Cordoua, had brought the king of Granada, and the Noblemen Confederates to some reasonable conditions, he came to Seuille, whither all the Noblemen came with the Queene, and the Infant D. Fernand, where as an accord was made. The Noblemen and Knights were restored to the kings fauour, and to their goods and honours.

An. 1274.

The King of Granado promised to pay a yearly tribute of 300000. Maraudis of gold A to him of Castile, and did pay him a great summe of ready money: the which D. Alphonso demanded to make his voyage into Germany, whereof he still dreamed. There was great dispute touching the Capitaines of Malaga and Guadix, for king Mahomad would haue D. Alphonso wholly to abandon them. but in the end the Queene D. Violant prohaue D. Alphonso for them for a year. Thus the conspiracie made against D. Alphonso was dis- solved in the year, 1274 the which had continued almost five years. Hee that wrought best effects in this negotiation of peace, and that tooke most paines was Gonsal Ruiz of Atienca, a gallant Knight, and a faithfull seruant to the king D. Alphonso. There is no doubt, but this Prince, by his inconsiderate bountie, his negligence in great affaires, and contempt of his subjects and Councillors, was the cause of great troubles and diuisions, D which were both preiudicial and dishonorable vnto him, although that conspiracies can not be excused.

Many Princes came to the Councill of Lyons, and many sent their Amba- sadours: namely, Michei Paleologue Emperour of Constantinople sent Germain Patriarke of Constantinople, George Asopolite, and Theophanes Metropolitan of Nicea in Bithynia, with charge to make a shew to desire an Accord betwixt the Greeke and the Latine Churches: but in effect it was to diuert, by this goodly pretext, the Armes of Baudouin his aduersarie, and of Charles King of Naples and Sicily, who pressed him, and to assure his Estate which hee had gotten by vniust and violent means.

Arragon.

Thither went Don James king of Arragon in person, who came to do his filial sub- mission vnto the Pope: yet the king being desirous to be crowned in this Councill, by the hands of Pope Gregorie, (a Ceremonie whereof he made great account) he refused him, vntill he would acknowledge himselfe Vassall to the Church of Rome, and pay the arrerages of the Rent which the deceased King Don Pedro his father had promi- sed: the which the King Don James would not do, holding it an vnworthy thing, so to debate the greatnesse of his Crowne, and restraine the libertie of his Realme in any sort. Wherefore seeming to haue some feeling thereof by his words, and making his merits knowne vnto the Church, by so many victories gotten against the Moores, in regard whereof, they should do him honour, hee returned very much discontented to Mont- pellier.

Both this yeare 1274. and some others before, the Realme of Arragon and Cate- logne had bene in continuall tumults and rebellions, the Nobilitie opposing them- selves against the king, vpon colour of breach of their priuiledges and liberties, be- sides the continuall praetises of the Infant Don Pedro against his brother Don Fernand, who drew the Nobilitie and Townes of Arragon into pernicious factions: Don Pedro proceeding so maliciously, as the king Don James their father was forced to take the gouernment of the Realme, and the managing of affaires from him: the which hee did in an open assembly of the Estates called to that end at Exca, in the which were condemned for contumacie, Don Artal of Luna, Lopes Ortis Sentia, Symon of Ahones, Diego Garra, and Pedro Ortis, by the sentence of Roderigo Castellio, hol- ding then the Magistracie of Iustice Maior of Arragon: by reason whereof, and of these seditions and quarrells, hee was afterwards slaine by Bertrand Canetia, and Don William Raymond Odens smothered in the water, by the commandement of the Infant Don Pedro, who accused his brother Don Fernand of treason, and pra- ctises against the life of their father: whereof diligent information was made, and Don Raymond Fouquier, Vicount of Cardonne, Don Pedro Verga, Galferrand de Pinos, and other Noblemen were pourfused, both by reason thereof, and for that they re- fused to do their due seruices and obedience vnto the king, in his warres, voyages, and expeditions, as feudataries are bound, whereuppon they were deprived of their fees and military honours, according to the custome of Spaine, by the which Places F and States were giuen to be held in fee, vnder the Soueraignie of the Crowne, vpon condition to yeld them vp vnto the king being demanded.

It did auail them nothing to object the priuiledges of Cattelogne, which were That

A That the Nobility might quit the kings obedience in case of controuersies and suites, especially if there were question of their liberties, and to protest it publicly. To com- pound which troubles the Estates were assembled againe that yeare 1274. at Lerida, and Iudges appointed by them: but the disorder was so great, as the king incensed with a rash and inhumane fury against his son D. Fernand and his confederates, he gaue him o- uer in prey to his brother D. Pedro, who beleaged him in the Castell of Pomar, took him, and caused him to be drowned in the riuer of Singa, and obtained his goods and spoile, for the execution of this cruell act. D. Fernand had married Donna Aldoncia of Virea, by whom he left a sonne called Don Philip Fernandes, which was the stemme of the noble house of Castro in Arragon.

B These disorders were seconded by the proceedings of the Inquisitors Monkes, a- gainst them that were suspected to fauour the opinion of the Albigeois, condemned by the Popes. This Commission was affected by Friar Raymond of Begnafort a Iacobine a- bouementioned, and giuen to Friar Pedro Cadrasta, and William Colonito of the same Or- der, who inquiring of this crime with great vehemency, did many exploits in Cattelogne, namely in the Diocesse of Yrgel, where they tooke out of the graue the bones of Arnaud of Castellon, and of Ermeinde, or Branicende his daughter, Grandmother to Roger Ber- nard Earle of Foix, deceased a little before, and caused them to be publicly burnt, con- demning their memorie. Such was the estate of Arragon after the returne of the king D. James from the Councell of Lyons.

C D. Henry king of Nauarre newly come to the Crowne, was to dispute with D. Pedro in- fant of Arragon, for the right which he pretended, to the Realme of Nauarre, as Cessio- narie to D. Jaime his father: but it fell out happily for him, that there grew so great diu- sion betwixt the father and the sonne: by reason whereof the Infant D. Pedro entered into familiarity with the king of Nauarre, that he might be fauoured by him in his enterprises: and the better to incourage him, he sent a knight vnto him called D. William of Crullas, to make an accord betwixt them for this pretended right, whereof the king D. Henry made no great account, yet he gaue him good words, and intreated this young Prince, still keeping Don Jaime in feare, that they would agree to his prejudice, which was a good means for the king of Nauarre to be assured of him: for D. Jaime fearing this league D should take effect, preuented his sonne, and fought D. Henries friendship, making a truce for many yeares with him, during the which they should not talke of right, pretensions, nor of any reall nor personall actions. So King Henry the Groffe ioyed his Realme quietly, by the discord of others.

Nauarre.

This king was married before he came to the Crowne, being but Earle of Ronay, to Jaime daughter to Robert Earle of Arthois, Brother to Saint Lewis: so as thence was allied to the Royall houses of France and Spaine. The king had Don Thibaud by this marriage, whome the nurse let fall out of a Gallerie, in the towne of Estella, and slue him: some say, it was his Gouernour, who let him fall vnadvisedly, and was so grieved, as hee cast himselfe headlong after the child, and slue himselfe: Hee had no other sonne, Wherefore the masculine line of the Earles of Champagne in Nauarre, ended in this king, hauing continued but forty yeares. Hee had besides one daughter by his wife called Donna Jaime by her mothers name, who came to inherit the Realme of Nauarre with the Counties of Brie, Champagne, and other Estates of her Father. The Spanish Authors write, that the King and Queene, her father and mother, caused her to bee re- ceived and declared Queene in the Estates of Nauarre being but two yeares and seueri months old, which was a meanes to vnitte Nauarre to France for some yeares. This King Don Henry being Lieutenant in Nauarre for Don Thibaud his brother, being yet vnmarried, had the company of a Lady, the heire of the house of Lacarra, of whom hee begate a sonne, whome he named Henry as himselfe. Being growne, he was much fa- uoured by the kings which succeeded his father, and obtained the dignitie of Marthall, or chief Commander of armes in Nauarre: They hold, that the noble family of Henri- quers in Nauarre, Lords of Ablitas, is descended from him. D. Henry the Groffe reigned only three yeares, 7. months, and 17. dayes. He died in the city of Pampelone in the Bi- shops palace this yeare 1274. and was interred in the Cathedral church.

Donna Ieanne the onely daughter and heire to the king *D. The gouernement of the Realme was in the hands of Pero Sanches de Montagu, Lord of Calsanti but for the bringing vp of the Infanta D. Ieanne, who was then in the custodie of the Queene her mother, there was great dispute in an assembly called to that end in the city of Pampelone. Some would haue her deliuered to the king D. Alphonso; and of this number was Don Garcia Almorauid: against these Don Pero Sanches de Montagu, Don Armingol Bishop of Pampelone, with many others, were of opinion, that she should be put into the hands of D. Iames king of Arragon: but the Queene her mother desired the might come into the hands of the French, demanding Philip king of France to be tutor to her daughter and Realme. In these debates which were neither gouerned by modestie nor reason, the Queene (feeling lest some inconuenience should fall vpon her daughter and her selfe, being assisted by the Noblemen and Knights which were of her faction) stole away in the night, and carried the Infanta (who was the cause of all the quarrell) with her into France, where shee was courteously intreated by King Philip the third then reigning, her cousin germaine. The Nauarrois hearing of her departure, disputed no more for the daughter, but applied themselves wholly to the things which were made betwixt the kings of Arragon and Castile, either of the one side, or the other. Hee receiued King of Nauarre, vpon fauour of the rights which they pretended to haue.

*Revenues of Na-uarre, allotted

Castile and Ar-

Don Iaime of Arragon was first aduertised of the death of the King Don Henry: wherefore hee sent Ambassadors presently vnto the Estates, intreating them not to hinder him in the possession of the Realme which did of right belong vnto him, nor onely by reason of the adoption and donation which the king D. Sancho the strong had made vnto him, but by a more ancient title: for that (sayd they) the kings which had held the Realme since D. Alphonso the Warrior, had vsurped it by force, and were intruders without any lawfull title, to the prejudice of the Kings of Arragon. Moreover, he let them vnderstand, that there was due vnto him by the deceased kings of Nauarre, 60000. markes of silver, which did augment and better his pretension to the sayd Realme: for which considerations the Ambassadors required them to receiue the king D. Iaime, or D. Pedro for their king, which they should best like of, promising them all good vsage. On the other side, king D. Alphonso desiring that his sonne D. Fernand de la Cerde should obtaine this Realme, renouncing the ancient rights which he pretended thereunto, and without any other request, he gaue him an army to seaze thereon. It fell out that these two pretendents demanded ayde and support one of another, to recouer that which they both desired.

The Noblemen and Deputies of the Estates, seeing the great danger which did threaten the Realme by these diuisions, resolved to send the Bishop of Pampelone, and the gouernour, to soe, to accommodate their affaires in some sort with D. Pero of Arragon, who came thither, where they agreed, that in regard of 60000. markes of silver, they should stand to that which should be set downe by Don Sancho Arch-bishop of Toledo, and brother to Don Pedro, who was held to be a Prelate of a good conscience, and as for the rest, they should vse no force of either side, but all peaceable meanes: whereupon they made truce for a certaine time. The Ambassadors being returned, the place of the Nauarrois assembly was changed to Puente la Reyna, whether came the chief Prelates, Noblemen, and knights of the Realme, and the Deputies of the Townes of Pampelone, Tudela, Estella, Olite, Sanguesia, Puente la Reyna and others of the same iurisdiction.

There in the presence of this honourable Assembly Don Garcia Ortis of Açagra, one of

A For the Agents for the Infant of Arragon, required to haue the King D. Iaime receiued for King of Nauarre, making a large relation of his rights, with promises and assurances that it should redound to the great good of the Realme: whilst they are thus busied, D. Fernand de la Cerde, Infant of Castile, entred the country in armes, where he had many knights of his party: Comming therefore by the country of Oja hee past Ebro, and besieged the towne of Viana, but finding it well garded, hee left it, and came to Mendaciua, which hee took; and afterwards won the towne of Moreda, and committed great spoiles finding no resistance in fildes. This force offred by the Castilian, made them incline more to Arragon; and to the end they might preuent the danger which did threaten them, they sent the Bishop D. Armingol againe to the Infant D. Pedro, being at Tarassone, who although he were a Castilian; yet washee not of D. Fernands faction, and with him were the Gouernor D. Ganpalo Yuaues of Batzan, and his sonne D. John Gonçales of Batzan, D. Gil Balduin Gouernor of Tudela and D. Martin Garcet of Vnça. These Deputies gaue him to vnderstand from the Estates, that they should bee very glad if hee had any good interest to the realme of Nauarre, and that they desired much to know from him, what good alliance they might now treat together. To whom D. Pedro made answer that he desired there should be a promise of a marriage betwixt the Infanta D. Ieanne, and his eldest sonne D. Alphonso; and if that he should die before she came to full age, then shee should marry with D. Iaime his second sonne, and if the marriage could not be accomplished with the Infanta, that it should then be with some one of her cousin germaines, issued from the daughters of King Thibaud the first, especially of the Duchesse of Brittan. He offred to giue them his sonne D. Alphonso, to assist them in the gouernement of the realme: he did withall lay open vnto them the right which his father D. Iaime had to the realme of Nauarre, and the cession which had bene made vnto him, concluding, if these things were not pleasing vnto them, that they should aduise to receiue him for their King within a yeere, deliuering the whole realme freely vnto him.

The Ambassadors being returned with this answer, the assembly was put off to O-lite, where hauing consulted of their affaires, they made an accord with the Infant of Arragon, according to the Articles which follow. That the marriage betwixt D. Alphonso of Arragon his eldest sonne, and the Infanta D. Ieanne should take effect: and if shee should die before the consummation, the Estates should seeke to marry him to one of her cousin germaines, daughter to John Duke of Brittain; and in case D. Alphonso should die before the consummation of the marriage, the Infanta, or one of her cousins, should bee giuen to him of D. Pedros sonnes which should bee next heire to the crowne of Arragon. And whereas the Estates of Nauarre, could not for some lawfull let accomplish it, then they should pay vnto D. Pedro, a hundred and forty thousand Markes of silver, for the expences hee had bene at in the defence of the realme of Nauarre, and that out of the reuenues of the crowne, besides the 60000. markes which were already due, making in all the sum of 200000. markes, as it was curant at that time, payable within one yeere after the sayd let, accounting from Easter day: which accords should not bee any prejudice to the rights and pretensions which his father D. Iaime and he had to the realme of Nauarre, wherein the Estates promised to bee fauourable vnto them, and to aide them all they could. These promises were made and sworn by most of the Noblemen and Deputies assembled in the yeere 1274. vpon paine of high treason if they failed, except in regard of the marriages, for that the Princesses were not in their power.

But D. Garcia Almorauid and others, who were otherwise affected, did not allow of these accords, neither would they consent, nor sweare them, which caused great troubles and diuisions within the realme, neither did any of these Articles take effect, for that Philip King of France, tooke the realme of Nauarre into his protection, and made his sonne King, to whom hee married the Infanta D. Ieanne, frustrating the King of Arragon; for the Queene D. Ieanne widow to D. Henry, being retired into France, with the Infanta her daughter, heire to that crowne, and being aduertised of all that had past in the assembly of the Estates at Olite, was so incensed, as shee deliuered her daughter into the hands of King

King Philip, who receiued both her and the realme of Nauarre into his protection, and A caused her to be brought vp with his two daughters, Marguerite and Blanche, whom he had had by his second wife, Mary of Brabant, being also very young. This Infanta D. Ieanne was tall, beautiful, and of as good a grace as any Princesse of her time, wherefore King Philip married her very young, by a future promise, to his sonne Philip, surnamed the faire, who succeeded in the realme of France.

16 The Estate of Nauarre standing vpon these termes D. Garcia Almoraid, a great enemy to the Gouvernement of D. Pedro Sanchez of Montagu, Lord of Calcaute, and a fauourer of the Castilian faction, tooke occasion to enter into quarrell and to trouble the realme, vpon certaine iarrres which were betwixt the Inhabitants of Pampelone, who had beene long diuided and in mutiny one against the other. Those of the quarter, called Nauarriere would haue made certaine fortifications against the Bourg, but they were hindered by the Gouvernor, who thought that such barres betwixt the Inhabitants of one towne would be the very nurfes of hatred and sedition: Wherefore D. Garcia taking vpon him to support the Inhabitants of Nauarriere, the realme grew into such factions, as there was nothing but Insolences, murder, thefts and such like disorders committed, to remedy the which the Estates were againe assembled at Pampelone, whereas disagreeing who should gouerne the country, they resolu'd to send into France, to beseech King Philip to send them a Nobleman to supply the place of Viceroy, for their Princesse, who was vnder his Gouvernement. King Philip sent them a knight, who was wife and very vertuous, called Eustache Beaumar, or Bellemarche, who was receiued and respected, in whose hands the Estates did swear fealty vnto their Queene, whose person he did represent.

This knight by his wisdom and milde courses did soone reduce the realme to a quiet peace, D. Jaime King of Arragon, being ialous that the French did thus set footing into Nauarre, and being out of hope of the marriages which were concluded with his sonne D. Pedro at Olite, he beganne to demaund the other point of the Capitulation, which was to deliuer him the Realme, and that the Estates should assist him with their forces to recouer his rights, the which being not accomplished, a warre began betwixt Nauarre and Arragon. The pacification made within the realme by the French viceroy, continued not long, for some knights, enemies of all rest, began vnder hand to accuse, and to speake seditious words against their Gouvernor, saying, that it was an ignominious thing for the Nauarrois to be gouerned by a stranger, seeking to draw the people of Pampelone into a muteny. Moreouer hauing practised some gentlemen of Castille, nere vnto the frontiers of Nauarre, making them to enter the country in hostile manner, to the end they might draw the Gouvernor into armes, and to haue meanes in some incounter or charge, to dispatch him. The French Gouvernor seeing the affaires troubled towards Castille, came to Eftella, hauing giuen commandement to all knights and souldiers to come thither with their armes and horses, where he was aduertised of the treason which was plotted against him: wherefore in the night time he returned to Pampelone, where hauing complained in open council of this treachery and rebellion, he did wonderfully amaze the confederats, but especially the chiefe actors, seeing their mallice discovered: wherefore as it often happens that the wicked, being reproched of their wickednesse, grow more impudent and mad, these conspirators were so rash, as they commanded him to retire into France, saying, there were men ynough in Nauarre, better able to gouerne then he: to whom the Gouvernor answered, that he doubted not of the sufficiency of the Noblemen of Nauarre, and that for his part hee had not affected that charge, but it had beene imposed vpon him by King Philip his Lord; who was Tutor and Protector of their Queene and her realme; wherein they (who were priuat persons) should not hinder him, neither was he resolu'd to obey them: notwithstanding hee would assemble the Estates, and if it were sayd by a common consent that he should retire into France, he would obey, so as they gaue him a discharge, and testimony of his administration, otherwise he could not with his honour. shew himselfe before his Kings, the which hee esteemed more then his life.

The assembly being called at Pampelone, there was nothing concluded, for they found

A found not any iust cause why they should refuse the Gouvernement of this French knight: wherefore after many disputes, and seditious speeches vied by the confederats of D. Garcia Almoraid, the chiefe Author of this disorder, they departed, and presently went to armes: so as the Gouvernor was constrained to fortifie himselfe in the Bourg of Saint Sernin: the Inhabitants whereof promised to assist him; and to die at his feet, rather then to suffer him, who was Lieutenant to their Soueraigne Princesse, to take any wrong, whether also D. Corbaran of Bidaure retired. Against this Bourg, they of Nauarriere banded for the other faction, D. Garcia Almoraid being their head: committing all acts of hostility, one against the other, which choller and the fury of a barbarous multitude could inuent; so as neither the authority, admonitions nor intreaties of Prelates, and other great personages, which seemed Neuters and Meadiators of peace, preuailed any thing, but did rather adde oyle to this fire.

They did labour much to make a truce for forty daies, which did but giue them means to fortifie themselves, to commit all the cruelties which ensued, for the mutines of Nauarriere during the truce drew in, by the meanes of the Bishop of Pampelone, great supplies of strangers, with the which the truce being expired they attempted the Bourg: but seeing they could not force it, they went into the Vignes of the aduersie partie, the which they cut and pulled vp by the rootes; and not satisfied therewith, they murdered all the little Infants which they of the Bourg had put forth to nurse in those villages, beating out their braines (with a most barbarous inhumanity) against the stones and walles, adding to these impieties, many iniurious words against their aduersaries, to the dishonour of their Queene.

Moreouer this brutish people hauing intelligence that D. Pedro Sanchez of Montagu, who in this last tumult had beene opposite to the Gouvernor Eustache Bellemarche, would reconcile himselfe vnto him, they came in the night into his lodging, and murdered him cruelly. Such insolencies did the Inhabitants of Nauarriere commit against the Maiesty of God and their Queene: wherefore they drew a heauy iudgement vpon them: for the French King being aduertised of their rebellious actions, vpon the discovery of their conspiracy, was wonderfully offended: wherefore he raised a great army, meaning to punish those which had carried so little respect vnto his greatnesse, and had beene the cause of the ensuing miseries, which army he himselfe would lead into Nauarre, in the yeere 1276. but being arriued at Saluaterre in Bearn, and forced to stay there some time, by reason of the abundance of snow which had fallne, and stop the passages of the mountaines, he was so solicited by them that were not well pleased with this voyage, as he resolu'd to returne, giuing the floure of his army to Charles (the Histories of France call him Robert the second) Earle of Artois, to conduct it into Nauarre, who crossing the mountaines by Iacca, came by Sanguessa to Pampelone, refusing to passe by the Valley of Roncal, for that the Inhabitants held the party of them of Nauarriere: To whose succors there were certaine bands of Castilians entered into the realme, who would haue retired, when as they heard of the coming of the French, but being charged in the reereward, they lost some men, and as they retired slowly, the French and Nauarrois of their party charged them againe, wherevpon they turned head, but they were defeated and put to flight, with great losse. And for that during the fight the Nauarrois cried often vnto the Castilians, Aqui tornass; that is to say, doe you returne? and that this demaund was often heard; they say that the hospital which was built to bury them that were slaine in this incounter, was for this caused named Aqui tornass; and so continues vnto this day. The Earle of Artois besieged Nauarriere, the which he press in such sort, as D. Garcia Almoraid, who was within it with many of his confederats, fearing they should not be able to defend it, got out in the night, abandoning those miserable wretches to the punishment which they had deserued. These commanders retired to the castle of Sar, from whence the French dislodged them, forcing them to flee into the Island of Sardaigne.

The Inhabitants of Nauarriere finding themselves in the morning without captaines, were much troubled, and like men which were better theues and mutines then soldiers, they beganne to cry out for merrey, and to craue pardon of the Earle of Artois: who seeming seeming to pity them much, whilst he entertained them with words on the one side, hee A caused the walled and forts which were vnmanned to be assailed on the other, so as the souldiers entred suddenly, and made a cruell butchery of this wretched people, neuer ceasing to kil whilst that day lasted, and when night came they fel to the spoile, committing such excesse and violences, as victory, hatred and fury doth sugiest to insolent fouldiars: and not content to haue flaine the men, and taken their goods, without respect of holy or prophane, they extended their rage euen vnto the houses and buildings, which they did ruine and burne: wherewith the other quarters of the towne were indo-maged, the fire flying from one to the other, doing great harme to them that had not offended. The Chamber of accounts was fired, where there were many titles, letters and ancient Records of the realme of Nauarre burned: the rest which could be saued, B was carried to the castle of Tiebas, whereas the Treasor and Chamber of accounts of Nauarre hath continued long. The fury being ended, those which had escaped the sword, were condemned, and publicly executed as traitors: not any one escaping the seuerity of that sentence, but such as the innocency of their age excused, and all their goods were confiscated.

Seuerer punished.

Thus Nauarriers of Pampelone was ruined by a iust iudgement of God, in reuenge of the brutish cruelties, which these mutines did vie against innocent age, in the villages, against the city, and other their insolencies and rebellions. For the murthor committed vpon the person of D. Pedro Sanchez of Montagu, Lord of Calcanne, and other their insolencies, there were called in question and accused before the Estates of Nauarre which were called to that end, D. Goncal Inigo, John Ingalbiz and his sonne, Symon of Varriz, Mi- C chel Garces of Varriz, Garcia Perez of Licoani, Pedro Ximenes of Sabalca, Symon Perez of ncales his brother, Sancho Perez of Aguerre, & Ochoa Perez his brother, John of Armenda-riz, John and Sanchez the Biscaian, al which appeering not, their cause was more hainous, hauing for their aduerser parties, Ray Peres of Echales, Fernand Perez of Echales, Michel Perez of Subica, and Pedro of Aybar. By these proceedings and executions, the rest of mutines were terrified, and the realme remained in peace.

Castile.

17 During these actions in Nauarre, D. Alphonso King of Castille, made preparation to march, with an intent to despoesse the Emperor Rodolphus, who had bene chosen to his prejudice, notwithstanding that he had bene perswaded by many of his friends D not to make any more account of the Empire, seeing the occasions which might haue fauiored him were lost: yea Pope Gregory being come to the council of Lyons, considering the miseries which might come to Christendome, if D. Alphonso should wilfully pursue his pretended right, hee sent one vnto him, called Fredul Abbot of Lunel, afterwards Bishoppe of Ouedo, to perswade him to rest satisfied with his royall Estate, and not to trouble himselfe any more with the affaires of the Empire, seeing that by the consent of all the Electors, Rodolphus had bene crowned in the towne of Aix La Chappelle. And to make him beleue that hee gaue him fatherly counsell, hee dispensed with him to take the tenth of all the revenues of the Clergy, for sixe yeeres to make E warre against the Moores. But D. Alphonso being obstinate, hee thought that if hee went to see the Pope, he might draw him to set downe some order betwix him and Rodolphus, so as both might intitle themselves Kings of the Romans: wherefore hee told the Abbot of Lunel, that he desired to passe into France, and to confesse personally with his Holinesse, in some commodious towne, either Montpellier, or where hee pleased.

*Pope ratifies
the election of Rodolphus.*

The Pope hearing this answer, perswaded, himselfe that D. Alphonso had no great desire to be Emperor, wherevpon without further deliberation, hee ratified the Election of Rodolphus, with the consent of the whole consistory, in a conuocation at Lyons, calling him King of Romans, and commanding all the Princes and Prouinces of the Empire, to obey him: aduising Rodolphus to passe speedily into Italy, to receive the crowne of the Empire. It may be he had regard to the diuersity of humors betwix the Germans and Spaniards.

D. Alphonso hauing in the meane time seised his affaires, with his Nobility, and guen

A giuen order for the government thereof, not caring to seeke any truce with Aben Joseph King of Maroc, holding it would be dishonorable, which notwithstanding was the cause of great mischief, as we shall see he went from Toledo, to goe into France, to the Pope, yet was he aduertised, that he had proceeded to the confirmation of Rodolphus. He was accompanied by D. Manuel his brother, the Queene D. Violant the Infants D. Sancho, D.
John, D. Pedro and D. Jaime his children, with many Noblemen and Knights of Marke, of Castille, Leon, and his other dominions. He left the government of the realme to his eldest sonne D. Fernand, and the Moores frontier, to the Earle D. Nugno of Lara. Hee had giuen order to haue a fleet prepared of many ships, in the ports of Asturia, Galicia, and Andalusia, the which coasting along Spaine, Languedoc and Prouence, should attend him at Marceilles, being furnished with many souldiers, and great store of victuals, B sending with it the superfluous horses and baggage of his traine, D. Alphonso marching through the country of his father in law D. Jaime, he came to Tarragone where he was honourably entertained by him, then they arrived at Barcelona, about Christmas, in the yeere 1275. D. Alphonso stayed there with his traine six weekes, being often aduised by the King of Arragon, not to proceed, giuing him many great and considerable reasons: but there was no means to diuert him from this voyage, being so farre aduanced.

An. 1275.

Being come to Perpignan, hee stayed some time to conclude of the time and place of their interview: the towne of Beaucaire was chosen, and the Archbishop of Narbonne had commendement to goe and meet him, and to conduct him. Hee left the Queene his wife and his children at Perpignan, except D. Sancho whom he sent into Castille, by the aduise of the King of Arragon; and crossing Languedoc hauing the Archbishop for his guide, hee arrived at Beaucaire, whereas the Pope met him with some of the chiefe Cardinals, the council of Lyons being ended. D. Alphonso treated of many matters with the Pope, but he could not obtaine any thing that hee propounded. He shewed him the nullity of Rodolphus election by many reasons, complaining greatly of his confirmation, making a great instance vpon that point in vaine; but the Pope wanted no excuses. Then he laied open to the Pope the reasons hee had to the succession of the house of Swabe after the death of Conradin King of Naples and Sicile, and Duke of Sua-be, who was inhumanly beheaded by the French at Naples, in the yeere 1269, who hauing left no lawfull children, the succession of the house belonged to him, in the right of his mother D. Beatrice, who was the right heire of that Duchy, whereon Rodolphus had to his prejudice seized: besides hee complained of the French King, who had in-truded, and seized vpon the realme of Nauarre, which by ancient rights belonged to the house of Castille, whereof he produced some reasons to iustifie his saying, but all was in vaine: finally he besought the Pope to be a mediator for the deliuey of D. Henry his brother, who since the bataille, and defeat of Conradin, was prisoner in the hands of Charles King of Naples and Sicile. D. Alphonso propounded many other things vnto the Pope, but without any effect: So as he spent the whole spring and part of the Sommer in this negotiation, vntill that the Pope leaving him much discontented, returned to Rome, yet hee still vsed the title and armes of the Empire, vntill that he was forced by censures to leaue them, the Archbishop of Seuille hauing charge to intimate them vnto him.

18. King D. Alphonso being buied in this vaine pursuit, the Moores his confederats and vassals of Spaine, called in Aben Joseph Miralumin of Affrike, thinking they might not still shake off the Christians yoke, but make some notable breach in the Estates of Leon and Castille, the King being absent, or at the least they should seize vpon Andalusia; and for that wee haue often made mention of this King Aben Joseph, it is needful we should relate what he was, and treat some thing of the Moores Estate in Affrike, for that those of Spaine haue had their support from them. The Miralumin Aben Mahamed the old, of the race of the Almohades, being dead, after hee had lost the bataille of Muradal, we made mention that his Grand-child called Caid Arrax, reigned, who was the sonne of Buxaf, dead before his father Mahumer. This Caid Arrax was the fifth King of Affrike, of the race of the Almohades, whose Empire extended from the West Ocean vnto Egypt. There were many Admirals, or Gouernors vnder him, ruling the Pröuinces, among the which Gomaranga Aben Zein, of the Linage of Abdaluces, held that of Tremessen, who behauing himselfe couetously and violently in his gouernment, fell in disgrace with his King Caid Arrax, so as carrying himselfe rebelliously, the King came and besieged him in a castle called Tremezezir, whereas a Moore, cousin to Gomaranga, going out of the fort flue the Miralmumin, seeming to yield vnto him, and shewing him a place whereby the castle might be taken. The army amazed at the death of their King, was instantly set vpon by the garrison of Tremezezir, being led by Gomaranga, and put to flight, by which victory the Moore did appropriate that Prouince vnto himselfe, causing himselfe to be called King of Tremessen, and this was the beginning of that Kingdome.

At the same time there was in the city of Fez, a family of Moores, called the Bemolaxez and Merins, which descended from a famous Moore, called Merin, who had bene a Christian and became a Mahometist. The chiefe of this house at that time, was called Bucar Aben Merin, and gouerned the city of Fez, vnder the Miralmumin Caid Arrax; after whose death, and the defeat of his army by Gomaranga, before Tremezezir, this Bucar Aben Merin fell vpon the Almohades, which had escaped, and gathered them selfes together about Fez, whom hauing put to rout, he carried himselfe for King of Fez, imitating that which his companion Gomaranga Aben Zein had done in Tremessen, and giuing a beginning to this new Kingdome. A brother of his called Jacob Aben Ioseph, usurped (in the same troubles) the Principality in Ribat: so as the Estate of the Almohades raigning in Maroc, was then much decayed. These being aduertised of the death of Caid Arrax, and of the tyrannies aboue named, did presently aduance a kinsman of his, to the royall seat, his name was Almoracida, who was the sixth Miralmumin of the race of the Almohades. He was no sooner crowned King, but he went to field with an army, to punish these rebels which had intitled themselves Kings in their gouernments: First he came and assailed Bucar Aben Merin, the new King of Fez, but he was repulst, and vanquished by him: so as the race of the Merins kept the possession of Fez, and of the territory in the plaine country, or Algarue, as the Moores call it. So as Bucar dying a peaceable King, his sonne Hiaja raigned after him, vnder the tutelage of Jacob Aben Ioseph, his vnckle, for that he was then very young, but he liued not long; wherefore Jacob Aben Ioseph remained heire of the realme of Fez, and was much esteemed and feared amongst the Moores, being called (as an honour) the old or elder of the Merins. This Moores good fortune was not so bounded for Budebuz, nephew to Almoracida king of Maroc, being rebelled against him, and retired to Fez, he gaue him an occasion to get the realme of Maroc, and to ioyne it vnto Fez. Budebuz intreated Jacob Aben Ioseph, to aide him against his vnckle, promising to giue him all that he held of the realme of Fez, vnto the issue of his Natib.

Jacob Aben Ioseph gaue him such succors, as Almoracida being amazed, durst not attend him within Maroc, but fled, being pursued by certaine horsemen which Budebuz sent after him, whom they ouertooke and flue, carrying his head to the King of Fez: wherefore Budebuz was peaceable King of Maroc, the seuenth and last of the Almohades. Finding himselfe seised in his Kingdome, he would haue mocked Jacob Aben Ioseph, who had helped him to attaine this dignity, not caring to performe any promise, but threatened to take Fez from him, by reason of which Ingratitude, there beganne a cruell warre betwixt them, the which hauing continued three yeeres, at the last it was ended, by the defeat and death of King Budebuz, being slaine in bataille, of whose Estate Jacob Aben Ioseph seized, giuing an end to the raigne of the Almohades, and a beginning to that of the family of Merin in Affrike, about the yeere of our Lord 1270. It is this Jacob Aben Ioseph, whom we haue sayd, had sent one thousand light horses Arabians into Spaine to Mahumet Alhamar King of Granado, vnder the conduct of a captaine with one eye, of great authority: with whom D. Alphonso the wise, King of Castille, hauing not vouchsafed to treat of a truce, when as he went in France to court the Pope, Mir Almuz who had succeeded in Granado, and hee conspired together, to the preiudice of Castille, and all the Christians in Spaine: to this King of Granado being discontented with the

Accorde

A accords which he had made at his first entrance, in the which he could not procure King Alphonso to abandon the captaines of Malaga and Guadix his enemies, he feared that these Moores which had bene enemies to his father and him, would attempt some thing against his realme; and therefore he reholde, at what price soeuer, to ruine them. And for that it was a meane to imbatke him in a warre with the King of Castille, hee did sollicit Jacob Aben Ioseph to undertake the enterprise of Spaine, as his predecessors Kings of Arabia had done, offering him the townes and ports of Algezire and Tariffe, for his descent, whereof the Miralmumin did willingly accept, finding himselfe assured in his Estate, and mighty in men and armes: But it happened that they of Malaga and Guadix, seeing that the truce which they had with the King of Granado, was nere expired, and doubting they should haue warre, and not be releued by the forces of Castille, by reason of the Kings absence, they held it the best course to reconcile themselves to the King of Granado, as in like manner the captaine of Comares did, who was of the same league.

Notwithstanding the Miralmumin hauing leauied great forces to passe into Spaine, sent some troupes of Moores to receiue the townes of Algezire and Tariffe, according to the accord, the which were deliuered vnto them: so as he stayed not long to come himselfe in person to Algezire, whereas afterwards he past his troups to the number of fiftene thousand horse: The two Kings met in the country of Malaga, whereas they concluded to make warre against the Christians; the African King towards Eccia, and he of Granado by Iaen. This passage was contrary to the expectation of the Christian Princes, for the Miralmumin, who could not make so great a leauy of horse, without knowledge, made a shew as if he would goe against one of his subiects which was rebelled, and had by stealth taken the towne of Ceuta; and the better to dissemble his designe, hee had sent to intreat the King of Arragon to assist him in this warre with tenne Gallies, and some ships of burthen, and with fiftie hundred horse, to whom hee promised good entertainment. Don Fernand de la Cerde Viceroy and Lieutenant generall in Spaine for his father, did not disceuer that these forces were prepared for Castille, vntill they had past the straight, being then at Burgos, hee was aduertised of the League betwixt these Moorish Kings, and of the reconciliation of them of Malaga and Guadix with the King of Granado, all which inconueniences grew by the Kings absence, wherefore, both of himselfe, and at the instance of Don Nugno de Lara, who was at Cordoua, hee made the speediest preparation hee could, to oppose himselfe against the violence of these Infidels.

Don Nugno knowing that the Miralmumin tooke the way of Eccia, drew neere vnto that quarter, with such forces as he could gather together: but finding the passage stoppt, hee was forced to fight with the Moores, where after a long fight hee was defeated and slaine, yet most of his men which escaped entred by night into Eccia.

The victorious Moores hauing found the body of Don Nugno, cutt off his head and sent it to Mahumet King of Granado, who was glad of this victory, but very much discontented for the death of the Earle Don Nugno, who had bene the cause that hee rigned, wherefore hee sent his head to Cordoua, to be buried with his body. The like misfortune happened to Don Sancho of Arragon Archbishop of Toledo, who hauing gathered together all the souldiars of Toledo, Guadalajara, Madrid and Taluera, presented himselfe vpon the frontier, where hee encountered the King of Granados army, inuading the Diocesse of Iaen, where hee was slaine and his army put to rout. His body, head and hand, where hee was the Pontifical Ring, being separated, were recovered from the Moores, and brought to Toledo, where they were buried with great sorrow of all the people, taking it for a mournfull preface for the affaires of Spaine: D. Goncale, Bishop of Burgos succeeded him in this dignity, and was afterwards made Cardinal, the first amongst all the Bishops of the Church.

They write that the Archbishop Don Sancho did not die fighting, in the charge, but that being taken, there grewe debate betwixt some captaines Moores, some striving to lead him to the Miralmumin Jacob Aben Ioseph, and others to King Mahumet, and thus

The day of this defeat, there arrived, D. Lopez Diaz de Haro, Lord of Biscay, with a great number of souldiers, horse, and foote, which he had sodainly leuied, and lead by great iointneices towards the frontier, by fauour whereof many, which had remained at the battaile, ioyntly with his troupe, and without any delay, went all ioyntly together to in-counter the Moores, who receiued them courageously, so as neither party could vant ters, were done about the Archbishop D. Sancho crosse, the which he cauled to be carried before him, as primat, and had fallne into the Moores hands: but the Christians recoured it againe, which made them hope for better.

[illegible]

Being returned into Spain about the end of the yeere 1276. he found the flatin great disorder, whereof he had bene alwaies aduertised during his aboad in France. That which most grieved him, was the death of his eldest sonne D. Fernand, & not without cause, for that other sonne D. Sancho made shew that he had some disordred enterprise in his conceit, he which he put in execution, to the dishonor and prejudice of his father, and elder brothers children, wherein D. Lope Diaz de Haro, Lord of Biscay, did amilla, counsel and conduct him: for as soone as the Infant D. Sancho arrived at Villa Real, D. Lope Diaz came vnto him: whereas D. Sancho knowing that where his brother died, D. Lope Diaz came vnto him: whereas D. Sancho knowing that he was ill affected to the King D. Alphonso, and the deceased D. Fernand, and his familiar friend, he did freely acquaint him with the desire he had to reigne, saying it was fit that he who was a knight, and had learned to gouerne a realme, were it in warre or peace, should reigne after his father, rather then his Nephews, the sons of his brother D. Fernand, who were yet very young, hauing need of Regents or Gouernours, charges which were effected by great perages, who by reason therof, grew into quarrel one with the other, to the oppression of the people, and hazard of the Estate, the which was chiefly to be feared in these reuolts & tumults of the Moores; who could embrace such an occasiō, to augment their Estate with the preuidice of the Christians: intreating him to assist him to effect his desire, adding therewithal great promises: wherevnto D. Lope Diaz answered, accord- ing to the Infants desire, incouraging him to proceed in his enterprise, with assurance to aide him: with this resolution they past with the army by Cordoua, and repulst the Moores in such sort, as the Miralmumins retreat, & the abouementioned truce followed. Here-

A Hereupon the King D. Alphonso, did somewhat stay his sonnes enterprife, but not quite ouerthrow it : for not long after D. Sancho not only assured himselfe to succeed his father in the Kingdome, but would also raigne in his life time.

the religion of his age. They write of three notable precepts which hee gaue vnto D. Alphonse King of Castille, being with him at Toledo. That hee should make the townes and common people his friends, against the Insolencies of great men. That he should neuer punish offenders secretly; and that hee should neuer seeme fearefull in doing well. The Authors of Arragon write, that in his time hee built about two thousand Churches and Chapells, and that hee fought thirtie times in battaile against the Moores; Hee left his sonne Don Pedro successor in his realme of Arragon, Valencia and Catalogne. To D. Lames his second sonne, he left the Islands of Majorca and Minorca, with the title of a Kingdome, and the right of Soueraintie, but it continued not long. He gaue by testament to the children of D. Therçail of Bedaure, that is, ro D. Lames, Xirica, Tora, Eljida, Belu and Ahin: and to D. Pedro, Ayerbio, Lufia, Ahuero, Lifa, Atsillon, Cattillon, Sulçico, Borota, Azuero, Cabalarots and Benimenua. It is credible that he did marry this Lady secretly, yet after the death of Queene Isolan, which was about the yeere 1251. hauing accompanied with her before, it may be betwixt these two marriages, and not as some haue written, before his first marriage with D. Leonor of Castille. These two fonnnes D. Lames and D. Pedro, borne of D. Therçail, were the Authors of the families of Xerica and Ayerbio. He also gaue by testament to D. Pedro Fernandes, whom hee had by D. Berenguela Fernandes, Isar: and did substitute vnto his lawfull fonnnes, the children of his daughters D. Isabel, Constance and Isolan: hee was interred in the habit of a Monke of Cîteaux, in the royal Monastery of Poblet.

20 Don Pedro his eldest sonne, was King in the yeere 1276. being surnamed the great; by reason of his great exploits, some good, some bad. Alphonso had the yeere before, by the care of D. James his Grandfather, beene sworne King of Arragon and Valencia, after D. Pedro his father, by the Estates assembled to that end at Le-rida. He had him by D. Constance, daughter to Manfroy, bastard to the Emperor Fredric, the second King of Sicile and Naples, of whom hee also begat D. James, who was King of Sicile; whose elder brother dying without children, he came to succeed in the Realme of Arragon. Besides these, he had D. Fadrique, or Fredric, to whom was given the realme of Sicile, and D. Pedro, who alone of all the brethren was no King, and two daughters. D. Isabel, who was married to Don Denis King of Portugal, and Constance or Violant, wife to Robert King Naples. In the right of his wife Constance, daughter to Manfroy the vamping King of Naples and Sicile, hee challenged these realmes for him and his successours, who in the end enjoyed them, and thus the Historie records it.

William the second of that name King of Naples and Sicile, being dead, being of the F Normans race, about the yeere 1189. Pope Clement the 3. then reigning, pretended that their realmes were fallne to the church of Rome. But the noblemen and barons of the realm, for diuers considerations, did make Tancred bastard son to Roger the 3. their King, who first intituled himselfe King of Naples and Sicile, whereas Pope Celestine the 3. successor to Clement, being discontented, he would haue dispossessed Tancred, to inuelt

Emperor Henry the sixth sonne to Frederic Barbarossa Duke of Suabe, in the realmes of A Naples and Sicile. And the better to assure him the royall title, he caused him to marry Constance Niece or lawfull daughter of Roger, who was a professed Nunne in the Monastery of Saint Mary, or as some write at Saint Peters of Palermo, dispensing with her vow and profession, by his papal authority, by whom the Emperor Henry had Frederic, who was afterwards Emperor, the second of that name. Henry fought long to dispossesse Tancred, but it was in vaine. He being dead, his sonne Roger reigned little, after whose deceale, Queene Sibille caused an other sonne called William, to be presently crowned, being very yong, whom the Emperor Henry found meanes to circumvent, upon collour of making some good accord with him: and hauing by policy drawne him to Palermo, without entring into any conference, he caused him to be gelyt, and sent him into Germany, with his three sisters. By this meanes the Normands command in Naples and Sicile, fell into the hands of the house of Suabe. After the death of Henry, Frederic his sonne being Emperour, and duke of Suabe, succeeded in these realmes, the which hee enjoyed, notwithstanding many crosses which the Popes gaue him, against whom Gautier of Brene, husband to Queene Sybbille, who had escaped out of prison, led an army, but hee was taken and slue himselfe in prison. Frederic had by many wies many children: by Constance of Arragon, Henry the elder, duke of Suabe, and King of Romans: by Jolant of Brenne, daughter to the King of Ierusalem, Conrad, also duke of Suabe, and King of Romans, after the deceale of his brother, and moreover by testament King of Naples. By Mahant, or Isabel, according vnto some, daughter to John King of England, he had Henry the yonger, who was King of Sicile by Testament, and by a concubine Manfroy, Conrad and Henry succeeded after their father Frederic, respectively, in the realmes of Naples and Sicile. And for that they were young and absent, Manfroy was appointed to be Gouverneur of these Estates by the Emperor, in his brothers names. Against whom Pope Innocent did chose the King of Englands brother to bee King of Naples and Sicile, but he neuer past into Italy. By the practises of Popes, these realmes were in great combustion, so as Manfroy was obeyed but by the lesser part. Wherefore Conrad King of Romans was forced to passe into Italy, with a great army, by meanes whereof he reduced these realmes vnder his obedience, who was afterwards so transported with a desire of raigne, as he caused his brother, Henry the yonger, to bee slaine at Saint Felix, in Basilicata, and Frederic his Nephew, sonne to the elder Henry, to bee poysoned, hauing inuited him to supper: for which parricide God suffered that hee himselfe should die of poyson, which Manfroy his bastard brother gaue him.

Paricide committed by Conrad.

Manfroy parricide.

Charles of Anjou made king of Naples and Sicile.

By these deathes the realmes of Naples and Sicile came by lawfull succession to Conrad, brother to Frederic that was poysoned, sonne to Henry the elder. But Manfroy who had gouerned in an others name, and tasted the sweet of command, refused then to keepe these realmes for himselfe, sending men into Germany to dispatch Conrad, if it were possible, were it by poison or otherwise: in the meane time he held his authority of Lieutenant or Viceroy, against the Popes attempts: and after a while feigning that Conrad was dead, he clad himselfe in mourning, and making a great speech in an assembly of the Noblemen and States of the realme, seeming to bee very sorrowfull for the death of his Nephew, he perswaded them to choose him King of Naples and Sicile by a generall consent, where he reigned thirteene yeeres: and the better to maintaine himselfe, he made a league with the Venetians and other Potentates of Italy: Against whom Pope Vrbain the fourth, called out of France Charles brother to Saint Lewis, Duke of Anjou, and Earle of Prouence, who had married D. Beatrix of Arragon, Proprietary of that Earldome, according to the Arragonois, who was inuested by him in the realmes of Naples and Sicile, in the yeere 1262. with charge that hee should expel Manfroy, and pay a rent vnto the Church as feudatary. Charles, by the perswasion of D. Beatrix his wife, who was ieaalous to see her two sister Queenes, the one of France, the other of England, vnderooke the voiage of Italy, where his inuestiture was confirmed, and he crowned with his wife, at Rome, at Saint John of Laran, by Pope Clement the fourth. Then passing on against Manfroy, who came to encounter him, both armies met about

A about at Bencuent, in the yeere 1266. whereas Manfroy was slaine in bataille, and his men vanquished; so as Charles remained peaceable King of Naples and Sicile. The body of Manfroy was not buried in holy ground, for that he stood excommunicate, but in a field nere vnto Beneuent, from whence hee was afterwards transported vnto the confines of Campania, his wife and children, being taken by the French, died in prison. Some yeeres after Conrad (the right heire of these realmes) past into Italy, being perswaded by many Italians of the Gibeline faction, who hauing encountered the French army nere vnto Arezzo, vanquished it: wherefore marching boldly on, hee had a second encounter with King Charles his army, nere vnto Alba, the which was vnfortunate for him; for his army was not onely defeated, but himselfe taken prisoner (thinking to saue himselfe, in a disguised habit) and carried to Naples, whereas King Charles by a detestable inhumanity (thrust on by Pope Clement) in the yeere 1269. cut off his head, with that of his cousin Frederic Duke of Austria, and of many Noblemen of Naples and Sicile, which had followed *Conrad*s party. By these meanes the Popes gaue these realmes vnto the French, and called them the two Sicilles, the one on this side, the other beyond the Far. Henry brother to D. Alphonso King of Castille, Lieutenant of Rome, was partizan to Conrad in this warre, and was taken, as hath beene sayd.

If the Sultan of Egypt, a barbarous Prince, hauing the King Saint Lewis, and his brother Charles prisoners, had intreated them in like manner, the French would haue held it very strang. But God powred forth his vengeance vpon the French some yeeres after, in the Island of Sicile, whether they called D. Pedro King of Arragon, who had succeeded D. Jaime his father, in the yeere 1276. who without delay caused himselfe to be crowned in Saragossa, by D. Bernard Olinueta Archbishop of Tarragone: but before he receiued the crowne, he made protestation, that he would not be bound to any submission, nor promise, which D. Pedro his Grandfather had made vnto the Pope, or the church of Rome, to the preiudice of the liberty of his realme, to the end they should not pretend that hee was their Legee-man, or vassal.

In the same assembly of Estates of Saragossa, he caused the oath to be confirmed to his son D. Alphonso, to raigne after him, as heire presumptive, and for that at his coming to the crowne, he had not assembled the Estates of Cattelogne at Barcelona, according to the ancient customes, there to promise and sweare the obseruation of the rights, lawes and preiudices of the country, the Noblemen of Cattelogne, being long inured to tumults, they made a league and conspired with the townes, for the preferuation of their liberties: the chiefe of which conspiracy, were D. Roger Bernard Earle of Foix holding many tees, and much land in Cattelogne, Arnold Roger Earle of Pallars, Ermengud Earle of Urgel, and Aznar his brother, Raymond Foulques Vicont of Cardone, Bernard Roger Eril, Raymond Anglesol, and William Raymond Ioffe, whereof we will hereafter make mention: But wee must returne into Castille, where we haue left King D. Alphonso the wise much troubled, for the disorders which had happened during his absence.

E 21 Being arriued at Toledo, euery man repaired thither, and especially the Infant D. Sancho, who had made truce for two yeeres with the Moores. Thither came also D. Lope Diaz of Haro, who was so hardy, as to deliuer a message for them all, that it would please him to declare his sonne D. Sancho his successor in the realmes of Castille, Toledo, Leon and other places, seeing hee had already giuen some proofes of his vertue and valour against the Moores, and that he was the eldest of his sons lying to whom the King made but a cold answere in the beginning, but hauing afterwards assembled the Estates in the towne of Segobia, by the counsel of the Infant D. Manuel his brother, he resolved to gratifie D. Sancho, whom he made heire of the crowne after his deceale, and in this quality hee was receiued by them all. Thus D. Alphonso and D. Fernand, the children of Don Fernand de la Cerdie, were put from the royall succession, which did belong vnto them by right, although that some excuse this fact of D. Alphonso, saying that there was no law at that time which did binde him to leaue the realme more to one then to another; as since there was made and receiued in the time of D. Fernand the fifth, in the city of Toro, where it was decreed vpon this difficultie that the children of the elder brother deceased,

Manfroy was justified and slaine by the French.

An audacious speech of D. Lope Diaz of Haro.

D. Alphonso reiects the children of D. Fernand his eldest sonne from the succession, and gives it to D. Sancho.

Portugal.

The new King of Portugal, who would not trust king D. Alphonso his Grandfather, A was now in quarrell with his brother, called also D. Alphonso, whom he purfued with Armes, but aswell this controuersie, as that he had with his mother, were pacified by the meanes of Don Sancho of Castile, and of Don Pedro King of Arragon, to whose daughter called Don Isabel, borne of the Queene Don Constance, daughter to Manfred King of Naples this Prince was married, which marriage was celebrated at Troncoso, in the year 1282. with royall pompe, about that time Don Sancho burst forth into open rebellion against his father. This King Don Denis did afterwards enter into league with Don Sancho, who drew vnto his seruice D. John his brother, besides D. Lope Diaz de Haro, Diego Lopez his brother, Ramir Diaz, D. Nugno de Lara, Don Pedro Aluarez of the Alturies, Fernand Roderigo of Cabrera, and many others, which were out of the countrie since the death of the Infant Don Fredericke, and of Symon Ruiz de los Cameros.

Castille.

D. Sancho takes upon him the regency, and refuses the title of King.

The Infant Don Sancho was so well beloued, as in a short time all men followed him, leauing the king D. Alphonso poore and miserable. The conspirators beeing assembled at Vailledolit, they were all of opinion, that D. Sancho should intitle himselfe king of Castile, and of the other dominions which his father had enioyed: but he shewed himselfe so newhat modest, saying, that he would not do his father that wrong, to intitle himselfe King during his life time: but would rest satisfied to be tearmed Infant of Castile, the eldest and heire of those Realmes. So D. Sancho carried great respect vnto the king his father, in words and vaine titles, but he made himselfe king in effect, ordaining lawes both for peace and warre, disposing of Captaines and Gouernors, and of the treasure at his owne will: the king D. Alphonso beeing driuen to that extremity as hee was forced to send his royall Crowne, with Jewels of inestimable value, in pawning for 70000. doubloons C to Jacob Aben Joseph Miralumin of Maroc, complaining vnto this Infidell king, of the wrongs he had receiued from his sonne and subiects who were Christians. They say, that king Jacob beeing a Barbarian, did heare of D. Alphonso's afflictions with teares in his eyes, and shewing this royall Crowne vnto his Knights, he sayd, That he did willingly embrace this occasion, to succour a King of an ancient race, with his person and goods against the impietie of a wicked sonne: giuing so good an answer vnto the King D. Alphonso, as he was much esteemed and commended of all men. Necessitie and indignitie did so transport D. Alphonso, as he accepted the Moores offer, intreating him to passe D the streights with his forces, the which he did: In the meane time D. Sancho married D. Mary daughter to D. Alphonso, Lord of Molina, his great vncle, brother to the king D. Fernand the third, who seeing himselfe supported by the kings of Arragon and Portugal, came to Cordoua, where by the aduice of the Noblemen and Knights of Castile that were present, and by a decree pronounced by the mouth of D. Manuel, in the name of the whole Nobilitie, the king D. Alphonso was deprived of all his Realmes: the causes they pretended, were the death of D. Fredericke and of Symon Ruiz, obseruing no forme of Iustice, nor any orderly proceeding: the breach of the rights and priuiledges of the Nobility, and the waisting of the treasure. D. John Nugnes de Lara, nor D. John Nugnes, and Nugno Gonzales his children, D. Aluaro Nugnes, D. Fernand Perez Ponce, with many others, would not assit at this assembly, nor consent vnto this act of so pernicious a consequence.

The Miralumin Jacob Aben Joseph past at Algezire, with great troupes of horse, and the two kings had an interview at Zahara in Granado, whereas he of Maroc arrived first. The manner of this interview is worthy obseruation, for the humanity and courtesie which this mightie Moorish King vsed to a Prince of a contrarie Religion, sometimes his enemy, and dejected from his dignitie. Hee caused a great and rich Pauillion to be set vp in the open field, in the which were two seats placed like thrones, the one being higher and more eminent then the other: and hauing placed the chiefe Noblemen of the family of the Merins (from whence he was descended) at the entry, he commanded them all to kisse D. Alphonso's feet, and that they should not suffer him to light from his horse before he were neere vnto the Pauillion, where beeing arrived, King Aben Joseph and hee E embraced one another like brethren, and so entered into the Pauillion holding hands. The royall and magnificent ceremonies which they vsed in their sitting downe, were great and long, either struing to giue the more honorable place vnto the other: but in the

A the end the king of Castile was forced to sit in the highest, the king of Maroc saying: It was reasonable that D. Alphonso, a king defended of kings, and borne of a king, should be set above rather then himselfe, whom God by his mercy had aduanced to that dignitie of late time.

Humanity and modesty of the Moorish King.

These Monarkes beeing set, they conferred of their affaires, and hauing resolved, king D. Alphonso returned to Seuille, to gather together those small forces which were faithful vnto him. The Moote marched with his army towards Osiuna and Estepa, and then came to Ecija, where the two kings ioyned, and hauing taken Castro, they presented themselves before Cordoua: but the Infant Don Sancho had entred into it the night before with great troupes of horse, where as they spent twenty dayes in vaine, without any memorable act done by either side. Rising from thence, the king of Maroc, with the consent of D. Alphonso, did ouer-runne the champian country, and going through the pace of Muradal, he entred into the fields of Montiel, destroying all he encountered, and finding no resistance. Returning towards Ecija, D. Alphonso parted from Seuille to go and meet him, according to the king of Maroc's desire. Beeing come vnto the campe, king D. Alphonso grew into so great a distrust, vpon reports, or some other vaine imagination, that the king of the Moores would slay him, as he parted by night in great haste, and returned to Seuille. The Miralumin beeing much discontented at this ialousie, sent vnto him to excuse himselfe, and to assure him that he neuer had any such thought, intreating him to send him his troupes, the which he would entertaine, and so enter into the countie of Granado against king Mahomed his enemy, hauing conspired with Don Sancho his sonne: whereunto D. Alphonso yeelded, and sent him a thousand horse, who presently receiued pay: but growing suddenly into a ialousie that they would leade them into Africke, they abandoned the Miralumin, and sent him the remainder of his money. The King of Maroc seeing these proceedings, grew discontented, and returned into Affricke; yet nothing eltranged in his affection to pleasure D. Alphonso, D. Fernand Perez Ponce of Leon, Commander of these thousand horse, durst not returne to king D. Alphonso, hauing no lawfull excuse to haue abandoned king Jacob Aben Joseph: but whilst he entertained himselfe about Cordoua, there was an oportunitie offered which did deface this ble- C mish.

D It was strange, that these thousand horse did charge ten thousand which sallied out of the city, the which were assembled from all the parts of Spaine for Don Sancho, and defeated them. Wherefore returning to Seuille they were well receiued: D. Sancho (who was then absent from Cordoua) was much discontented at this route, and did so sharply rebuke his men for their rashnesse, daring to present themselves against his fathers Standard royall, the which he did euer greatly reuerence. Thus Don Sancho did honour the Images and royall enignes, but not the king his father: who beeing much incensed with the continuall vexation of his sonnes rebellion, who had vsurped his Realmes, hee pronounced in the presence of many men of marke, both Clergie and Secular, in the Cittie E of Seuille, about the end of that year 1282. the curse of God and his vppon D. Sancho, a sonne, sayd he, disobedient, rebellious, and a parricide, declaring him incapable and vnworthy to raigne: depriving him of his succession and inheritance, and discharging the subiects, as much as in him lay, from all oath and homage which they had done vnto him. This act was done with great solemnitie and maiestie, but they were but words, which D. Sancho did not much esteeme; who at the same time returned to Cordoua, and conferred with the king of Granado at Priego, to whome hee restored Arenas, and renewed their League.

In the year 1283. D. Sancho beeing come to Carcetes, to Pont d'Alcantara, and to Ledema, he forced the Infant D. Pedro his brother to hold his party, who notwithstanding had a great desire to follow his fathers, who intended to giue him the countie of Murcia, with the title of a king. He did the like to the Infant D. John, who aspired to haue the kingdom of Leon for himselfe, all which was forced. Many knights which followed these Princes, and which were well affected to king D. Alphonso, escaped, and passing thorough Portugal came to Seuille. The towne of Agreda revolted and followed the kings partie, the Infant D. Sancho beeing come against it, he had newes that Alastin d'Avbar, Gouernour Gouvernor of Treuigno, was also resolved, and had receiued Don Iohn Nuges de Lara, A with a great bootie which he had taken in the territories of Burgos, into Treuigno, from whence he made roads, and did annoy his people. D. Sancho sent D. Lope Diaz de Haro against them, who made them to keepe within their fort. Thus was the warre mannaged betwixt the father and the sonne in Castile and other places depending.

During the which D. Pedro king of Arragon, had giuen libertie to his soldiers vpon the frontier, who were daily in skirmish against the Nauarrois, especially they of Sos and Filera, against the Inhabitants of Sanguessa; and they were so incensed one against another, as they could not be pacified: yet the diligence of Eustache Bellemarche, Gouvernor of Nauarre, made them to lay aside armes, and to conclude a truce for a time. Bellemarche returned into France, and in his place a Knight called Guerin of Amplepuis, governed the Realme of Nauarre. Philip the third King of France, being Protector of this Realme for his Neece Queene Isabe, had also occasion to thinke of the affaires of Spaine, for that the children of D. Fernand de la Cerde, borne of his sister D. Blanche, had not only bene dejected by the King D. Alphonso from the right of succession to the Crowne of Castile, which did belong vnto them, as children to the eldest sonne, but also these two young Princes, D. Alphonso and D. Fernand de la Cerde, were kept prisoners in the castell of Xatuna by the king of Arragon: and moreover being aduertised, that besides the Arragonis attempts in former times, their king had made a new accord at Campillo with D. Sancho of Castile, where among other things it was concluded, that they should inuade the Realme of Nauarre at their common charges, and diuide the conquest equally. Moreouer, that at another interview betwixt D. Sancho of Castile, and D. Pedro of Arragon, the Infant had resigned vnto D. Pedro all the right he pretended to Nauarre, promising neuer to make warre there without his liking, to the end he might bee the more freely assisted with the forces of Arragon, to dispossesse his father. King Philip was wise, and of power to prevent all these practises, all which he made frustrate in regard of Nauarre. Yet he did in vaine sollicite the kings of Castile and Arragon for the deliuerance of his Nephewes, who were at Xatuna. He sent good troupes of horsemen into Nauarre, for the guard of the countrie, and to be ready vpon all occasions.

practises of the Castilians and Arragonis
against Nauarre.

The factions betwixt the Nobilitie of Castile (some holding the partie of King Don Alphonso, others that of Don Sancho his sonne) fell out happily for the French and Nauarrois in many things: for Nauarre serued for a retreat to all those that were in diligence with Don Sancho. Many of the chiefe of Castile, and other places depending, came and ioyned with the troupes of France and Nauarre, and making roades into Castile, did alwaies keepe the Realme of Nauarre in reputation, and made the forces to be redoubted, the which changed many Gouvernors in a short time: for after Eustache Bellemarche and Guerin of Amplepuis, William of Broede was sent thither, and then Iohn of Constans L. of Dompierre, Marshall of Champagne, in the yeare 1283. when as among other Noblemen of Castile, there fled into Nauarre Don Nugno de Lara, Don Pero Aluarez of the Asturias, Don Ramir Diaz, Don Fernand Ruis de Cabrera, and Don Fernand Ruis de Saldañuega, who ioyned with others which made themselves strong in the Countrie, which were the Infant Don Laine of Castile, Don Iohn Nuges, Don Aluar Nuges and others, all being assisted by the troupes of France and Nauarre, they made roades as far as Toledo, with great ruine of the country and people, for the French King hated Don Sancho, as an usurper of his Nephewes right, neither was he lesse enemy to Don Pedro King of Arragon, as well for the detention of his nephewes, and his practises with Castile, as for that which had happened in the Realme of Naples, betwixt the Arragonis and the French, as you shall heare.

These spoilers being a competent armie of foure thousand horse, and great numbers of foot, returning towards Toledo, had a desseigne to enter into Arragon, and to assaile Tarrassone, whereof Don Pedro being aduertised, who kept a garrison of three hundred horse at Logroño, for the defence of Castile, he sent to intreat the Infant Don Sancho to march thither, and to succour him against the French and Nauarrois, who came to destroy his Realme of Arragon, the which he did presently: so as being ioyned with the king Don Pedro they saued Tarrassone: yet the Arragonis lost the castell of V1, the

A which was well defended by Ximeno of Artieda: they also lost Lerida and Filera, the which were giuen in gard to them of Sanguessa: Baylo and Arbujs were ruined, and the French and Nauarrois past vnto Verdun. Vpon their returne, the army of D. Pedro and D. Sancho attended them, where as they could not auoyd the battaile, which the French presented them: but the Knights of Castile which did accompany them, told them that they had willingly ouer-runne the country, and done their indeauors in all assaults, but to charge their lances against Don Sancho, it was not their intention: that is to say, to spoile towns, & to ruine poore innocents, who had no interest in great mens quarrels, they did it willingly, yet would they not attempt any thing against the heads, who might giue them impunity for all their infolencies, and could take reuenge of them, if they shewed themselves too eager enemies. So the troupes of France and Nauarre returned towards Pampelone, from whence some of the Noblemen of Castile went to D. Sancho, hauing made their peace.

26 The King D. Pedro finding himselfe in this danger, it made him to seeke a peace with Nauarre for some moneths: for he had many questions to decide with his Noblemen and Knights of Arragon and Cattelogne, who complained much of his fower disposition, and his tyrannous manner of gouernement, insuluing ouer the greatest, yea against his owne bloud, contrarie to all lawe and nature. For wee reade, that there were scarce two yeares expired, after the decease of his father, when as he forced his brother Don Laine, to whom the Ilands of Maiorca and Minorca, with other places adiacent, had bene giuen by testament, with the title of a king, to hold them of him, as fees depending of the Crowne of Arragon, and therfore he caused him to take an oath and do homage, as also for the Counties of Rossillon, Cerdagne, Conflans, Vallespiere, Colibre, Omeledes, Carlades, and for the rights of Montpellier: with promise for himselfe and his descendants Kings of Maiorca, to come to the Estates of Barcelona being called, and to deliuer the city of Maiorca, the towne of Perpignan, and the castell of Cerdagne, vnto the Kings of Arragon, whensoever they should demand them, in regard of which submissions and promises, the king Don Pedro did confirme these lands and portions to the king Don Laine his brother: for the which he would haue the Earles of Foix and Empurias, D. Dalmas of Rocabertin Vicount of Castellau, Raymond of Virgio, William Canet, Bernard Hugo Serralongue, Dalmais of Castellau, Ponce Zagardia, Arnaud Corfaccio, William Sans, with the Deputies of the Ilands of Maiorca and Minorca to become cautions. Sometime after picking a quarrell against the Nobilitie of Cattelogne, and their priuiledges, this king Don Pedro did so furiously assaile the Earles of Foix, Virgel, and Pallars, with the Vicount of Cardona, who were the most apparent, as hauing beleeged and taken them in Balaguer, he detained them long in a miserable prison, especially the Earle of Foix, whom he intreated vnworthily in the castell of Siurana. Moreouer, a little before this last warre of Nauarre, hee had attempted and executed great matters against the French, raigning in Italy, hauing employed the men and means of Arragon and Cattelogne, to the great discontentment and oppression of all his subiects, and hee was newly returned out of France, whether the warre of Naples and Sicily had drawne him, vpon the occasion which followeth.

27 The French hauing conquered Naples and Sicily, vnder Charles the first brother to Saint Louis, they committed many vnaccustomed infolencies among these nations, against the honor of women, with other exactions and spoiles vnder colour of Iustice: by reason whereof (as also by the iust iudgement of God, to whom without doubt the cruel deaths of Conradin, and of the Duke of Austria, whose heads King Charles had caused to be cut off, by the pernicious counsell of Pope Clement) the Sicilians did sollicite D. Pedro King of Arragon to pursue the right which he had vnto these Realmes, as husband to Q. Constance heire thereof, being daughter to king Manfred, promising to ayde and assist him with their persons and goods: he which did most labour in this pursuit was called Iohn de Proculla or Prochida, borne at Salerne, Phisition to the deceased King Manfred, who by his perswasions induced the king Don Pedro to affect this conquest: for the effecting whereof, he first made a secret league with Pope Nicholas the third, and with Michael Palaeologue Emperour of Constantinople, obtayning from the Pope a promise of Inuestiture

Infolencies of

Sicily.

Inueſtiture of the Realmes of Naples and Sicily. Martin the 4. being Pope after the deceaſe of Nicholas, the king ſent Hugh Maſuplana a Catalan to Rome, to found his diſpoſition, touching the confirmation or renewing of this League, and to intertaine him (for Martin was friend to Charles King of Naples) and to diſguiſe the cauſe of his Ambaſſadors voyage, he had charge to moue the Pope and the Conſiſtorie, to cōſonize Don Friar Raymond of Pegnaſort according to the aduice of a Prouinciall Councell held a litle before at Barcelona, by the Prelates of Arragon and Cattelogne. In the meane time D. Pedro did arme forty galleys with many ſhips, the which he cauſed to paſſe along the coaſt of Affricke vnder a colour of reſtoring Bouqueron king of Conſtantine in Affricke, who was expelled by his brother: and the better to couer his enterpriſe, the Ambaſſador beſought the Pope to take the Realme of Arragon into the protection of the Church, whileſt that the king D. Pedro ſhould be abſent in the warre of Affricke, and to demand leaue to exact a tenth of his Cleargie. The king was demanded by the Ambaſſadors of France, the reaſon of this great preparation, with offers, that if it were againſt the Infidels, King Philip their maſter would ayde him with all his forces, and withall proteſting, that if it were to prejudice Charles king of Naples, he would take it ill: to whom he made no other anſwer, but that he had meanes ſufficient to end the warre which hee had vnder-taken, without employing any others. To Arnaud Roger Earle of Palliers, who demanded of him, in the name of the whole Nobilitie, whether he meant to leade them, he made a ſharpe anſwer, that if his left hand preſumed to inquire too curiouſly of that which the right intended to do, he would cut it off. So the army parted from Tortoſa, being folli-cited by Nicholas Copula and Raymond Portella.

Sicilian towns
ſeag.

In the meane time the French were ſlaine thorough out all the townes of Sicily, with ſuch rage and hatred againſt the nation, as whereas they knew any women to be gotten with child by the French, they opened their wombes, and ſlue both mothers and children, for that they would not leaue any of their ſeed in the countrie. Onely one French-man called William Portocel Gouverneur of Galataphimia was let go vntouched, for the good opinion they had of his modeſtie and temperance. And then D. Pedro arriving at Palermo, he cauſed himſelfe to be crowned King, in the yeare 1281. King Charles being deſirous to be reuenged of this iniurie, he led an army againſt Meſſina, but he was repulſed into Calabria, without any effect. The king of Arragon left Queene Conſtance his wife in Sicily with three children: D. James who waſking of Sicily, D. Frederick and D. Tolant, eſtabliſhing a Councell of Eſtate, whereof the chiefe were Wiliam Gaſſeran a Catalan, Alain Leonisue, holding the place of chiefe Juſtice of Sicily, and chiefe author of their rebellion againſt the French, John Prochida, and Roger de Loria his Admiral, to whom hee appointed an army of 25. galleys: but he wold haue in either of them two Captains, one a Catalan, the other an Italian, the mariners ſhould be part Catalans, and part Italians, but the rowers ſhould be all Italians. Hauing thus ſetled the affaires of this Realme, hee returned into Spaine, where he had many matters to attend: for beſides open force, there paſt many ſcandalous books betwixt Charles King of Naples, and D. Pedro king of Arragon, ſo as not able to decide their quarrels neither by law nor armes, they challenged one another with a certaine number of Knights of either part: and this combat was allowed by the Pope, an vnworthy thing for a Chriſtian Prelate. The place being appointed at Bourdeaux, in the king of Englands country, a neuter-Prince in this cauſe. King Charles came at the day appointed, but he found not his aduerſarie. Wherefore hauing attended moſt part of the day in the place appointed for the combat, and ſeeing no man appeare, he returned. The King of Arragon who had onely an intent to circumuent his enemy by the expectation of a combat, and in the meane time diuert him from the war of Sicily, had ſtayed in a ſafe place, from whence he came vnkowne to Bourdeaux with great ſpeed, where attending vntill king Charles were parted, when he thought he was far enough off, he ſhewed himſelfe in the place of battell, as if hee had had a great deſire to fight, complaining that he had ſayled, where after he had made the proteſtations requiſit in the like caſe, he tooke an act of his preſence from Iohn Graile Senefhall of Guien (to whom he left his helmet, his target, his lance, and his ſword in witneſſe of his appearance, and that he had kept his faith and promiſe) he returned with the like ſpeed into Spaine: and

A and a litle before the French and Nauarrois forraged Caſtile, he arrived at Logrognio, where hee intertained a garrifon in fauour of D. Sancho, as we haue ſayd. For theſe ſubtilties, Pope Martin (who had ſucceeded Nicholas the 3.) being a French-man borne, did excommunicate the king D. Pedro, giuing his Realme of Arragon to Charles of Valois ſecond ſonne to Philip King of France, who with the Popes diſpenſation married Conſtance daughter to Charles Prince of Salerne, the onely ſonne to this Charles King of Naples, cauſing a Croylado to be preached againſt this king D. Pedro. Whileſt that Charles King of Naples was in Gaſcony, the king of Arragon's Admiral called Roger de Loria a Calabrois a very expert man in ſea-fights, came running along the coaſt of Italy, with 45. galleys, and many other veſſels, doing much harme: ſo as this army being diſcouered at Naples, approaching ſo neere the city, as the ſouldiers might be heard, prouoking the garrifon by iniuries and caſting of darts into the towne, Charles Prince of Salerne iſſued forth with 36. galleys, and ſome other veſſels againſt his enemies, where there was a furious fight, but the Admiral of Arragon was victor, who tooke and carried away nine galleys, with a great number of priſoners of note: and amongst the reſt Charles who would needes go forth againſt the will of the Popes Legat, and contrary to the commandement which his father had giuen him at his going into France, not to depart out of Naples, nor to hazard a battell, either by ſea or land in any ſort whatſoeuer. The deſire of glorie prouoked it, and brought him to this miſery, which coſt many Noblemen their liues, for the priſoners being brought to Meſſina, he beheld with his eyes the heads of 200. Gentlemen cut off, to reuenge the death of Conradin. His father being returned to Naples, found the affaires in a pittifull eſtate, and liued not long after. At his death there were two Legats in Sicile to treat of an accord with Queene Conſtance, who was a wife and religious Lady, but not able to draw her to any reaſon, they did aggravate the Excommunication againſt the King D. Pedro, and interdicted the Sicilians, the which did fo incenſe them, as running in a rage to the priſons where the remainder of the French were that had bene taken by Roger de Loria, they fought to enter to murder them: but the French made reſiſtance, ſo as theſe mutiners ſeeing there was no meanes to effect what they intended, they ſet fire to the priſons and burnt them all. After which there was an aſſembly of all the chiefe Magiſtrates of the townes of Sicile, to reſolue what was to be done with D. Charles Prince of Salerne, and nine other Noblemen which were priſoners with him, whereby they concluded, that after the example of Conradin, and the other Noblemen, they muſt all dye.

Reuenge of the death of Conradin of Sualce.

Whereuppon wee may not let paſſe an act of Queene Conſtance, full of pietie and courage: for this Princeſſe hauing ſent on a Friday morning, to aduertile Charles to thinke of the ſaluation of his ſoule, and that he was condemned to die after the ſame manner that Conradin had done: he answered, that hee tooke his death the more patiently; for that hee ſhould receiue it the ſame day that our Saviour Ieſus Chriſt had ſuffered. This anſwer deliuered to the Queene, ſhee ſayd, If it be ſo that the Prince takes his death ſo patiently by reaſon of that day, for my part I am reſolued to ſhew him mercie for his ſake, who the ſame day ſuffered death and paſſion for vs all. Whereuppon ſhee commanded he ſhould be preferred without any harme, letting the people vnderſtand (who did preſſe her to put him to death) that ſhee ought not in a matter of ſo great importance, and which might be the cauſe of great inconueniencies, reſolute nor execute any thing, without the priuity of the king her husband: and therefore ſhe commanded that Prince Charles ſhould be carried into Cattelogne to the king Don Pedro, to diſpoſe of him as he ſhould thinke fit by good aduice. This generous and Chriſtian-like act, is wor-thie of eternall prayſe, as the exceſſe which king Charles, through bad counsell, and an ill-governed paſſion, had committed againſt Conradin and other Noblemen his priſoners, is to be blamed and deſet. This Charles Prince of Salerne was afterwards king of Naples the ſecond of that name.

21 After the king D. Pedro returned out of France, expecting daily (by reaſon of the Popes cenſures, and his enterpriſes againſt Nauarre) to be ſet vpon by Philip k. of France, and Charles of Valois his ſon: and the Noblemen and Knights of Arragon & Cattelogne, being tyred by him in the former wars, & ill-intreated, as they thought, in their freedoms, (whereof

(whereof the townes and commonalties of his Countreys did also complaine) they did A also stirre vp troubles and seditions, and made an union together. The heads of the rebellion were, Symon of Virea the elder, D. Pedro Fernandes Lord of Isar, and D. Pedro of Ayerbio, both base brothers vnto the King, Pedro Cornel, Artal Alagon, Lope Fernex de Luna, Alfonso de Poffes, Sancho of Antillas, Gombald of Beneuent, and Symon of Vitrea the younger, all of Noble families, and moreover Lope William of Oteicia, Pedro Lourean Pegna, Gombald Transjet, Giles of Bidaure, Pero Gaces Nuez, who were Knights, whose predecessors had bene advanced by Kings. These hauing made a league with the people did promise and sweare to let the king and his sonne D. Alfonso, (who was his Lieutenant generally) vnderstand, that if they did not containe themselves within the limites of the lawes of the country, they would withdraw themselves from their obedience, and declare themselves enemies, and pursue them by armes that should seeke to breake them. The king had called, the Estates to Tarasone, and afterwards to Saragossa. There he intreated, promised, and did all he could to breake this vnion: but he was forced to yeeld, and therefore he granted vnto the Arragonois, the priuiledge which they call general, whereby the liberty which had bene somewhat restrained, was againe restored, the ancient maners of the Country, and customs of their Ancestors, fit for the country, put again in practice. And moreover, there were lawes made for their Kings, which they should be bound to obey. And for that they were in a mutine in some places, by reason of certaine Impositions layed vpon salt, the trafficke thereof was made free by the Estates. Notwithstanding all these things, the king refused the iudgement of the Iustice Maior of Arragon, the which was then exercised by Pedro Martinez Arasone, whom he deposed from his office: but soone after this dignity was fortified with stronger lawes. The like assembly was made at Barcelona, and to the same ends; where they obtained confirmation of their old statutes and customs, which they call Usuages. They of Valencia beeing called to the Estates of Arragon, would not appeare, pretending liberty to assemble apart. In this Realme of Valencia there was a Magistrate established, who was President of the Iustice, who should be an Arragonois, and should do right vnto the townes and Noblemen of that Realme, who enioy the priuiledges of Arragon: the first in this dignitie was Alfonso Martinez. In Ribagorça there was also a peculiar Iudge created at Grados, from whence the first peeples should go to Barbastro, or to the Iustice of Arragon, and the second to the king, or to Iudges deputed by him: but these last ordinances were made and executed in the yearre 1285, at the Estates held at Huesca, where as the king did preside. They being transferred to Zuzaria, the king beeing absent, John Giles Tarin Iustice Maior of Arragon was President, where it was sayd, that he was a lawfull Iudge, yea in causes commenced against the King: who beeing cited and not appearing, there were decrees made against him in many instances. In the end the king confirmed the decrees of the Iustice Maior, and whatsoever should be concluded by the Estates, the Deputies, and Councillors hauing giuen their suffrages. At that time the king Don Pedro spoiled his brother D. James king of Majorca, of the County of Rossillon, for that he had retired himselfe into France, and had made a League against him with king Philip, who had promised him the Realme of Valencia, after the conquest which he did hope to make thereof, and of the rest of D. Pedros country. In these combustions was the estate of Arragon about the returne of the king D. Pedro from the warre of Nauarre attempted with the Castilians.

29 As for D. Sancho Infant of Castile, he with all his followers had bene also excommunicated by Pope Martin the 4. The Arch-bishop of Seuille, the Deane of Tudele in Nauarre, and the Arch-deacon of S. James in Galicia were the denouncers thereof: wherefore it was concluded in *D. Sancho*s Council, to kill all those that should intimate or bring these censures: yet the Commissioners deputed by the Pope went on in their Commission, and did interdict all parts of Spaine, holding the Infants party. On the other side the fury of armes ruining the country, Queene Beatrice the widow of Portugal, D. Mary wife to the Infant, laboured to procure a peace, and to remedie those great miseries, at which time there was some hope that the king and his sonne should haue an interview: for the king was come to Constant, & the Infant to Guadacanal, but the Infants minions and bad Councillers did hinder it. The Ladies pursuing this holy enterprise, Don Sancho fell sick

A sick at Salamanca, and in such extremity, as the Physicians had abandoned him: the king in like manner fell sicke vnto death, whereby it seemed that God was highly offended against these miserable Princes, whose reconciliation was thus preuented. The king seeing his end drawing nigh, he gaue by his will, Seuille and Badajos, with the title of a Realm, to his sonne Iohn, with charge, that he should hold them of the Crown of Castile and Leon. To D. James his other sonne he gaue the Realme of Murcia with the same condition. He pardoned all such as had carried armes against him, except his sonne D. Sancho. In the beginning of a will of his made in November 1283, he makes great complaints of his aduersities, and doth much blame the kings of Portugal, Arragon, England, the Pope, and others, who had fauoured D. Sancho, cursing him and all his posteritie, and leaving heires of his Soueraigne Realmes, D. Alfonso and D. Fernand de la Cerde, one in default of the other, and if they dyed without issue, he gaue them to Philip king of France, and to his descendants: He gaue many other Legacies to his other children, to Churches, and to his Officers and domestique seruants. By another testament apart, made in the yearre 1284, he ordained, that his heart should be carried and interred on mount Caluarie in the city of Ierusalem, and his body in his city of Seuille or Murcia, in the which his Executors should please. He dyed in the yearre 1284, and was buried at Seuille, hauing reigned 34. years, 10. months, and 23. dayes.

This Prince was a president of the weaknesse and inconstancie of humane things, not only in the goods which they call of Fortune, but also of those of the mind, whereof he was well furnished as any Prince that hath bene before or since him, all which did him more harme then good: for neither vertue, knowledge, honour nor riches auayle not, if the blessing of God do not accompany them, but they rather ruine a man. And in truth this Prince may be tearmed miserable in all these things. He was a great and mighty king, but nothing did suffice him, by reason of his prodigality, and ill-measured bounty: he was neuer sincerely beloued of his subiects, by reason of his fower disposition and wilfulness, proceeding from too great a presumption of his knowledge: so as hee did neuer beleue any good counsell: It was the fruite of his Philosophie, the which had made him so overweening, as he presumed to controule the Author of Nature, saying, That if he had bin present at the Creation of the world, he should in many things haue bene of another opinion, with other such speeches full of impietie. By iudiciarie Astronomie, whereunto he was giuen beyond all reason, he had foreseene (as he thought) his adventures, the which made him affect the Imperiall dignitie, where hee purchased more dishonour then euer any Prince. This vanity made him cruell to his brother D. Frederick, and other Noblemen, to prevent the conspiracies which threatened him, but could not auoid them: the which he had done, if leauing these diuinations, hee had relied wholly vpon the providence of God, without any further search. But it is the will of God, the curious should haue this torment, alwaies to feare their misfortune, which they would know by damnable means, giuing effect to vanity, and to the spirit of error, against those that follow it. The Queene D. Beatrice his mother (who it may be was superstitious, and giuen to these impieties) had neuer any contentment after his birth, hauing vnderstood when hee was in his cradle, from a Grecian, who was a great Sorceresse, that he should bee deprived of his Realmes.

D. Sancho

D. Sancho the Braue, the fourth and last of that name, the 11. of Castile, and 32. of Leon.

*D. Sancho
of Castile's title*

In the yeare 1284. D. Sancho caried himselfe as king, hauing performed his fathers obsequies in the city of Auiia, where he was at the time of his decesse, where he mourned in shew, for that which he had long desired, as we may iudge by his actions. He commanded that D. Maria his wife should be called Queene, and their daughter called Elizabeth, beeing but two yeares old, to be declared and receiued heire of those Realmes, if he had no issue male: the titles which he gaue himselfe were, King of Castile, Leon, Toledo, Galicia, Seuille, Cordoua, Iaua, Murcia, Badajoz, and Algarbe. He came to Toledo with D. Maria, and there they were crowned. By a complot made with D. Pedro king of Arragon, D. Iohn Nugnes of Lara was dispossessed of the fort of Albarrazin, a free place holding of no man, the which was very preiudiciall to Castile: this place was afterwards given by the king D. Pedro, to a bastard sonne of his called D. Fernand, whome he had by D. Agnes Zapate. The Infant D. Iohn brother to the new king, with the helpe of some knights, which were fled out of Castile, thought to surprize Seuille: but the king posted thither with speed, & disappointed their desseignes. Being in that city, Ambassadors came to him from Aben Iosaph king of Maroc, to settle some order betwixt Affricke and Spaine, but the king D. Sancho being incensed, that the king of Maroc had come to make warre against him in his fathers fauour, answered his Ambassadors very sorely, saying, that he held his bread in one hand, and a staffe in the other, and that if any one would seeke to take away his bread, he would strike him with his staffe. The Ambassador, whose name was Abdalla, returned to Algezire, from whence they began to make roads into the territories of Medina Sidonia and Xeres, which caused the king D. Sancho to looke to his affaires: who for this cause began to make prouision of galleys and other vessels, in the sea townes of his Iurisdiction, and did entertaine a Captaine of Genoa, called Benet Zacharie with 12. gallies, to whom he gaue the port of S. Mary in propriety, vpon condition, that he should for euer entertaine one galley armed. This king hauing called a Court at Seuille, hee disannulled many priuiledges which were extorted in time of necessitie. Beeing returned into Castile hee disposed of matters of Iustice, and punished many which had bene rebels vnto him, causing some heads to be cut off.

These things past in the yeare 1284. about the end of which he had newes of the preparation which the king of France made to invade Cattelogne, by reason whereof, he and his vnkle D. Pedro of Arragon had an interview in Ciria, where they were moreouer aduertised that there was intelligence betwixt king Philip and him of Maroc, to make warre at one instant, the one in Cattelogne the other in Andalusia: wherefore beeing parted D. Sancho came to Burgos, to hold an assembly of the Estates.

D. Iohn Nugnes of Lara being dispossessed of Albarrazin, as we haue sayd, by Don Lopez Diaz de Haro, being the Commander, he put himselfe into Tudele, the which hee desired for Philip the faire king of Nauarre, against the king D. Pedro, and not onely repulled him, but also tooke great store of victuals and cattell which was brought to the enemies campe: for he had within it about 300. horse, and a great number of foote: so as D. Pedro seeing that he should do no good before Tudele, hee spoiled the countrie, and returned vnto his Realme, to defend the passage against the king of France, who came to assaile him: from whom the Earle of Artois, whome the Spaniards call Charles, and the French Robert, was sent to the king Don Sancho beeing at Toledo, to perswade him to set at liberty without exception the sonnes of his deceased Brother Don Fernand de la Cerde, who were

As were prisoners in the hands of D. Pedro King of Arragon; and then he intreated him not to succor the King of Arragon in the warre which the French King pretended to make against him, to whom the King D. Sancho made no other answer, but that he would send his Ambassadors to King Philip, to treat of those affaires: wherevpon he sent vnto him D. Martin Bishop of Calaurra, and D. Games Garcia of Toledo Abbot of Vailledolre, who found King Philip at the entry of the country of Cattelogne, with a great army, besieging Girone, who were but slightly entertained, and returned without any effect. They write that the Earle of Arthois being dispatched from the court of Castile, taking his leave, the King D. Sancho received a packet out of France: hauing opened it and read the letters, he sayd vnto the Earle that he had good friends in the court of France, who aduertised him of all that passed, intreating him to ioyne with them, and to become his friend: yet the Histories of France say, that this Earle of Arthois had bene before in Castile, after the suppression of the rebels of Nauarre, in the life time of King D. Alfonso, at which time this packet was brought, and not now: the which the Earle of Arthois hauing reported to the King it caused a great tumult and search in court. In the meane time the King D. Sancho made preparation to succor Xeres, the which was already inuested by the army of the Miralmumin of Maroc, where there were eighteene thousand horse Moores, or Arabian Affricans; and came from Toledo by Talauera and Merida to Seuille, whether the Moores made daily roads euen vnto the gates, the King D. Sancho hauing not yet sufficient forces to suppress them: but within few daies after there came vnto him about foure thousand horse, as well of the military orders of Spaine, as of Noblemen, with the which he made a sufficient army to goe to field. Hauing mustred his troupes, he marched towards his enemies, to whom hee presented battle, but the King of Maroc would not accept thereof: for besides the great forces at land which came daily to the King D. Sancho, hee had a mighty army at sea, which lay in the Port of Saint Mary, where there were about a hundred saile of great vessels. The King of Maroc raised his siege from Xeres, and afterwards they were made friends, hauing an interview at Pegna Ferrada, or according vnto some in Albuhera, where the King of Castile receiued a present of Jacob Aben Iosaph, of two millions of Maraudis of gold, then current. This peace was not pleasing to the Infant D. Iohn the Kings brother, nor to Don Lopes Diaz of Haro, who demanded nothing but warre. About the end of the yeere 1285, the Queene D. Maria was brought to bed in Seuille of a sonne, called D. Fernand, who succeeded the father in those realmes.

Philip the 3. King of France, and his sonne Philip the faire King of Nauar, being entered into Cattelogne, had taken Perpignan, ruined seuen and twenty townes and castles, & laied siege to Girone. The victuals for the campe were brought from Narbone to the nearest hauens and ports of Empurias, Roses and others, and from thence was carried a little space by land with a gard of horsemen. Which the King desiring to prevent and withall to take the treasor which he knew was brought to pay the souldiers, hee came and laied an ambush of fife hundred horse, and about two thousand foot betwixt the sea and the french campe: whereof the King of France, being aduertised by his spies, sent before, by the aduice of the Constable of France, three hundred choise men at armes, vnder his charge, who being come to the ambush, and discouered to be few in number, were presently inuironed and charged with great cries, by the Arragonis, who thought to defeat them, but the French who were come thither to fight, did encounter them in such sort, as although they were much inferior in number, yet they seemed more then equal in valour and courage.

The Arragonis animated by their King, who was present and fighting, behaved themselves valiantly, so as the one yeelding nothing vnto the other, the fight continued long without aduantage, vntill that the King D. Pedro being grievously hurt in the face with a Lance, retired himselfe out of the fight, wherevpon his men beganne to faint. Many of his horsemen escaped with him, but as for the footmen they were all cut in peeces, there were some horsemen slaine vpon the field, on either side, but most Arragonis.

The King D. Pedro hauing caused himselfe to be carried to Villa-franca, died soone after after of his wound. He had reigned nine yeeres, three monethes and foure daies; A generous Prince, but ambitious beyond all measure, being growne an irreconcilable enemy to the French, since the successe of the Island of Sicile, the which he left to D. Jaime or James his younger sonne.

D. Alphonso the third of that name, and the tenth King of Arragon.

<sup>3</sup> On Alphonso his eldest succeeded to the realme of Arragon, this yeere 1285. Don Pedro being aduertised by his Physitions, the chiefe whereof was Arnaud of Villeneuve (whose workes we haue but much curtailed by the Inquisitors) that he drew neere his end, he did sollicite his sonne D. Alphonso to hasten the conquest of Majorca, which he had undertaken, and did much desire; wherefore D. Alphonso presently after his fathers death, led the army to Majorca, and tooke the Island, joyning that of Majorca to the other titles of the Kings of Arragon. In this action the chiefe Commanders were D. Blasco of Alagon, Sancho of Antillas, Pedro Garces Nuez, Pedro Sefes, Blasco Ximenes of Aierbio, Simon Perez Andalsilla of Arragon: and of Cattelogne, D. Pedro de Montada, Raymond of Virgi and Maimon Plaigaman. Euen vpon the death of the King D. Pedro, there arrived in Cattelogne, Charles Prince of Salerno, called the halting, a prisoner, being conducted by Raymond Alteman, Simon of Estorion and William Ponce Catalans, who had bound themselves to the Infant D. James, who was appointed King of Sicile, to carry him into Cattelogne, or to loose their liues, swearing that if any came to rescue him, and that they found themselves too weake, they would kill him and cast him into the sea. You must vnderstand that one of the chiefe conspirators in Sicile against the French, called Alain Leontain, a councillor of Estate, and chiefe Iustice of the realme, which is one of the greatest dignities, staid not long before he received from the Arragonis, a worthy reward for his notable treachery, and immoderate appetit of reuenge: for being discovered that he sought to reconcile himselfe vnto the French, for some discontentment, he was sent prisoner to the castle of Siurane, from whence he neuer parted, being knowne to be a double traitor: and God brought him to this end, to shew that he detests those, that for their priuat passions seeke the ruine of Estates.

D. James King of Sicile was disposed by his death.

Alain Leontain Author of the Sicilian Exile, long a double traitor and his end.

Girona taken by the French.

The Conitable of France returning to the campe before Girona, he was received with all possible signes of joy: whereas soone after they had newes of the death of D. Pedro King of Arragon, whereof hauing aduertised the besieged that they should not continue obstinate; Raymond of Cardona, who commanded within the towne, demanded leaue to send one thither to vnderstand the truth, who brought him word that hee had seene the King his maister dead: wherevpon he yielded vp the towne to the French King, the souldiers and Inhabitants departing and carrying away what they could, except gold and siluer which they were to leaue, for the which they were serched. At this siege the plague fell into the campe, and the King himselfe grew sick, so as this warre ceased, and they began to thinke of their returne into France. The King had entertained certaine gallies of Pisa and Genoa, which hee now sent backe, hauing no more use for them.

Saying towards Italy, they were met by Roger of Loria Admiral of Sicile, who came to Cattelogne with fife and fortie gallies, to succour the King of Arragon his Maister, of whose death he was then aduertised. This man who was politike, and loath to loose any opportunity, hauing vnderstood from these captaines the Estate of the affaires in Cattelogne, and especially of the enemies army, he entertained all their fleet, and lead them backe towards Ampurias, where they found the remainder of the French fleet in the haven, whom they did sodainely set vpon and burne, all the souldiers and mariners hauing escaped, and ioyned with the rest of the Land-army. King Philip, who caused himselfe to be carried in a litter, was much grieved at this losse, and his sickness

A sickness did so increase, as he gaue vp the ghost in the towne of Perpignan, whether the armie came with great difficulty, the Arragonis hauing stoppt the passages of the mountaines, so as they were forced to make their way by the sword.

Death of Philip the third King of France.

Philip the first of that name, the fife and twentieth King of Nauarre.

<sup>4</sup> Philip his sonne, called the faire, who succeeded him, was both King of France and Nauarre, hauing a little before married D. Jean the heire of Nauarre. Of which marriage were borne three sonnes, Lewis Hutin, Philip the long and Charles the faire, all which three were Kings of France and Nauarre one after another, hauing no children. They had also two daughters, Joane who died young (who is not in the French Genealogies) and Isabel Queene of England, mother to Edward the third, who contended for the succession of the Realme of France against Philip of Valois.

Nauarre.

At that time 1286. the Realme of Nauarre was governed by a Gentleman called Clement of Launay in quality of Viceroy, who defended it against the daily inuasions of the Arragonis. A captaine of Nauarre, whose name was D. John Corbaran, hauing the charge of the frontier towards Arragon, was defeated and taken by D. Pedro Cornet, an Arragonis. The Nauarrois also entering into the country of Arragon, besieged Tiermas, but could not take it, yet they did great spoiles. About the end of the yeere there was a truce made betwixt these two Kingdomes, and a defence made not to molest one another vpon paine of death. There was also a truce concluded betwixt Philip King of France and Nauarre, and Don Alphonso King of Arragon, during the which they sought means to make a peace betwixt them, for the controuersies of Sicile and other places.

At 1286. Clement of Launay Viceroy of Nauarre.

The death of Philip the third King of France being knowne in Castille, the King D. Sancho sent backe the Archbishop of Calaoarra, and the Abbot of Valledolit, his Ambassadors, to Philip the faire his sonne, to seeke some meanes of an accord, for many considerations: one and the most important was, that the Kings of France, father and sonne had beene the meanes at Rome to stop the dispensations of the marriage which D. Sancho had made with D. Maria his cousin. These Ambassadors carried backe into Spaine: an enterview of both Kings graunted in the towne of Bayonne; yet they met not, for the King of France would not passe the mount of Marcan, and he of Castille staid at Saint Sebastian, sending their deputies to treat and end their quarrels. For King Philip there came Robert Duke of Bourgongne and others, for the King of Castille came D. Gutierrez Archbishop of Toledo, successor to the Cardinal D. Gonzalo, with the Bishops of Calaoarra, Burgos and others. The first demand which the French made, and whereon they did insist, was, that the King D. Sancho should leaue his wife D. Maria, to marry one of king Philips sisters, which should be either Marguerite or Blanche: which the Ambassadors of Spaine found to be out of reason: and hauing giuen aduice thereof vnto their King, who was neere, he was so much offended, as hee recalled them, and would not haue the conference to proceed any further. The Abbot of Valledolit, who was superintendent of the Kings reuenues, by this voyage fell into disgrace with his maister, and was accused to haue put this sauage demand into the Frenchmens heads: wherefore hee was straightly looked into, and dismist from all affaires. The King went from Saint Sebastian to Victoria, where the Queen attended him, from whence they past to Burgos, from thence he went to Saint James in pilgrimage. Passing by Sahagun, he caused the bodies of the King D. Alphonso the sixth, and the Queenes which werethere interred, to be removed.

Castille.

Conference of Deputies for the Kings of France and Castille.

His voyage being ended, hee honoured D. Lope Diaz de Haro, Lord of Biscay, with the dignity of high Steward, and Standard-bearer of the realme of Castille, giuing the surmountance vnto D. Diego Lope de Haro his sonne, with promise neuer to dispossesse them of their offices, so as they did serue him and his sonne D. Fernand faithfully, without affecting affecting any other parties, appointments or alliances, the which they promised for solemnly, upon paine of losing Biscay, and all they had in Castille and Leon: and the King gaue into the hands of D. Lope, for assurance of that which he had promised, most of the forts in Castille.

By means of these things D. Lope Diaz was made Earle the first day of the yeere 1287. with command ouer all the country, from Burgos vnto the sea. To D. Diego Lopes de Haro the Earles brother, was giuen the Government of the Moores frontier: about which time the marriage was made betwixt D. John the Kings brother, and D. Maria Diaz de Haro, daughter to the Earle D. Lope: who had a great desire to see the King D. Sancho diuorced from the Queene his wife, to haue him marry the daughter of Gaston Lord of Berne his cousin, hoping that the children which should come of that marriage, should inherit those realmes, and those which hee had had by Queene Mary should be excluded, for that the marriage was made without the Popes dispensation: but God did otherwise dispose. This Princeesse was brought in bed this yeere of her second sonne, called Alphonso, and then the King retired D. Jabel, heire of the Estate of Molina, whom her mother D. Blanch, sister to Queene Mary, would haue married to D. Alphonso King of Arragon. This great power and authority which the King had giuen to the Earle D. Lope, discontented many Noblemen of Galicia, but especially of Leon, so as hee was prest to abate this power, too great for a subiect, the which hee abused: but the King had no will to diminish any thing, wherefore hee tried to content them with good words: and in the meane time hee ordained, that the Earle D. Lope should goe into the Marches of Galicia, with good numbers of souldiers, to suppress such as would attempt any thing against his will. The Earle D. Lopes held a garrison at Astorga, and the King went another way to see his Nephew D. Denis King of Portugal, to reconcile him with D. Alphonso of Portugal, who held some places vpon the frontiers of Leon, where by reason of his quarrels hee kept some souldiers, whether also some banished men of Castille retired themselves, who made roades into the territories of Leon. The two Kings of Castille and Portugal met at the siege of Ronches, and tooke it by composition: by the which D. Aluaro de Luna, who had retired himselfe to D. Alphonso of Portugal, was restored to D. Sancho his fauour. At this siege the King of Portugal did counsel the King of Castille to humble D. Lope Diaz de Haro, who did abuse the authority which he had giuen him tyrannously, else it was to be feared there would grow great troubles in Castille.

This aduice was wel taken by the King D. Sancho, and from that time hee began to study by what meanes he might take away or diminish that extraordinary power, but it was too late: It is not the custome for such as are once mounted, to stoop. The Earle D. Lope finding the Kings intent, retired to Gaston of Berne his cousin, there to make some faction: where he had newes of the death of D. Aluaro de Lara his competitor and enemy, whereof he was exceeding glad, and returned into Castille, but hee found that the King had giuen his offices, and all that D. Aluaro had enioyed to his brother D. John Nages de Lara, so as D. Lope found himselfe preuented; whereupon hee debauched the Infant D. John his sonne in law, leauing the court much discontented. D. John made some roades about Salamanca; wherefore the King being in the towne of Carrion, the weeke before Easter, whether the Earle D. Lope Diaz came well accompanied, hee complained vnto him of the excesses which his sonne in law D. John had done, to whom the Earle answered proudly, that hee had not done any thing but what hee had aduised him; and that if hee would heare the Infants reasons, hee should goe to Valledolit, and hee would bring him to Cigales. This proud manner of speech of the Earles, seemed strange vnto the King, and increased his desire to punish them both: Notwithstanding hee went to Valledolit, and the Earle with his sonne in law came to Cigales, not daring to come in the Kings presence in any great towne. There the Deputies of either part did confer daily, at a place called Loueruela, whereas these iarres were somewhat reconciled: whereupon the King came towards the frontiers of Arragon, to treat with the King D. Alphonso touching the deliuey of his Nephewes, the sonnes of La Cerde, whereof hee was much sollicitated, euen by the Earle D. Lope Diaz.

Not

A Notwithstanding before the King D. Sancho could approach neere to Tarassone, where the King of Arragon was, the Earle had preuented him, who hauing spoken with the King of Arragon, hee reported vnto his maister, that hee found by the way, that the King of Arragon would not be pleased with this kinde of enterview, and therefore hee had no need to passe any farther. The Earle finding himselfe somewhat crost by the enterview of the King D. Sancho and him of Portugal, did also thinke that this would bee nothing fauorable vnto him.

6 As for D. Alphonso of Arragon, whom we haue left carefull to execute the charge which the King his father had giuen him, to dispossesse the King D. James his vnkle of the Islands of Majorca and Minorca: after the conquest thereof hee had brought backe his victorious army to Valencia, and there was receiued and acknowledged for King by the Valentians. Yet he was admonished by D. Bernard William Entenza and Symon of Virea, Ambassadors for the Estates of Virea, to come speedily to the assembly at Saragossa, where hauing sworn and promised the obseruation of the customes, rights and preiudices of the country, and receiued the oth of fealty from the deputies, he might lawfully take vpon him the title of King of Arragon, the which (said they) he might not vie before this act and ceremony, according to the ancient customes of Arragon. The King hauing giuen them audience at Moruedro, he answered them courteously, that hee would repaire thither with speed: and as for the royal title, hee had held it reasonable to take it, seeing hee had beene so saluted by the Archbishop of Tarragone, and by the Catalans and Valentians. Being come to Saragossa, hee tooke and receiued the oth, and was crowned by the Bishop of Huesca, in the absence of the Archbishop of Tarragone, to whom (by the Popes decree) this office doth appertaine, where he protested that hee held the realme as hereditary from his father, and was not bound to any. At this assembly of the Estates, which was in the yeere 1286, there grew great contention touching the reformation of the manners of courtiers, and the ordering of the Kings house, the noblemen and deputies of the Estates of Arragon maintayning that the knowledge thereof was incident to their charge; the King and his household seruants on the other side denied that there was either law or custome which tied the King or his followers to any such subiection.

D In the end it was concluded that the reformation of the court should bee made by twelve of the principal families (which they call in that country Mesnadas) the like number of Knights, foure Deputies of Saragossa, and one of either of the other cities the which should giue their voices in that case. This vnion of Arragon obtained a decree, that the King should haue certaine counsellors chosen, that is, foure of the chiefe Noblemen, which were D. Pedro d' Aierbe the kings vnkle, Pedro Cornel, Artal Alagon and Pedro Martines de Luna; foure knights of noble and ancient races, which were D. Fortun Sanchez Vera, Symon Perez Salanous, Symon Perez Vera, and Arnau de Castro, and foure of his household seruants: that is D. Gyles de Bedare, Rodrigo Sanchez Pomar, Alphonso de Castenou and Fernand Perez Pigna: Moreouer two knights for the realme of Valencia, two citizens of Saragossa, and one of either of the other cities of Huesca, of Tarassone, Jacca, Barbastro, Calatajub, Turul and Daroca: with a condition that whilst the King should remaine in Arragon, Ribagorça or Valencia, two of the noblemen, two of his household seruants, two Knights of Arragon, one of Valencia, and the foure Deputies of the realme of Arragon, should follow and reside in court, as counsellors appointed by the vnion, the which by the mouth of D. Fortun Sanchez de Vera, Sancho Martines Lacanella, and the Deputies of Saragossa, Huesca and Turul (who were sent to that end) protested that if hee did not receiue, obserue and maintaine these orders, they would seize vpon his reuenues, and of all the fees, offices and dignities of such noblemen as should contradict them: thus were the Kings of Arragon intreated in those times.

F This yeere the King restored D. Philip de Castro, sonne to his vnkle D. Fernand Sanchez, who as we haue sayd was cast into the riuer of Singa, as wel to the possession of the castle of Pomar, as to the rest of his fathers patrimony: and for that there were some remainders of Moores which stood out in the Island of Minorca, the King tooke after went thither with an army in person, and densed the whole country, having forced them to fly into the castle of Agaie, and to compound, from whence according to the treaty, A they were transported into Affrike, by D. Raymond Marques and Berenger Majol. In the meane time King D. Alphonso did sollicite the Pope by his Ambassadors to receive him into fauour, which the French did hinder: for besides the rights, pretended by Charles of Valois, and granted to him by the Pope, to the realme of Arragon, and lands annexed, which were interdict, there was moreover, that not onely the two yong Princes D. Alphonso and D. Fernand de la Cerde were detained prisoners by the King of Arragon, but also Charles, called the Limping, sonne and heire to Charles of Aniou, King of Naples and Sicile: for whose release Philip the father and sonne, Kings of France, had bene earnest solicitors, and taken armes, and even at that instant Philip the faire did presse the Kings of Castille and Arragon, and in regard of Charles the Limping, Edward King of England did labour to make a peace betwixt him and the Kings of Arragon and Sicile brethren. In the meane time there was continual warre in Italy, whether Robert Earle of Arthois had bene fene, who with the aduise of a Cardinal the Popes Legat, and Mary Princeesse of Salerne, wife vnto Charles, who was prisoner, gouerned the realme of Naples. They were then vpon termes of a good accord, when as these Gouernours hauing sent a great army into Sicile, vnder the command of Renaud del Balso, Earle of Auellin, tooke the towne of Cattanea; whereof King D. Alphonso being aduertised, he sent backe Roger de Loria Admiral of Sicile, to succor and defend his brothers country. The Earle of Auellin hauing made this prize, hee sent the galleys, which had transported his army, backe to Naples, to bring the rest of his troups which were yet on land: and at the same instant, Guy of Montfort, Earle of Langillare, with the Earles of Boullen and Flanders, hauing leauied men in Tuscany, were ready to imbarke vpon the bankes of Sienna, when as Roger de Loria the Admiral arrived in the Italian seas, who hauing descouered the fleet which went to transport the fouldiars at Naples, hee pursued them, and tooke them easly, hauing none to make any defence, and soone after hee espied about faxy galleys sayling towards Sicile, which was the army of those French Noblemen aboue named, which had imbarqued in Tuscany, whose Admiral was called Arrighin, a Genouois. Roger charged them couragiously, and put them to rout, without any great difficulty, for the fouldiars in the French fleet could fight better at land then at sea: the Commanders were taken, all which paid their ransoms, except the Earle of Montfort, D who was detained prisoner, and there died.

Charles of Valois yielded up his right to Castile.

These two victories were the recovery of Cattanea the which was yielded to the Arragonois, by the Earle of Auellin, who with his companions, returned with their bag and baggage to Naples. By this meane the treaty of peace which Edward made was broken, but he desired not, vntill he had drawne them to these conditions: That Charles should be set at liberty, paying twenty thousand, or (as some say) thirty thousand markes of siluer for his ranfome. That he should procure the Pope to inuest King James in the realme of Naples, that he should take away the Interdict, and absolue the two brethren of Arragon, and that he should be a meane to make Charles Earle of Valois quit the interest he pretended in Catalogne, by vertue of a donation made vnto him by Pope Martin: for the execution whereof hee should haue three yeeres time, and in case he could not performe them, hee should returne againe to prison: for assurance whereof, hee should giue his three sonnes, Lewis, Robert and John in hostage, with forty gentlemen of the country of Prouence. The which Charles hauing promised, and the hostages deliuered, he was released foure yeeres after his taking. He came into France, and labored in vaine with Charles of Valois, who would neuer relinguish the title hee had to Catalogne. Pope Nicholas also would not yeeld vnto that which Charles had promised touching the realme of Sicile, the which hee sayd was a fee belonging to the church, wherefore he past speedily into Italy with good troups of men, led by Emery of Nabone. Being in Tuscany, he spent some time to fauour the Guelphes party, against the Giblins, the which were two frantike factions, afflicting Italy since the dissolution betwixt the Popes and Emperor Frederic continued among the Italians without subiect or fence, with horrible examples of Impiety and inhumanity. The French which desir these quarrels, held the Guelphes faction.

Charles

A Charles being come to Rome, Pope Nicholas the fourth crowned him in the yeere of our Lord 1289. King of both Siciles, from the which he could not be dissuaded: where- with they Arragonois held themselves much wronged, and fell to armes more violently then before. Suritez affirms that this yeere King Charles the Limping came and pretended himselfe armed betwixt the valley of Inguera and the hill of Panizage, making a shew as it he came to yeeld himselfe to the King of Arragon, according to the treaty, and that hee returned sodainly to Perpignan. The Calabrois, neighbours to Sicile, were daily solicited to revolt; the which the Inhabitants of the Cathenzan did, who gaue themselves to King James: wherevpon King Charles being accompanied by the Earle of Artois, led an army thither, to succor which place, King James being come with his Admiral, and hauing landed his men, hee was incouraged and defeated by the French, and forced to saue himselfe in his galleies, yet without any great losse; wherefore the Arragonois desiring to diuert this siege, they sailed towards Gayete, where hauing seized vpon a hill neere vnto it, they gaue many assaults, but without any effect. King Charles, and the Earle of Arthois, leauing sufficient troups to entertaine the siege of Cathenzan, marched towards Gayete, being resolu'd to giue bataille to the Arragonois: but they kept themselves from fighting, being lodged in a place of aduantage and neere vnto their galleies.

There was a mediation for a truce betwixt the two kings and the realmes of Sicile and Naples, the which King Charles yielded vnto for foure yeeres, against the aduice of the Earle of Arthois, who held the victory in his hand, assuring himselfe to force the enemy to fight: wherevpon hee grew much discontented, and leauing Italy, returned into France with his troups; vpon this truce Cathenzan was yielded. This first conquest which the kings of Arragon made out of Spaine, was the cause of great broyles, warre and ruines in Christendome, for which they chiefly finaried, whereof the Popes were the subiect, as they stood well or ill affected to those Princes, of whose miseries, and of their ruines they were secure spectators, being defended from all danger through the opinion of their holinesse and authority.

At the death of Pope Martin, his successor Honorius the fourth, had settled and confirmed D. James of Arragon, and absolued the King D. Pedro, but Pope Nicholas the fourth, maliciously and without any feare of the shedding of Christians blood, did kindle a new warre betwixt the French and Arragonois, whereas hee would not crowne Charles King of Naples alone, but of Naples and Sicile together. D. James of Arragon holding Sicile at that time, at his coronation hee tooke the armes which the realme hath since carried, which are an Eagle sable in a field argent, the which Manfred was wont to beare, and the bends geules in a field Or of Barcelona.

8 The King of Castille being solicited, and much troubled to resolu'e vpon the delivery of his Nephewes of Cerde, detained in Arragon, and to recompence them in such sort as his souerainty might remaine entire and peceable to him and his successors, hee sent to that end Ambassadors to Philip the faire, King of France, being at Lions: but what they could not then effect by treaties and negotiations, occasion did afterward bring to passe, for there happened a great excele in the court of Castille, wherevpon ensued the deliuey of the Infantes of Cerde: the which notwithstanding was as much displeasing to the King of France, who had pursued it, as to him of Castille, who feared it, and avoided it all hee could. A most dangerous freedom for them that were deliuey, but of the restraint of their persons, as shall appeere.

The King Don Sancho being at Alfaro, with the Queene his wife, Don Gonzalo Archbishop of Toledo, with many other Prelats and Noblemen of his realmes, hauing alwaies a desire to restraine and punish the pride of the Earle Don Lope Diaz de Haro, and of the Infant D. Iohn his sonne in law, who were there present, hee sayd vnto them, that if they would not remaine both prisoners, they should deliuey vp the forts which they held within the realm, whereat the Earle and D. Iohn grew into such choller and rage, as beside words of contempe which they vsed, they laid their hands vpon their swords before the King their Lord, threatening to kill them that should offer to lay hands vpon them, them, and called to their friends for aide : but instantly all the Noblemen and Knights A there present, drew their swords and slue the Earle vpon the place, whose right hand was cut off at the first blow (this was the reward for the seruice he had done in raying D. Sancho to the crowne) the Infant D. John did hurt D. Sancho Martines de Leyua, and Gon. calo Gomes de Mancanado, and made great resistance, by reason hee was somewhat spa- ralled, for that he was the Kings brother : but when he saw his father in law slaine, he be- ganne to flie for safety towards Queene Mary, who staid the King (that pursued him with the rest) from killing him with his owne hand. Becing taken hee was put into a straight prison and fettered in the towne of Logroño, from whence the King went with some troupes, to Treuigno and tooke it, and after that the castle of Haro. Queene Mary remaying at Saint Dominick de la Calçada, shee was visited by the widow of B the Earle that was slaine, whom the King D. Sancho let vnderstand, that her husbands rashnesse had brought him to that desalter, aduising her to perswade D. Diego Lopes de Haro her sonne to lay downe armes, and not to minister any further occasion of trouble that if he did containe himselfe within the duty of a subiect, the King would forget what was past, and both cherish and honour him, as his predecessors had benechouered. This Lady promised to doe her best endeavor for a peace, but shee did the contrary: for shee ceased not to incense her sonne, who was full of rage and desire of reuenge: so as hee retired into Nauarre, with his sister Donna Maria Diaz, wife to the Infant D. John, who was prisoner, where hauing left her, hee past into Arragon to the King Don Alphonso, whether also came Gascon, Lord of Bearn, who was no lesse desirous to reuenge the death of the Earle his cousin. These Noblemen wrought in such sort, as the King C Don Alphonso, let Don Alphonso and Don Fernand, Infants of Cerde, at liberty, who had bene detained ten yeeres in the castle of Xatua: and the King sending for them to la- ce, hee caused D. Alphonso the elder to take vpon him the title of Castille and Leon, to whom D. Diego Lopes de Haro did instantly doe homage, and acknowledged him for his soueraigne King.

The King D. Sancho being aduertised of these things, was much discontented, and sought to dispossesse D. Diego Lopes of all his lands. Parting from Victoria, whereas the Queene was brought in bed of a sonne, who was called D. Henry, hee came to Vrdugna, the which hee tooke, and then hee forced la Bastida and Ocio in Rioje, where they had pro- claimed D. Alphonso de la Cerde. The King D. Sancho being in this perplexity, Anab. D sadors came vnto him from Philip King of France and of Nauarre, who concluded an enterview of the two Kings at Bayone. Thether also came Ambassadors from Iacob Aben Joseph King of Marock, to renew the alliances past. D. Diego Lopes Gouvernor ge- nerall of the Moores frontiers, brother to the King D. Sancho could grieve him, in his death, beganne to grow fearefull, and to fortifie himselfe within Carmone, and not withstanding all the promises and assurances, which the King D. Sancho could giue him, hee could not bee satisfied: so as hee was forced to passe into Arragon, where his Ne- phew was, who died there soone after his vnles arriual: wherevpon the Estates of Bis- cay, being without a Lord, fell into great combustions.

The King of Castille sent Don Diego Lopes de Salcedo thether, who tooke all the ca- stles and forts of the country, except the towne of Vnquera, the which was so well de- fended by the Lord thereof, as all the batteries and assaults which Salcedo could giue, could not force it. The King D. Sancho being much perplexed at these broiles, came to Burgos, whether hee caused the Infant D. John to be brought and put into the castle, & being confident that he should haue warre with Arragon, hee sought to fortifie himselfe by Portugal, wherefore hauing sent to intreat D. Denis his Nephew for an enterview, they met at Sabugal.

There D. Sancho demanded aide against the King of Arragon, and made a relation vn- to the King of Portugal of all that had past betwixt him and his subiects in Castille. A- bout that time the king D. Denis had by his wife D. Isabel of Arragon one daughter, F named D. Constance, who was afterwards married to the Infant D. Fernand of Castille. Afterwards the king D. Denis had by her the Infant D. Alphonso, who was king of Portu- gal. Others adde a daughter named Isabel.

The

A The warre which the Nauarrois had against them of Arragon, gaue some respite to that betwixt Arragon and Castille, for King Philip intertaining strong garri- sons of French in Nauarre during the pretensions of Charles of Valois in Cattelogne, there was no truce could hold, but they were still at blowes, the French and Nauarrois taking from the Arragonis the towne of Sauveterre, in the yeere 1289. The yeere following 1290. Queene Isabe of France and of Nauarre was brought in bed of a sonne, named Lewis, who was heire of both realmes, and surnamed Hurin.

This yeere was the enterview betwixt Philip King of France and D. Sancho of Castille at Bayone, little fauorable to the Infants of Cerde, for the King of France being iealous that they were aided and supported in their quarrels by the King of Arragon, whom hee B loued not, abandoned the, and made a strict league with him of Castille, yea in such sort, according to the Spanish Histories, as to take away all occasions of quarrell betwixt them hee did againe renounce in fauour of D. Sancho, all the right hee had to the Realme of Castille. The King of Arragon desirous to cometo some accord with the French, employed Edward King of England, who vied great diligence to reconcile them, as we will see. After the conference of Bayone, the King D. Sancho returning by Gui- pulcoo he granted priuiledges for the foundation of Tolouse, Segure and Villefranche, townes in that country.

C During these broiles, the inhabitants of Badajos, by meanes of a quarrell betwixt two factions, reuolted against the King D. Sancho, and embraced the party of D. Alphonso de la Cerde, who intituled himselfe King of Castille. The Bejarans and Portugalois, fac- tions among the inhabitants of Badajos, fell to great contention among themselves, for that the Portugalois against all right had vlturped many possessions belonging to the Bejarans, through the fauour of the King D. Sancho: whereof many complaints being made by them that were dispossessed, the King commanded Iustice should be done them, and that they should bee restored to their goods: the which being decreed, they that were in possession would not obey: wherefore the Bejarans hauing taken armes, and slaine many of their aduersaries, and chased the rest out of the towne, they recovered their owne in this manner: but the excess and violence which they vied was such, as feare to bee severely punished, as they deserved, they seized vpon the high towne, and being fortified there, they proclaimed D. Alphonso King of Castille and Leon.

In the beginning the King D. Sancho sent the Maisters of the Knights of Saint Iames, Calatrava and Alcantara, with the priors of Templers and Saint Iohn, who wrought in such sort as they retired the Bejarans from their folly, with assurance of their liues, but afterwards the King neglecting his faith promised by his Lieutenants, caused this people to be cruelly murdered, to the number of foure thousand, sparing neither wo- men nor children, for the which hee was iustly blamed.

There was also an other massacre at Talauera, for the like faction; proclaiming D. Alphonso de la Cerde for King of Castille, whereas one of the ports of the rownes is called at this day Quartos, for that there were about foure hundred of the chiefe inhabitants slaine there. The continuall griefe wherein hee was by reasons of these difficulties, both at home and abroad, made him to commit these outrages, contra- rie to all reason, the which was no signe of magnanimitie, besides, that the furies (twice may so say) by reason of his impetie and disobedience towards his father did pursue him.

In the yeere of our Lord 1291. Queene Mary was brought in bed of her fourth sonne, who was named D. Pedro, and the warre being now begonne with Arragon, the King D. Sancho came to Cuenca, and sent good troupes against D. Iohn Nugues de Lara, who spoiled the countries of Cuenca and Alarcon, who were defeated, and many Ensignes and Guidons carried to Valencia, whereas the king of Arragon and D. Diego Lopes de Haro were: these with other discontents made the King to fall into a double Quartane, which brought him in danger of his life. In the meane time the King of Arragon, D. Diego Lopes and D. Iohn Nugues being returned to Albarrazin, they did ouerrunne the territories of Molina, Sigüenza, Atienza, Berlanga and Almazan, where they committed great spoiles, and carried away a great booty finding no resistance. Nugnes was sed with hope to recouer Albarrazin. The Queene who was come to A Cuenca, to see the King her husband sicke, wrought meanes to winne Don Iohn Nugnes de Lara, whom they had often attempted to draw vnto the Kings seruice, but hee trusted him not, but now hee was perfwaded, vpon a promise to giue in marriage to his sonne, called also D. Iohn Nugnes, D. Isabel, the heire of Molina, and the Queenes Neece, the which was performed: but hauing his head euer fraught with ieaiousie and distrust, hee was so easily induced to belecue any aduertisement, as hee was still ready to dislodge so as the King beeing at Palenca, and discontented with D. Nugnes carriage, beganne also to distrust him. And for that hee had need of capitaines, hee drew the Infant Don Iohn his brother out of prison, in the yeere of our Lord 1291. to employ him against his rebels, hauing caused him to take a new oth, to be faithfull vnto him, and to his sonne D. Fernand, whose hands hee caused them all to kisse, as to the heire of the crowne. From Palenca hee went in pilgrimage to Saint Iames, and by the way reduced vader his obedience *D. Arragon.

Peace betwixt
France and
Arragon.

The same yeere a peace was concluded betwixt the Kings of France, Naples and Arragon, the Ambassadors of these Princes being assembled with the Popes Noncio at Taracon, at the instance of Edward King of England. For the King of Arragon came D. Nugnes Mataplanc Bishop of Sarragossa, Raymond Anglesol, Berenger Puchert, William Lunfort, and Bernard William Puello all Lawiers, who treated and agreed vpon these conditions. That the donation, made by Pope Martin to Charles of Valois, of the realme of Arragon and the appurtenances, should bee voided and of no force, paying a tribut of thirty ounces of gold yearly to the Church of Rome. That the Island of Majorca should bee restored to the lawfull Lord, vpon condition that hee should acknowledge the King of Arragon for his soueraigne. That the Arragonois should depart out of the Island of Sicilie, and leaue the free possession vnto Charles King of Naples. That D. Alphonso King of Arragon should bee at Rome on Whitsonday that present yeere, & lead an army against the Infidels. That he should perfwade his brother D. Iames, and his mother D. Constance, to quit the realm of Sicilie, or else to make war against them.

These were the principall Articles of this peace the which the Arragonois held infamous, accusing their King of impiety towards his mother, and treason to his brother: yet it was concluded and signed. And for the confirmation thereof, the bishop of Sarragossa and Berenger Puchert went to Rome. Some doubt whether the full conclusion thereof were made during the life of King D. Alphonso, or at the entrance of the King D. Iames: for D. Alphonso died about this treaty, as hee made preparation to marry the daughter of Edward King of England, called Leonora: yet it is likely this peace was made in the life time of King D. Alphonso, yea some Authors affirme, that King Charles the Limping and he met in the valley of Lunquera, either of them being accompanied with twelve gentlemen onely, who carried no other armes then their swords, and that there they ratified and signed this accord: as for the effects and execution thereof, it is credible they followed in the time of his successor. King D. Alphonso died in the feuen & twentieth yeere of his age, hauing reigned fife yeeres and feuen monthes. Being nere his end he would bee attired in the habit of Saint Francis, for an opinion which reigned then, that there consisted some great vertue in that weed, and so hee was carried to the conuent of Franciscans at Barcelona.

About that time the King of Granado, had conference with the gouernor of the frontier of Castille, for the King D. Sancho being called D. Fernand Perez Ponce de Leon, and renewed the treaty and league with Castille, for the confirmation whereof there was a Moorish knight sent to the King to Burgos. Ioseph Aben Iacob had succeeded his father Iacob Aben Ioseph, in the realme of Maroc, since the yeere of our Lord 1285, hee hauing reigned fife and twenty yeeres, with the reputation of a generous Prince, and a good Iusticer. This yeere hee past into Spaine, and came to besiege Bejar, but hee could not take it, wherefore hee returned into Affrike with little honour. Meaning to returne some time after into Spaine with greater forces, hee could not passe, being slayed by the dece

A of Castille, which was great and mighty, for feare whereof hee stayed vpon the banks of Tanger, for Benoist Zachary, Admiral of Castille, had taken threene galleys from him: by fauour of which victory the King D. Sancho marcht into Andalusia, to make an enterprise vpon Tariffe.

By the way hee conferred with D. Denis King of Portugal, made a new league with him, and a future marriage was concluded betwixt D. Fernand of Castille and D. Constance of Portugal, who were both very young. And for the fulfilling of all promises in due time, there were townes and castles deliuered in pawne of either side, yet the King D. Sancho had no aide from him of Portugal, in this expedition. Being come to Seulle, and hauing their ordained what was needfull for the siege, Tariffe was battered, and furiously assaulted, and in the end taken, the gard whereof was giuen to D. Roderigo, mai-ster of the Calatraua. A little before a marriage had beene treated of by Ambassadors, betwixt Don Iames the new King of Arragon, and the Infant D. Isabel of Castille, daughter to D. Sancho, being onely nine yeeres old. For confirmation whereof, pacification of the troubles, and other alliances, the two Kings of Castille and Arragon, met together in Calatrabub, in the yeere of our Lord 1292, but the marriage tooke no effect.

For as much as D. Iohn Nugnes de Lara the elder, continued still to trouble the realm, the King D. Sancho hauing taken Canette and Moya from him, hee forced him to retire into France, whether Ambassadors were sent soone after, to renew the league with King Philip, Don Sancho fearing that by some sinister reports hee might bee diuerted from his friendship, Don Iohn Nugnes being absent, Don Isabel of Molina his daughter in law, died without any children, whose inheritance fell to the Queene Donna Maria her aunt. The Infant D. Iohn carrying still a hatred in heart against the King his brother, rebelled againe, ioyning with Don Iohn Nugnes de Lara the younger; and drawing vnto his partie many Knights, but the King pursued them in such sort, as D. Iohn de Lara was forced to yield vnto his mercy, and the Infant to flee into Portugal.

11 About that time D. Alphonso Perez de Guzman lived in great reputation in Spaine, being a wise and valiant Knight, who had long serued the Mirabimim Aben Iacob of Maroc and his father, leading their armies in qualitie of Lieutenant generall in the warres which they had against the other Moores of Affrike, where hee had wonne honour and great riches, with the which being returned into Spaine hee purchased much land and great Seigneuries. This knight and Donna Maria Alonso Cornel gaue beginning to the family of the Dukes of Medina Sidonia, famous in our time in Spaine, the Lords whereof in the beginning intituled themselues Earles of Niebla. To this D. Alphonso Perez de Guzman the King D. Sancho gaue the gouernment of Tariffe, the which hee promised to keepe safely with lesse charge by two third parts then the Master of the Calatraua had done. The Earle Don Iohn Nugnes de Lara hauing continued some time in France, had meanes to make his peace with the King and to returne into Castille, where they did presentlie employ him against the Infant Don Iohn of Castille, and Don Iohn Alphonso of Albuquerque, who with many other of their confederates spoiled the whole countrie of Leon: but in an encounter hee was defeated and taken: afterwards being but slightly garded, hee found meanes to escape, and came to the court at Toro, whereas Queene Mary was deliuered of D. Beatrice her daughter, in the yeere of our Lord 1293. The King Don Sancho being aduertised that Mahumet Mir Almas Lemi King of Granado was like to make soyme attempt, hee sent the Earle Don Iohn Nugnes de Lara, with Don Iohn Nugnes his sonne, and Don Nuzno Gonzales vnto the frontier. The Earle of Lara the father being come to Cordoua died.

E This motion of the Granadin Moores was but an idle brute, wherefore the troups returned. And for that Don Denis King of Portugal did receiue the Infant Don Iohn of Castille and the other rebelles, the King D. Sancho sent him word, that according to their capitulations, hee could not giue any retreat vnto his enemies, and therefore hee intreated him to cause them to depart his Countrie with all speed, the which hee did.

D. John of Castille brings the Moores into Spaine against the King his brother,

Cruelty of D. John of Castille.

The Infant D. John going to sea, meaning to passe into France, was driven by a storme A to Tanger, from whence hee went to kisse the hands of the Miralmunin Aben Isach, who entertained him courteously, and hauing conferred with him of the affaires of Spaine, knowing that he was desirous to annoy the King of Castille his brother, hee offered him fise thousand horse to make the enterprise of Tariffe, the which D. John did willingly accept, returned into Spaine, and besieged Tariffe, thinking to finde it vnfortified, but D. Alphonso Perez de Guzman had wisely provided, and defended it valiantly. It is not knowne by what accident a sonne of D. Alphonso Perez was fallne into the Moores hands: but some Authors write that D. John seeing there was no meanes to take this place by force, hauing demanded a parle, hee led this child vnto the ditch, and told the father, who was vpon the walles, that if hee did not deliuer the fort, hee would cut his sonnes throat: wherevnto D. Alphonso answered, that the towne was the Kings, who had giuen it him to keepe, and that it was his duty to defend it: as for his sonne, hee might doe what hee pleased, adding moreouer, that to let him vnderstand that he ment not to preferre the loue of his house, before that of his Prince, and the crowne of Castille, hee would rather giue a knife, if hee needed one, and at the same instant threw him his sword from the walles, and so retired to his lodging.

The Infant Don John incensed at this disdainfull answer, presently caused this poore Innocents head to be cut off: at which spectacle the souldiers which were vpon the walles gaue a great shout, the which was heard by Don Alphonso Perez, being at the table with his wife: whereat being moued, hee tooke his armes, and commanded them to follow him.

Being come to the place where they had made this noyse, hee beganne to incourage the souldiers, saying that hee was there to succour them, if they were prest, thinking it was some assault which the enemy gaue vnto the towne: but the souldiers told him that no man prest them, and reported vnto him the cruelty which they had seene executed vpon his onely sonne: If it bee no other thing, sayd Don Alphonso, bee carefull of your gard, and so returned without any outward shew of alteration, and without speaking any thing to his wife, hee sat downe at the table with her. This is honour amongst the Spaniards for one of the most generous acts in this house of Guzman that hath bene seene in Spaine. The Moores and their captaine Don John, seeing that they had to deale with resolute men, rayed their siege, and returned into Africke. Heerevpon the Miralmunin deliuered vpon Algezire to the King of Granada, for that the enterpraying of so great a garrison was both chargeable and preiudiciall vnto him. Thus the Kings of Maroc were dispossessed of all they held on this side the sea.

Soone after there arriued in Spaine the Infant Don Henry, sonne to the King Don Fernand the third, and vncle to this King D. Sancho, being freed from a long imprisonment with the French at Naples. Hee was well receiued, and did accompany the King into Biscay, whereas D. Diego Lopes Dias, being come out of Arragon, had caused some troubles, the which were pacified by the Kings presence. The country did then belong vnto D. Maria Lope de Haro, wife vnto the Infant D. John, who was banished out of Castille. The King being returned to Vailledolit, and from thence to Alcalá de Henares, he sell sicke, which made him to dispose of the affaires of his realme: hee left Don Fernand his sonne and successor, vnder the government of the Queene Donna Maria, to whom hee would haue all the Noblemen which held the chiefe dignities, and others which had charges within the realme, swear: wherevnto hauing obeyed in his presence, hee caused himselfe to be earried to Madrid, and from thence to Toledo, where hee died in the yeere of our Lord 1295, hauing reigned cleuen yeeres, and was buried in the great church of that city.

Whilest these things past in Castille, the realme of Nauarre was gouerned in the name of King Philip and of the widow D. Lane, by a French Knight called Hugh of Constans, after the accustomed manner, notwithstanding the great Estates of the Realme, governments and other charges, were for the most part giuen to the Nauarrois, all which were entertained with the Kings money, and then they made their accounts.

A accompts by Liures, Solz, and Deniers, after the manner of France. Aboue all things the frontiers towards Arragon were carefully garded, in which country in the latter wars they had made a great breach, and taken many places which they held by the treatie of Tarascon, or at the least in making a peace there was no mention made of yeelding them vp. Diego Sanchez de Garritz being Merino or Prouost of Pampelone, the towne was set on fire in the night by Symon of Ardaiz, Michel of Alcanegui, and Garci-Sanchez, men of bale condition, desirous to do ill, wherewith many houses were burnt: these men being taken, were hanged. The Gouvernor did fortifie many places and houses within the realm, especially vpon the frontiers, and caused the English to dislodge out of the country, about the yeare 1295, by reason of the ciuill warres betwixt the kings of France and England: B vnto that time continued the League betwixt France, Nauarre, and Castille, which was vnto the decease of the king D. Sancho: but then by reason of the factions which were reuiued betwixt his children and them of Cerdes, all leagues were broken.

D. Iames the 2. of that name, 11. king of Arragon.

12 IN Arragon presently after the death of King D. Alphonso, D. Pedro his brother assembled the Noblemen and Deputies of the Townes at Sarragossa, to consulte least the Realme should receiue some preiudice, during the absence of the king Don Iames his elder brother: thither came Don Symon of Vitea, Bernard William Entenza, Pedro Cornes, Philippes Fernandes de Castro, Athou de Foset, John Ximenes of Vitea, Sancho Antillas, Artal and Blasco of Alagon breethren, Lope Perence, Pedro Martinez, Roderigo Ximenes de Luna, Gombald Entenza and others. The king being arriued at Sarragossa, hee was there receiued and crowned, hauing sworn and promised the obseruation of the rights and priuileges of the Country: protesting that hee tooke possession of his fathers kingdom, belonging vnto him by right, as the elder, and not as an increase by reason of his brothers death, the which hee declared, to the end he might keepe his interest to the Realme D of Sicile, against his brother Don Frederick, who murmured, that the intention of the deceased king was to leaue him this Iland for his portion, being discontented at the peace concluded with Charles king of Naples and the French: the which D. Iames desired might take place, confirming it as soone as he came to the crowne, seeking by all meane to haue peace with the French, but especially with the Sea of Rome, held at that time by Boniface the 8. who then did much fauour the French king.

13 By the meanes of Pope Boniface the eight a small accord was made, about the coming of Don Iames to the Crowne of Arragon, with Charles king of Naples, the King Don Iames promising to deliuer his children, who were detayned in Cattelogne for Hostages: and moreouer to marry one of his daughters called Blanche, and to quit him the Realme of Sicile, which was but a charge or losse to Arragon. The Pope and king Charles for their parts, promised to procure Charles of Vallois to relinquish the right which hee might pretend in Cattelogne, by the Inuestiture made vnto him by Pope Martin the 4. for the accomplishing of which accord King Charles stayed some time in France, and also by Commission from the same Pope to mediate a peace betwixt France and England: but returning into Italy, and thinking to haue free possession of Italy, hee found that Don Frederick, brother to the king Don Iames of Arragon, had seized thereon, by reason whereof there began a more violent warre then before. The Pope hauing cited the two breethren of Arragon, Don Iames came to Rome, and purged himselfe by oath, that he was ignorant of his brothers enterprise, offering to king Charles (who was present) E ayde to recouer the Iland: wherevpon they continued friends. Thither also came queene Constance, widow to Don Pedro, and Roger de Loria the Admirall, who were much honoured by king Charles, intertaining Roger into his seruice.

Frederick of Arragon seized upon Sicile.

14 The king D. Iames was made Standard-bearer of the Church by the Pope, who moreouer did inuest him in the Ilands of Corfica and Sardinia, which were held by the Pisans.

Pisans and Geneuoi: vpon condition, that he should conquer them by armes at his own charge, and a certaine rent, which (some say) was two thousand markes of silver to the Church of Rome, with other burthenfome conditions. According to the offer which the king of Arragon had made vnto king Charles, he gaue him thirty gallies, with the which hauing ioyned his fleet of forty gallies, whereof Roger de Loria was Admirall, they sailed all towards Sicile, and hauing incountred D. Frederick with 60. gallies, commanded by Frederick d'Orta a Geneuoi, they gaue them battell, put them to route, took 22. gallies, and about 6000. prisoners, and if the Cattelans, who tooke part with Charles, had not made way, to giue D. Frederick meanes to escape, he had bene also taken. Roger de Loria was deuiued of his goods in the lland of Sicile, and condemned as guilty of high treason. Don Frederick saued himselfe in Cattelogne, where he did somewhat repaire his forces, and then returned to Messina. There hee found that the Sicilians had had their reuenge vpon the French, for they had fought with them, and taken Iohn de Loria, nephew to Roger, with sixteene gallies, and had cut off his head as a rebell, which caused Roger to shew himselfe cruell vnto his prisoners. Afterwards king Charles hauing sent Robert his third sonne with commission into the lland, and hauing taken Cattanea, as he reloted to go and meet with a fleet of 60. Gallies, which Philip Prince of Tarentum, his brother did leade the Sicilians, vnderstanding that Roberts gallies were in the port of Cattanea, vnmanned, went and assailed them, tooke some, and disperst the rest in the view of Philip, against whom hauing directed their prowes, they also gaue battell to his 60. gallies, whom they put to route, tooke him prisoner, and carried him to Palermo: wherefore Robert their king after these two routes, thinking that he should not be safe in Sicile, abandoned Cattanea, and returned to Naples. Whilest these contended for Sicile, the King D. James did quietly enjoy his Estates of Arragon, hauing in the year 1295. made a new league with the Kings of France, Portugal, and Granado, against the new King of Castile in fauour of D. Alphonso de la Cerde, the titularie king of that Realme.

D. Fernand, or Ferdinand the 4. of that name, 12. king of Castile, 33. of Leon.

Castile.

IT is a scourge greatly to be feared, with the which God (being displeased) doth punish nations, when he giues them children for Princes, and women for Governours: for the young age and weakke sexe being alwaies little respected, and these instruments easie to gouerne by flatterers, and to be terrified by the violent, wee haue alwaies scene in such raignes, Maistie in contempt, Iustice troden vnder foot, the people oppress, the good reuoyled, Truth banished, and the Country in prey to their neighbors. D. Fernand of Castile being a child, the year 1295. when his father D. Sancho dyed, the gouernment of him, and of his Realme by the will of the deceased King, should remaine in the hands of the Queene D. Mary his mother. A little before D. Henry his great vncke was come into Spaine, who hauing bene chased out of the country for his turbulent spirit, during the raigne of Don Fernand the third had runne through many countries, both Christians and Infidels, and tryed diuers conditions: so as after many yeares he brought backe into Spaine the same qualities which had expelled him, yea far worse: by whose aduice the Queene was forced to gouerne herselfe, so as in effect he was Regent himselfe, which the Earle D. Iohn Nunez de Lara, and his brother D. Nugno Goncalves did enuie. Besides the Noblemen who during the life of the deceased king were out of the Realme, hoping in this new raigne to be restored, through the fauour of their partisans and friends, were now returned, which did not a little trouble the Queene mother, who for these considerations was forced to giue D. Henry great authority against her will. D. Diego Lope Diaz de Haro had vsurped the authoritie in the ancient patrimonie of his house of Biscay, and there were newes that the Infant D. Iohn came out of Affricke, to contend for the kingdome: Besides, that on the other side D. Alphonso de la Cerde, fauoured by the forces of Arragon, France, and Nauarre, carried himselfe openly for king of Castile.

la Cerde, and Castile, sent

Not.

Notwithstanding all these crosses and dangers, this Princeesse who was of a great courage, caused Don Fernand her sonne to be proclaimed and crowned King of Castile, Leon, and other lands depending in the city of Toledo, writing vnto the Noblemen and Prouinces to acknowledge and receiue him: and to the end they should doe it the more willingly, she did release them of a tribute called Sica, which the deceased king, being prest with great necessitie, had imposed. In the beginning no man refused it, but the Noblemen mentioned bred such a confusion, as she had almost sunke vnder the burthen. D. Henry to settle his authoritie of Regent, which he sayd did belong vnto him, stirred vp the townes of Castile to open rebellion, so as the Queene mother and her sonne being come to Vaileadolid, where she had called an assembly of the Estates, they shut the gates against them, and caused them to stay without vntill night: neither would they then suffer such as had accompanied them to enter, but onely she, her sonne, their Officers and household seruants. Don Henry came thither, who hauing scarce saluted the Queene, he began to perswade her to end this dangerous warre, and to disperse the conspiracie of so many Princes against her and her sonne by her marriage with Don Pedro of Arragon, to whom this Princeesse gaue a couragious and sharpe answer, reiecting this marriage as vnfit and pernicious.

Troubles raised by D. Henry

The Infant Don Iohn the Kings vncke, being arriuied in Granado, came to Extremadura, and seized vpon the towne of Pont, or Alcantara, and then entred into Portugal, where by the fauor of the King Don Denis, he tooke vpon him the title of King of Castile, both of them writing to the Inhabitants of the frontier, that they should hold him for their Prince and Soueraigne Lord: and Don Denis not content herewith, sent to proclaime warre against the Queene D. Maria, and Don Henry. The wife Queene mother withstood all these dangers, and prevented them as well as she could, yielding to the malice of the time, resisting foine, and giuing contentment to others, with the least prejudice she could.

The king of Portugal came to Cite Roderigo, whereas the afflicted Queene mother with her sonne and puple were, and there they did in some sort renew their old allyances: they imposed silence to the Infant Don Iohn, who seemed to relinquish: and they did againe conclude a future marriage betwixt the king Don Fernand, and D. Constance Infanta of Portugal.

To these intestine troubles, were added the enterprises of the Nauarrois and Arragonois, who led by Alphonso de la Cerde, calling himselfe King of Castile, entred the country by S. Estuan de Gormas, and passing vnto Leon, hee was there received without any difficultie. There Don Iohn, who was rebelled againe, caused himselfe to be crowned king of Leon, diuiding betwixt them the Realmes of Spaine: so as Don Alphonso should be king of Castile, Toledo, Cordoua, Murcia, and Jaen: and the Infant Don Iohn of Leon, Galicia, Extremadura and Seuille. Into this confederacie entred the Kings of Arragon, Portugal, Granado, and the Queene D. Violant, widow to the king Don Alphonso, with whom there also ioyned Philip of France and Nauarre, with many Noblemen and Knights of the Countie: in all whose names Don James, king of Arragon, had sent to proclaime warre against the Queene D. Maria and her sonne Don Fernand, in the year 1269. so as there was a pittifull reuolt in all parts of Spaine: these afflicted Princes, mother and sonne, hauing no entrance into any towne without great difficultie. After this inuasion of Leon, the Nauarrois and Arragonois led by D. Alphonso, entred into Sahagun, where they crowned him king of Castile, and tooke Villagarcia, Tordeillas, Medina del Riosecco, la Mora, Villa Fafila, with many other places and forts.

la Cerde, king of Castile.*

*Confederacy
king of Castile.*

Notwithstanding being at the seige of Maiorga, a place distant fve leagues from Sahagun, he continued there three moneths, and finding no man to make resistance, God shewed his power, for the plague falling in the Nauarrois and the Arragonois Campe, they were forced to rayle their seige, and make a truce with the Queene widow to return home, who being oppress with infinit miseries, without counsell, ayde, or support, not onely made a truce, but also sent them linnen, carpets, and such like things, to the end they might carry away the bodies of many Noblemen and Knights which were dead of this contagion, the more honorably, among the which were the Infant D. Pedro of Arragon, Don Symon of Vireia, and Reymond Anglesol Arragonois, giuing commandement that that they should suffer them to carry them away without any let or hinderance. Thus some retired into Nauarre, and others into Arragon. The king D. James on the other side, being entred by the frontiers of Murcia, had conquered the greatest part of that kingdom. Hee of Portugal, notwithstanding the conference and league made at Cite Roderigo, showed himselfe in armes vpon the frontier, and had spoiled the countie vnto Simanca, and neere to Vailelolin, where being aduertised of the Nauarrois retreat, hee returned also, hauing taken most of the places of Alfajates and Sabugal, with some others about those quarters: but the king of Granada thinking to effect some great matter in Andalusia, was repulld by D. Alphonso Perez de Guzman Gouvernor of that Prouince.

16 During these warres, many Iewes moued with feare more then with deuotion, turned to the Christian Religion in Spaine, where they had dwellings & Synagogues almost in all the good townes. The occasion was, that in the city of Auila, there rose vpon a certaine man of the Iewish nation, who tearmed himselfe a Prophet, with whom another of the town of Aillon, thrust on with the like spirit, did ioyne: who telling of many secret reuelations, prophesied vnto the Iewes that the time of their deliuerance did approach. The authority of these two personages, well knowne, was not little among them, and therefore they were easily credited; and the rather, for that they did accompany their preachings and discourses, with modestie, grauitie, and holinesse in their outward behaviour: so as these newes running throughout all Spaine, the people gaue themselves to prayers, fasting, almes, and all other commendable good workes, attending the day of their redemption, the which was foretold them by these Prophets, and appointed the last day of the fourth moneth: on the which (sayd they) should appeare many signes in heauen, with a loud sound of a trumpet. Thus hauing past the time in great repentance, feare and terrour, vnto that day, they were throughout all the townes, early in the morning, all attired in white before their Synagogues, as they are accustomed to do the day of their expiation, to pray vnto God to see those celestiall signes, and to receiue their Messias: but seeing nothing, they returned to their houses, whither being come, as they say, there appeared many crosse on the walles, and vpon their garments, whereof some made good vse, thinking it came from our Sauour Iesus Christ, who reprooued their hardness of heart: and therefore acknowledging the error wherein they had liued, receiued the holy baptism; among the which was a great Phisition called Alphonso, who did afterwards write against the Iewes obstinacie. Others persisting in their impietie, did beleue that these crosse were illusions of the diuell to deceiue them.

The storme wherewith Castile had beene beaten from Nauarre, Arragon, Portugal, Granado, and her owne rebels, being somewhat pacified, the Queene-mother ledde an armie into the country of Leon, whereas the Infant D. John reigned, and beseged Paredes: and on the other side D. Henry went to the frontiers of Granada, where hee was defeated and put to flight, and without the speedie assistance of Alphonso Perez de Guzman, he had beene taken. This losse which did much preiudice the Realme of Castile was accompanied with combustions and praefises, which Don Henry made, to the hurt of the king Don Fernand, in the city of Toledo, and the Diocesse of Auila and Segobia, where hauing gathered some troupes together, he marched to the campe before Paredes, and wrought so, as he made them raise the sege, vnder colour of holding a Parliament which was called at Vailelolin and in the meane time he sought vnderhand to corrupt the Deputies of townes and commonalties, and of the other orders of the countie, to the preiudice of Don Fernand. The Queene D. Maria preuented all these disorders, which were not hidden from her, but with great paine, seeking to content Don Henry. During these garboiles, they had newes, that the Nauarrois breaking the truce, had seized vpon the Iusticie of the citie of Nagera, a place strong by nature, the which they fortified, saying, that they held it in the name of the Infant Don Alphonso de la Cerde, whome they called king of Castile, and as they would haue gone on along the riuer of Oja, they were repulld by Don John Alphonso de Hara, who beseged them in the Iusticie, and prest them in such sort, as they were forced to leaue it, and to yeeld: this was in the year 1297, when as the kingdom of Nauar was gouerned in the name of the King and Queene of France by Alphonso de Renay.

An. 1297.

At

A At which time Don James king of Arragon was in Italy, where the peace made in the year 1295, betwixt him, the king of Naples, and the French king, was renewed and confirmed in the towne of Anania, in the presence of Pope Boniface, and the better to confirme the friendship betwixt these Princes, the king of Nauarre yielded vp the townes of Lerda, Vlsiterra and Saueterre vnto the king Don James, being taken from the Crowne of Arragon: so as for this cause, the peace and amity betwixt Nauarre and Arragon was firme and vnited against Castile. By these treaties the fort of Albarazin was yielded vnto D. John de Lara, to entertaine him, and was taken from D. Fernand bastard brother to the king Don James, as if it had beene vniuilly taken from the father of Don John, who did homage to the king of Arragon.

B The widow Queene of Castile seeking by all meanes to preferue her sonnes Realme from so many imminent dangers, renewed againe the treatie of mariage betwixt him and the Infanta D. Constance of Portugal, in the towne of Alcaniz, whether the Infanta was brought by the king her father, and accorded for a future spouse vnto the young king D. Fernand, and to make a more strict League of friendship, the King D. Denis concluded a marriage betwixt D. Beatrice Infanta of Castile, and his eldest sonne D. Alphonso, who was then but eight yeares old. These marriages were made with great disaduantage for the king of Castile, for the conuentions made in consideration thereof, were these. That the king of Portugal should hold in pawne Oliuencia, Conguela, Campo Moya, and S. Felix de los Gallegos, places belonging to the Crowne of Castile. Then did the king D. Denis renounce the league which he had with the Infant Don John, who reigned in Leon, and gaue vnto the widow-Queene three hundred horse to go against him, but they returned loone after, hauing not done any thing. The Infant Don Alphonso de la Cerde on the other side seized on the towne of Almagar, and the troupes of Don John Nugnes, and of the Infant Don John had almost surprized Siguencia; who finding themselves in great want of siluer, coyned great store of false money, vnder the stamp of the king Don Fernand, and did many other acts which were not commendable, the which necessity, and ambitious obstinacy do force men vnto: so as D. Denis king of Portugal, at the instance of the widow and the young King, entred into Castile by Cite Roderigo, in shew to make warre against the Rebels, but it was all counterfeite: for the effects did shew he came more to fauour them then otherwise: whatsoever it were, hee did no act of an enemy against them, but propounded some conditions of peace, fauourable for them; being of opinion, that to retire the Infant Don John from his pursute, and to draw him to the king Don Fernand seruice, they should grant the Realme of Galicia to him and his for euer, and that of Leon for his life time, the which being disliked by the Councell of Castile, the king of Portugal grew thereat discontent, and so returned into his countie: after which the Rebels tooke heart, and it was the cause of a new reuolt of many knights and townes, and protestations of others to do the like, if they did not what they demanded: wherefore the Queene D. Maria and her Councell, were forced to yeeld to many vnworthy things, and was rather gouerned with her sonne and her Councell, by her subjects, then she did gouerne them.

To this was added a new care which came from Nauarre, where as Alphonso de Roled Nauarre, An. 1300, was Gouvernor in the year 1300, who sent an Ambassador into Castile, in the name of king Philip the Faire, and D. Jeanne his wife, Queene proprietarie of Nauarre, to demand the lands and ancient patrimonie of the Crowne of Nauarre, vlturped by the precedent kings of Castile, extending from the limits which were then betwixt the two kingdoms, vnto Atapuerca, and places neere vnto the citie of Burgos, which Ambassadour being a knight of Nauarre, was sent backe to the Queene D. Maria and her Councell, with the best words they could giue him. The French king was then much troubled with the Flemings of Bruges and others, by whom he had receiued a notable route, with the death of many Noblemen: among the which were Robert Earle of Artois, Renald of Nesle Constable of France, and about two hundred men of esteeme. The Ambassadour being returned, the Gouverneur held a Councell with the Infant D. Alphonso de la Cerde, D. John Nugnes de Lara, and other enemies to the king of Castile, at a place called Duegnas, where they resolved to send D. John Nugnes vnto King Philip, with other Ambassadors, to the end he should authorize the promises made in this assembly, to ayde one another A to conquer the lands of the river of Oja for the Crowne of Nauarre, and the Realme of Castile, for the Infant D. Alphonso de la Cerde. These Ambassadors were well received in the Court of France, and present dispatches were made, with approbation of all that had bene done, the king writing vnto the gouernor, that he should giue all ayde and assistance to them that were fled out of Castile against the King D. Fernand.

Castile.

Foundation of Bilbao.

17 At that time we find, that the towne of Bilbao was built by Don Diego Lopez de Haro, who had made his peace with the young King Don Fernand, and did enioy Biscay. This place is built vpon a river called in the country language Ybay cabal, which signifieth Great-river: for it is the greatest in all these quarters, and that it is the river which was anciently called Neruium, very nauigable, the which falls into the sea at Portugalette, two leagues from Bilbao. This towne retained the name of a little hamlet neere vnto it so called as that time, but they now call it Bilbao the old, to make difference betwixt it and the towne, where there is at this day as good trafficke for the Northerne parts, as at any vppon that coast. It was first peopled by men borne thereabout. Beyond that towne the Bascangado language is no more in vse, which they will haue to be the ancient Cantabria.

In the assembly of Vaileddolit, the Queen D. Maria had obtained great summes of money from some of the townes and Commonalties, to make warre against the rebels, and D. Henry had bene made Gouernor of the Mores frontier, who notwithstanding sought to entertaine the troubles and diuisions, wherein he tooke great delight, neither did he care if that Tariffe had fallen into the king of Granados hands. Don John Nuygues de Lara, being returned out of France, hee beganne to ouer-runne the Bishopricke of Calaores, with the Nauarrois and French, against whom D. Alphonso de Haro aduanced with some troupes leui'd in haste, and finding him in a conuenient place, he fought with him, defeated him, and tooke him prisoner, deliuering him into the hands of the Queene D. Maria, who hauing recovered from him all the places he held of the Crowne of Castile, and made him sweare that he should from thenceforth faithfully serue her sonne D. Fernand, she gaue him his libertie. In the year 1301. the King of Portugall came to Plaisance to meet with the Queene D. Maria, where they did treat to sue vnto the Pope for a dispensation of the marriages which they had contracted betwixt the Infants of Castile and of Portugall, conferring of the charges they must be at, not onely to obtaine these dispensations from Pope Boniface, but also the legitimization of the King D. Fernand, for that the marriage betwixt the deceased King D. Sancho, and D. Maria of Molina, had neuer bene dispensed withall. For the effecting whereof they must haue good store of doubloons: for Pope Boniface although he were of a Spanish race, yet would he not do any thing for them without a good fee. After the taking and composition of D. John Nuygues de Lara, the Infant D. John seeing himselfe abandoned of his best friend, reconciled himselfe vnto the widow Queene, and to the King Don Fernand her sonne, quiting the title of king of Leon, and all that he held in that country: and for that D. Diego Lope de Haro held the country of Biscay, which did belong vnto his wife D. Maria Diaz de Haro, hee had in recompence thereof the townes of Manilla, Paredes, Medina de Riosecco, Castro-nouo and Cabrerros: for the Councell were not of opinion, that they should discontent Don Diego Lopez in disposing him.

These things thus repayed, it seemed that all troubles had bene pacified within the Realme, but those which were entertained by the Infant Don Alphonso de la Cerde: wherefore it was resolu'd to repell him courageously, beginning by the siege of Almazan, which held for him: but D. Henry who desired no peace in Spaine, disappointed this enterprise, and afterwards the King of Arragon and he hauing met at Ariza; they made leagues and confederacies, without acquainting the Queene or her Councell therewith. The King of Arragon tooke Lorca, both towne and castell, by the suffiance of Don Henry and Don John also. Thus was this courageous Queene oppressed with a thousand insupportable difficulties in her Gouernment and Regency, which were procured by her owne subjects, besides the feare she had of forraigne enemies.

There was a new assembly of estates called at Burgos, and afterwards continued at Zamora.

A Zamora, where there were granted a subuention of great summes of money for the war; and also for the dispensations which they demanded from the Pope, who by that meanes granted them, and they were published. The Infants D. Henry, and D. John being still discontented, did soone begin to make new practises, to diuide the king and his mother, whose wisdom and iudgement did displease them. The Queene being at Burgos, there came other Ambassadors to her from the French king, to aduise her to do him reason for the lands of Nagera, the river of Oja, and others that were held by the precedent kings of Castile, otherwise they did protest in their Masters name, that he would haue recourse to armes: whereat the Queene was much perplexed, apprehending greatly the forces of such a king as Philip the Faire was. Hauing conferred with D. Henry, D. John of Castile, and D. John Nuygues de Lara, it was concluded with the Ambassadors, that the Queene of Castile, and the Gouernor of Nauar should meet at Victoria, where they should treat of all differences. Whilst that this poore Princeesse did labor to maintaine her sons estate, the Noblemen about-named carried away the king to Leon, and did separate him from her: neither was there any thing concluded at the interview of Victoria, for the great differences of either part.

The king D. James sent a knight vnto D. Maria Queene of Castile being at Victoria, to tell her, that if she would be a meane, that he might hold the towne of Alicante without any controuersie, he would restore all that he had taken in the Realme of Murcia: wherunto the would not consent: for hauing (like a Lady of iudgement) intelligence what was done by her neighbours, she did not now so much feare the king of Arragon as shee had done, seeing him in trouble with his Nobility, by reason of a tribute which he had imposed as well vpon the Nobility as the rest of his Realme, called Selga: wherefore she sought to haue intelligence with the malcontents of Arragon, to intertaine and augment these diuisions. About this time dyed the Queene D. Constance, mother to the king D. James and D. Frederick at Barcelona.

The Queene-mother of Castile hearing the wrong they had done her, in carrying away her son, she came with all speed to Vaileddolit, and to disappoint her aduersaries despoys, she sent vnto the king of Portugall, to effect the marriage betwixt the king her son, and the Infanta D. Constance, that by this means the might get from him the places which he held in pawne of the Crowne of Castile, wherunto the Portugais yielded. But they which held the young king D. Fernand, desirous to entertaine the king of Portugals fauor, to the end they might be supported by him in their tyrannies, aduised him not to yeeld vpon any thing, promising that the marriage (should be accomplished when he pleased: whereat he was very glad, and stayed not long to put the married couple together, but did not giue vp the townes. Hereupon the king D. Fernand called an assembly of the Estates at Medina del campo, whither the Deputies would not come, without the expresse commandement of the Queene-mother, but she appointed them to go, promising to be there her selfe. The Deputies made great complaints, that the kings person was detained by the Infant D. John, and D. John de Lara. They for their part objected many things against the Queen: In the mean time the king being practised by his mother, stole from the knights which had debauched him, and followed her, holding the way to Burgos, but as he was young and inconstant, before they came vnto the city, he abandoned her, and D. Henry, who was newly made great Master, and returned with the others; by reason whereof there was much dispute. The Queene bearing and dissembling all, being wife, and excusing her sons youth, who went to winter at Leon.

Whilst these things were in question, Mahomet Myr king of Granado, hauing alwaies entertained the friendship of the seditious Prince D. Henry of Castile, by rare & continual presents, after that he had tryed all meanes to recouer Tariffa, in the which D. Henry had alwaies fauored him, propounding it in the open Estates, and aduising them to yeeld it vnto him: but seeing he could not preuaile by these meanes, he vfed open force, assailing Andalusia, which was neere vnto him, and laying siege to Alcaudete, the which hee tooke thinking to do the like at Baena: Alphonso Peres of Saavedra was Captaine of the castell, and D. Fernand Alphonso of Cordoua, Payo Arias, John Martines of Argote, and others, being in garrison in the towne, he was repulst, and forced to returne into Granado:

An. 1302.

But soone after hearing that the towne of Jaen was not well manned, and that a peece of A the wall was fallen, he came with greater forces, and gaue a furious assault, so as many good souldiers dyed in the defence thereof: and among them Henry Perez of Arana, a Knight of a noble house, yet it was preferred from the iurie of the Moores: and king Mahumet seeing he could not take it, went to Quesada, the which hee forced. This king of the Moores was strictly allyed, and a great friend to D. James king of Arragon, to whom he had promised to ayde Don Alphonso de la Cerde with all his meanes to recover the Realme of Castile, demanding for his part of the conquest of Tariffe, Medina Sidonia, Alala and Bejar, which were wont to belong to the Crowne of Granado, the which was granted, but he did not see it effected, for he dyed in the yeare 1302. the thirtieth yeare of his raigne, and of the Arabians 685. In whole place reigned his sonne Mahumet the third called Aben Alhamar, or Alamir Aben-Azar. About that time dyed Raymond that great Philosopher, (yet had he no great learning, but in opinion) he was borne in the Iland of Maiorca, and in his younger yeares was a merchant. Becing wearie of the world, he retired into the desert, and there composed that brieue Art, or abridgement of diuine and humane sciences, whereby they haue beleueed that men in an instant might become very learned: the which (he sayd) he had by reuelation. He was religious, and thinking to draw the Mahumetists to the knowledge of Iesus Christ, he past into Africke, where preaching the faith with an inconsiderate zeale, he was stoned by the Moores. Notwithstanding his writings being examined and censured some yeares after his death, by the Iudgement of Aimeric a lacobin, and other Inquisitours Spaniards, they were condemned by Pope Gregory, sitting at Aunyon, as dangerous and full of ill doctrine, contrary to her faith.

An. 1304.

The king of Castile, becing (as he thought) at libertie, for that he was from his mother desired to confer with D. Denis king of Portugall his father-in-law, the which the Queene D. Maria, D. Henry, and D. Diego Lopes de Haro fought by all meanes to hinder, but they could not: for these two kings met at Badajos. The apparent colour of this interview was, that the king D. Fernand had of his father-in-law a present of a million of Maratidis of money current in those times; but what was treated in secret was suspected to D. Henry, to Diego Lopes de Haro, and euen to D. John Manuel, son to the Infant Manuel with others, who fearing lest they should plot something against them, made a league with the king of Arragon, and D. Alphonso de la Cerde, and would haue comprehended the Queene-mother in their league, but she refused it, and gaue good reasons for her excuse: wherefore they reuealed the Infant D. Alphonso de la Cerde for king of Castile, the which the Queene seeking to hinder, she laboured in vaine, and retired to Medina del campo, the Inhabitants of which towne were faithfull to her sonne. Thereupon, being in the yeare 1304. Don Henry, who was very old, dyed, whose inconstant and turbulent spirit had troubled both himself and others, and so this league vanished: he was buried in the church of Saint Francis at Valledoliz. This death did much content the king, who was then at Cordoua, and hauing there settled his affaires with the new king of Granado, who made a league with him vpon the same conditions, and paying the same tribute which his father had done, he departed, leauing D. John Nages de Lara for Gouernor general of the frontier, diuiding all the goods and possessions which D. Henry had held among his Knights, whereof a good part fell to D. John Nages, although the king loued him liue, but he feared him. The Queene-mother was then forced to follow his humors, yet he did all things for his profit and good. By her meanes D. Diego Lopes de Haro reconciled himselfe vnto him. But there fell out another contention betwixt D. Diego and the Infant D. John, who notwithstanding any accord that had bene made, would haue the Countie of Biscay, which did belong vnto him in the right of his wife. The Queene and the Noblemen of this Councell fought to pacifie them, but not able to do it, they stayed the decision of this controversie, to end matters more important to the realm, with the king of Arragon, and the Infant D. Alphonso de la Cerde: for the one held in a manner all the Realme of Murcia, and the other invited himselfe still king of Castile: for the which Don John of Castile was sent to the king of Arragon, to take some good course with him, to end their pretensions and quarrels, who prevailed so, as the king of Arragon put that which concerned him.

A himselfe to compromise, choosing for Arbitrators the King of Portugall, who had married his sister Donna Isabel, the same Don John, and the Bishop of Saragossa. The Infant Don Alphonso content in like manner that his right should be friendly decided, did choose and elect for Arbitrators, the kings of Arragon and Portugall, and the same Don John: the which, the King Don Fernand did willingly allow of, but not the Queene his Mother, who did fore-see, that the end of this compromise would fall out to her sonnes prejudice.

Compromise betwixt the christian Princes
of Spaine.

This election of Arbitrators signified to the King of Portugall, and accepted by him, hee went to Tarassone in Arragon, passing by Medina del Campo, from whence the King Don Fernand did accompany him vnto Soria. To Tarassone there also came B the King of Arragon, Don John, and the Bishop of Saragossa, who imploved themselves to examine the rights and pretensions of the parties, whilst that the King Don Fernand, and the Queene his Mother, attended their sentence in Agreda. In regard of the Realme of Murcia, the King of Portugall, Don John, and the Bishop did pronounce: That the riuer of Segura should make the separation betwixt the Lands of Murcia and Valencia, so as that which is to the South of Murcia, should be of the Iurisdiction of Don Fernand: and from the sayd riuer towards Valencia, should belong to the King of Arragon: so as Don James did not onely get the towne of Alicante, which hee had demanded, but also many other places.

As for the differences betwixt the king Don Fernand, and Don Alphonso de la Cerde, which were greater, for that Don Alphonso pretended the whole Realme of Castile to belong lawfully vnto him, it was iudged and arbitrated by the kings of Arragon and Portugall: That for the right and interest which the sayd Don Alphonso pretended, by an arbitrarie sentence pronounced vpon the pretension of Don Alphonso de la Cerde, the king Don Fernand should gree and surrender vnto him the places which follow: Alba de Tormes, Bejar, Val de Corneja, Gibraltar, Gargantaolla, Torremenga, Passaron, el Reall de Mancanars, Algaua, Mont de la Greda de Magan, the Towne of Sarria, with the appurtenances thereunto adjacent, Monçon, Lemos, Robayna Aliadra, Almonia, Canall, and la Barka Estercolina, Torre Blanca, Rodo Eledia, Hornacuelos, las Hazennas of Corduba, the D Royall right and inheritance of Bonilla, with the appurtenances thereunto belonging, Colmenar of Sepulveda, and Aldea maior, with Sal de Campos, Vencos, Gatón, Ferran, Moliellas, the Salt-pits of Rubio, Belbimbre, Castro Caluon, the Port of Vizagra of the Cittie of Toledo, and the Martinengas of Madrid, and of Medina del campo.

All these fore-mentioned places were adiudged and giuen by the Arbitrators, to the Infant Don Alphonso, into the possession whereof, hee should (without any opposed contradiction) bee actually put and inuested by the king Don Fernand, by our Lady day (otherwise called the Natiuite of the blessed Virgin Mary) in September following: and in consideration thereof, the Infant Don Alphonso should no more intitle himselfe king of Castile and Leon, nor carrie the armes quartered of Castile and Leon, as hee had done before, and continued it to that present day: and hee should deliuer vp, and surrender vnto the king Don Fernand, the Towne of Almazan with the appurtenances adiacent, and some other places which hee had taken during the warre.

This arbitrarie sentence was giuen and pronounced by the Arbitrators in the yeare one thousand, three hundred and foure, whereunto were added and annexed great penalties and forfeitures to the partie that should infringe or violate the same: at the which were present Don Raymond Bishop of Valencia, Don Martin Bishop of Lisbon, the Bishop of Huesca, and the Bishop of Cordoua: Don John Officer Master of the F knights of Saint James, John Xamen, Diego Gonçales Secretarie of Tarassone, Gonçalo Gonçales, Raymond Altar of Aguilar, Pero Lopes of Padilla, Fernand Gutierrez of Quixada, Gonçalo Diaz de Canallor, Lope Garcia of Hermosilla, Martin Fernandez, Perto Carrero, Alphonso Perez of Sauedra, Sancho Ruiz of Escalante: moreover, there were also present at that time, Ysaïas Peres of Leyua, Stephen Peres of Auila, Lope

Perez of Burgos, with many other Noblemen and Knights; and it was written and signed by Andrew Perez of Corbera, publique Notarie of Tarrassone. In this last sentence D. Iohn was no Judge, but Agent and Attorney for the king D. Fernand, in whose name hee yielded. As for the Infant D. Alphonso, what shew sooner he made, he was nothing pleased, as it will appeare by the event. The kings having bene some daies together as well at Tarrassone, as at Agreda, parted good friends.

These matters being ended they resolved to determine the controuersie betwixt the Infant D. Iohn, and Don Diego Lopes de Haro: to which end D. Diego was cited to come to Court, which was then at Medina del Campo, to answer to the demands of Don Iohn and of his wife D. Maria Diaz de Haro, heire proprietarie of Biscay: D. Diego would not plead in the Court of Leon, but he appeared in that of Castile, which gaue ninety dayes B respite to the defender, notwithstanding if he let the thirtieth day passe and did not present himselfe, or giue a lawfull excuse, they might seaze vpon their sheepe, oxen, cowes, and swine, and eate them, tying the feete against the walles and trees, in signe of the demands possession.

Don Diego appeared, and pleaded for his defence, that considering the accords and transactions made heretofore, betwixt him, Don Iohn, and Donna Maria his wife, by the which they had yielded vnto him the possession of the Segneurie of Biscay, in regard of the recompences which they had receiued, wherewith they were contented, and had sworne and confirmed it by oath: they were now fallen from all the right they could pretend to the sayd Segneurie, and the dependances. The cause being pleaded of either side, with allegations of maine reason, they were referred to counsell: and in the C meane time, the Queene D. Maria foreseeing some new trouble, laboured by all meanes to accord them, or to vndergo an arbitrarie and friendly sentence: but Don Diego Lopes would not yeeld thereunto, but departed without the King or Queenes priuitee, and returned into Biscay, the which was very ill taken. The assembly being ended, the king came to Vaileadolid, where he was so importuned by the Infant Don Iohn, as he pronounced sentence, by the aduice of his Councell, contayning, That D. Iohn and his wife Donna Maria Diaz should be put in possession of Biscay: yet he did suspend the execution of the sentence, thinking that Don Diego would grow thereby more tractable: but he was resolved to hold his Segneurie: so the king seeing his obstinacie, would haue dismembred D the country of Guipulcoa from his Crowne, to giue it to his vnkle in recompence: wherunto he yielded, to end all quarrels: but D. Maria Diaz de Haro being obstinate, sayd resolutely, that she demanded nothing of another mans, and that she would neuer quire her fathers inheritance, no not if they would giue her ten times as much as the Segneurie of Biscay was worth.

Sentence giuen by the king against D. Diego Lopes de Haro.

These poursuites did so trouble and disturbe euery man, and euen Don Iohn himselfe, as they all thought it fit and conuenient (the King so commanding) to surcease the processe for two yeares; during the which the parties should haue truce, and not attempt any thing one against another. And for that the great loue and friendship betwixt Don Diego Lopes de Haro, and Don Iohn Nuges de Lara, was suspect vnto the king, he sought in the meane time to breede and stirre vp some ialousie and diuision betwixt them, gratifying Don Diego in many things, making his Sonne Don Lopes Diaz de Haro Lord Steward of his house, but it was not possible to diuide them: neither could Don Diego by any meanes bring Don Iohn Nuges in fauour with the king, who was resolved to make warre against him, against the opinion of the Queene his mother, and all his Councell: so as hee was forced and constrained to dislodge hastily in the night from Aranda of Duero, and came to Don Diego Lopes and his sonne, who altogether made a league and confederacie against the king: Whereupon there were many enterprises and encounters, without any great effect: so as being returned to Aranda, and the king not able to draw Don Diego from that partie, there was a day appointed to meet at Cerezo, and in the meane time a truce was made.

There Don Alphonso Perez de Guzman who did negotiate for the king, preuailed so with them of the league, and the Queen-mother with the king D. Fernand her son, who attended the resolution of this assembly in the towne of Pancoruo, that all these, that

A is to say, the Lords of Haro father and sonne, and D. Iohn Nuges, should remaine his seruants, and he receiued them into grace, yielding vnto them all they were wont to enjoy, and they for a gage of their faith deliuered some places in pawne. Don Iohn of Castile, who pursued the Seignurie of Biscay, was not pleased with this accord, wherefore he did presse the king to haue the sentence giuen by him in fauour of D. Maria Diaz his wife, put in execution, wherewith the king was much troubled; and both he, the Queene and others of the Councell, sought by all meanes to agree these parties contending, who were resolved to go to armes: to preuent the which, the king made many great offers vnto Don Diego Lopes, the which he refused: but afterwards he repented it often. There was so great labouring for a peace, and especially by the Queene-mother, as in the end they B yeelded to this composition. That Don Diego Lopes should, during his life, enjoy the Segneurie of Biscay, and lands belonging thereunto, and that after his decesse the possession should be giuen to Don Iohn, and to D. Maria his wife, or to their heires, except Vrdugna, Val de Balmeceda, and S. Olalla, which three places should remaine to Don Lopes Diaz de Haro, sonne to D. Diego: to whom moreover the king should giue for the enter-tayning of this peace, Miranda of Ebro, and Vilalua of Lofa. D. Diego Lopes yeelded to these conditions, to please the king though vnwillingly.

The troubles and seditions wherewith the Realme of Castile was afflicted at that time, was a plague which humane policie could not preuent: for when as one fire was quenched, another was suddenly kindled: so as these miseries continuing, men perished, the C treasures were wasted, and Christians ruined one another in these ciuill warres, giuing meanes and leysure to the Moores of Granada to assure their Estates, who furnished themselves with such store of munition, and built so many forts, towers, and castles, vpon the sea coast, as they maintained themselves for many yeres, against all the attempts of their enemies. D. Iohn Nuges de Lara was not pleased to see an accord made betwixt D. Diego Lopes, and the Infant D. Iohn of Castile: wherefore he retired from Court, and fortified himselfe in Tordehumos, where he was besegged by the king: but in the end the King was forced to giue him Moja and Cagnette, and to receiue him againe into fauour, seeing his vnkle D. Iohn so hinder the seerage vnder-hand, caused the Knights to disband: yet for all this they liued not long in peace, for all these feditious men, although they had many quarrels among themselves, yet they agreed in this point, to keepe the Realme in D perpetuall combustion. The Infant D. Iohn, and D. Iohn Nuges did afterwards make a league against the king, vpon a false aduertisement, that the king meant to kill them: whereupon they troubled the State againe, so as they had great difficulty to retire the Infant D. Iohn from this enterprize: but as for D. Iohn Nuges, he continued in his rebellion, and would not come to the Estates held at Burgos, where there was question to create of the kings patrimony, and the reuenues of the Crowne, which were greatly impaired.

Mahumet Aben Alhamar, the third king of Granada.

THE Moores (as I haue sayd) during these garboiles, did fortifie themselves in Granada, ouer whom reigned Mahumet Aben Alhamar the third king, and third of that name, by the decesse of his father Mahumet Myr, who at his death had left two sonnes, the which reigned one after another, and one daughter. The younger was called Mahumet Aben-Nacar, Aben-Lemin, Aben-Adille. King Mahumet during his reign was blind by an accident, his sister was married to a great knight, a Moore, called Ferrachen, Aracaz, or Captain of Malaga, who was alwaies much esteemed by the king, and honoured for his verue. This Ferrachen vsurped the towne of Ceuta in Affricke, and did great exploits both by sea and land. He had many children by his wife, who was Infant of Granada, among the which were Ismael and Mahumet, who reigned in Granada, so we will hereafter shew. This king Mahumet Aben Alhamar being blind, had from his entrance continued the war by his capitaines against the Christians, the which had begun in his fathers life time, and tooke Bethmar and other places, during the broyles in Castile.

Wherefore

Wherefore for a time he exempted himselfe of the tribute, which his predecessours had payed to the kings of Castile: but the king Don Fernand in the year 1304. hauing as hath bene sayd renewed their League, and sent Fernand Gomez of Toledo his Chancelor, with a lew called Samuel, to Granado, to demand the tribute, where they treated a truce with Mahumet, whereat Mahumet was well pleased, and they did agree that either should enjoy the places which they had taken one from another: that is, the king of Castile Tariffe, and the king of Granado Aleandete, Quelada, Bedmar and others, and that the yearly tribute should be payed to the king of Castile. Which Articles were signed by king Mahumet and the Ambassadors, and afterwards confirmed by the king D. Fernand in the city of Cordoua, whether was sent to that end from the king of Granado, an Almagui called Mahumet. This truce continued about foure yeares, during the which the Moores were carefull to furnish their countrie with all things necessary, to repell the inuasions of their forraine enemies: yet had they troubles among themselues: for Mahumet being growne contemptible among his subiects, by reason of his blindnesse, Aburabe an audacious Moore, who was Gouverneur of Almeri, began to tyrannize, and to usurpe the title of King: and although he were chased away, and forced (the towne being taken) to flie into Affricke, yet he left not to call himselfe King, and would haue surprized Ceuta.

During these things, Arnaud of Puyane, Bishop of Pampelona, a Basque by nation, held their Synods for reformation of his Clergie, which was very needfull. Two yeares before that had bene a Synode held of many Bishops at Pegnañel, where it was decreed that Priests might keepe Concubines secretly, but not openly.

In Arragon a marriage was treated betwixt the Infant D. Maria, daughter to the king Don James and Lewis Hutin the eldest Sonne, and then with the Earle of Poitiers second sonne to King Philip the Faire, and of the Queene Don Jeanne his wife, but it tooke no effect. We haue sayd before, that the King Don James, the better to entertaine the peace which he had made with the French reigning in Naples, had promised to marrie the issue which followed: Don James his eldest, who was married to D. Leonora Infant of Castile: but hauing not touched her, he sent her home, and made himselfe a knight of the order of Saint Iohn of Hierusalem, and was afterwards Master of the order of Monteca. D. Alphonso his second sonne was king after him. Don Pedro the third, Earle of Ampurias, D. Raymond Berenger Earle of Prages and Ribagorça, Don Iohn who was Archbishoppe of Toledo, and afterwards Patriarch of Alexandria, and Arch bishop of Tarragone. Mououer D. Constance married to Don Iohn Manuel of Castile, sonne to the Infant D. Manuel: D. Maria who was wife to Don Pedro Infant of Castile, sonne to Don Sancho the 4. D. Blanche a religious woman, and a Prioreffe of Sixena: D. Violant married to the prince of Tarentum: and D. Isabella wife to Don Frederick Arch-duke of Austria: these were his lawfull children: and by his stolne loues he had a daughter, which dyed young, and Don James of Arragon, who hauing married the daughter and heire of Don Lope de Luna, was Earle of Luna.

The marriage treated betwixt D. Maria of Arragon, and the second sonne of France, by the meanes of Pope Boniface, tooke no effect, for that the conditions propounded were very preiudiciall to Lewis Hutin, to whom the succession of Nauarre by right belonged as the eldest, the which the Pope and the king of Arragon would haue transferred to the Earle of Poitiers, with the Earldomes of Champagne and Brie, and other lands belonging to Queene Jeanne their mother. This Donna Jeanne Queene of Nauarre, a little before her death, caused that famous Colledge of Nauarre to be built in Paris, endowing it with good rents in Champagne, as well for the entertraining of Regents, as Professors in Diuinity and Humanity, as of the chappell and Ministers thereof. The same Princeffe built the towne called Pont de la Roine in Nauarre, otherwise called Cares, and hauing liued in France one and thirty yeares, and neuer returned into Nauarre, she died in the year 1305. leauing Lewis, Philip, and Charles, who reigned in France and Nauarre successiue one after another, and Isabel who was Queene of England, married to Edward the second, her children. She was buried at the Franciscans in Paris. A ycare after the Nauarre.

An. 1305.

A the decease of this Lady King Philip desired to make an alliance with Castile, demanding by his Ambassadors D. Isabel, sister to the King D. Fernand, but this marriage tooke no effect, for some reasons not written, some say it was three yeeres after the death of Queene Jane.

Lewis Hutin the first of that name, six and twentieth King of Nauarre.

B 19 Lewis, sonne to King Philip and Donna Jane, surnamed Hutin, first of that name amongst the Kings of Nauarre, succeeded his mother in the sayd realme: he did not intitle himselfe King, vntill hee had bene crowned at Pampelone, but only the eldest sonne and heire of the Realme: his surname of Hutin signifies mutin or riotous, which he purchased after his comming to the crowne of France, or as some say, before, whether it were that he had bene the cause of contentions, or that hee had pacified them. The Queene death being knowne In Nauarre, the Estates assembled at Pampelone, where they refused to send Ambassadors into France, to beseech King Philip: to send them Lewis his sonne, their naturall Prince, and hauing written letters to that effect in the name of the Estates, they dispatched D. Arnaud of Puyana, Bishop of Pampelone, and Don Fortun Almorauid, who were well and honorably accompanied: who being come to the court of France, they gaue the Kings to vnderstand the great grieue the people of Nauarre had for the death of their Queene, and Soueraigne Lady: for whose consolation, they besought them that their new King Lewis might goe thither as soone as might bee, accompanying this extreame desire of the Nauarrois, with necessary reasons, for that they had great complaints to make of the gouernment of their Viceroys, who had gouerned the affaires of the realme, to the great preiudice thereof. Whereof the continuall absence of their soueraigne Magistrate was the cause, who could not visibly see the Estate of his country and people, but was serued by the eyes and eares of others, whose reports are commonly false, and the truth either concealed or dissembled. This request seemed iust vnto the Kings, both father and sonne: yet King Lewis came not into Nauarre but two yeeres after, and in the meane time hee married Marguerite daughter to Robert Duke of Bourgogne, with whom hee had in marriage fifty thousand Liuers in siluer, and the lands of Gyen vpon Seine: of which marriage issued Jeanne, who was Queene of Nauarre, married to Philip Earle of Eurenx, son to Lewis of France, by whom the Kings of Nauarre haue pretended right to the Dutchy of Bourgogne against the Kings of France: for Robert Duke of Bourgogne, father to this Marguerite, hauing had many children, most of them left not any heires, and their posterity which had children, failed soone, there remaying no issue of the house of Bourgogne, but that of this Lady, married to Lewis Hutin.

E 20 Whilst that the King of Nauarre delayed the time to come into his Realme, there were Gouvernors, or Viceroyes, after the accustomed manner. The great quarrels which had happened in France some yeeres before, betwixt King Philip the faire and Pope Boniface the eight, had caused many disorders, by reason whereof there was a great famine throughout all the realme. Pope Boniface had excommunicated King Philip, and giuen his realme in prey to him that could take it; but hee was a prey to the French, who being led by Nogaret of Saint Felix, and by the intelligence of Sarra Colonne, surprized the Pope at Anania, and intreated him to it, as soone after for rage and spight hee died at Rome: whose successor Benedict the eleuenth, absolved the King, his house and his realme, who held the sea but eight monethes. After whose decease there grew great factions for the election of a new Pope, so as the sea was void about tenne monethes, for that the French and Italian Cardinals, being assembled at Perugia, could not agree, who in the end concluded, that three French Cardinals should be named by the Italians, or else three Italians by the French, one of the which should be chosen Pope by the other faction.

The Italians would needs name three French prelates, whom they knew to bee discontented and enemies to King Philip, among the which was the Archbishop of Bourdeaux, called Bertrand Gor, sonne to Bernard, a Basque by nation, who was chosen Pope by the French, and that at the instance of King Philip, who during the delay of forty daies, which had beene referred for the two parties, after the nomination, to aduise which of the three they should choofe, was aduertised of all: and they say that hee aduertised the Archbishop that he was one of the three named, and that if hee would promise and sweare vnto him to doe many things which he propounded, and among others to change the Popes sea from Italy into France, it was in his power to make him Pope. The good Archbishop desirous to attaine to that dignity, promised it, and did effect it being chosen, causing all the Cardinals and Officers of the court of Rome to come to Lions, where he was crowned in the Church of Saint Iust, that yeere 1305. There were present the French King, with many other Princes and Noblemen, and an infinite multitude of people of all sorts.

During the pompe of this coronation, John Duke of Brittain was slaine with the iune of an old wal, on the which there was a world of people to see this spectacle, and the King and Pope himselfe were in great danger. Hee was called Clement the fifth, who sent three Cardinals to Rome, to gouerne the city, and other places of the territories of the Church. Hee made his residence in France, for the most part in Auignon where other his successors remained for the space of fteenty yeeres, which were Clement the fifth, John the two and twentieth, Benedict the twelfth, Clement the sixth, who bought Auignon C of Queene Iane, Innocent the sixth, Vrbaine the fifth, and Gregory the eleventh, who returned the sea to Rome: It is called by the Italians the new transmigration, and captivity of Babilon. This Pope granted to the French King the tithes of the Clergy, for reparation of the spoiles which the warre had caused, and the right of patronage of many Churches which were vacant, to prouide Ministers and Pastors worthy of their charges. King Lewis Hutin did accompany his father during all the alterations, so as he could not so soone goe into his realme of Nauarre, as he desired, besides hee was very young; notwithstanding all dispatches were made in his name. After that the Kings of France had vnited the crowne of Nauarre to theirs, all quarrels for precedence, which the King of Castille pretended, ceased, the which hauing in former times gotten ouer France by their great power, they now lost by the same right of a greater power, which was that of France. Philip Earle of Poitiers, brother to King Lewis Hutin, to whom the King of Arragon had fought to marry his daughter Mary, vpon condition that they should make him King of Nauarre, was married in the yeere 1306. to Iane daughter to Othelin Earle of Bourgongne, the marriage was celebrated at Corbeil, after the which Lewis King of Nauarre went vnto his realme, well accompanied with French Nobility; being at Pampelone, hee was crowned, to the ioy of his subiects, in the yeere of our Lord 1307. and then hee beganne to stile himselfe King, being about sixteene yeere of age. Hee swore to obserue the lawes and rights of the realme, and then hee went to visit the towns and places thereof, with a great concourse of his vassals and subiects, who had not so long time seene their Kings and Soueraigne Princes, to whom the King shewed himselfe milde and affable: Notwithstanding being in the towne of Estella, hee caused D. Fortun Almorauid and Martin Ximenes of Ayuar to bee put in prison, who had mouined for the preuileges of the Nobility of Nauarre, against the French Gouvernours, and had medled in the gouernment, for the preservation of the country: whereas the Nauarrois were somewhat discontented, but hee paid them with reasons, and parting out of Nauarre, to returne into France, hee carried these two prisoners with him: D. Fortun died in prison, but Martin got his liberty through the fauour of the Earle of Vallois, who notwithstanding liued not long after. Hee was followed by aboute two hundred gentlemen Nauarrois, whom hee aduanced in France, both to make them more affectionate by his bounty, and to accustom them to the manners of the French, and also to haue so many hostages, of those whom hee distrusted.

21 Pope Clement the fifth, hauing (as we haue sayd) done a memorable act, which did much import the Italians and other nations, to haue transported the Papal sea into France

A France vnderooke an other businesse worthy of no lesse fame, the Knights Templers being growne very rich, were by consequence insolent; they were enuied by great men, and generally hated; so as the people either moued in conscience, and desire to reforme, and roote out vice, or seeking to haue part of the spoile, in the yeere of our Lord 1308. made informations against them through al Christendome: sending word to the Bishops to make inquiry in their Bishoppiks, of their liues, manners and religion, citing them generally to appeere at a counsell which hee had called to that end at Vienne in Dauphine, in the yeere of our Lord 1310. Before and after this counsell, many of them (after informations made) being attainted and conuicted of greuous crimes of heresie, Apostasie, & other impieties, against God, nature and al good manners, great executions followed, many being conuicted were put to death by fire, and other punishments: many (whose accusations were not well verified) being cruelly tortured, confessed greuous crimes, whereof they would discharge themselves, being at their executions; and of this number was the great Maister of the Order, called Lames Mole of Bourgongne, many also without any confession, were put to death: wherefore the Pope hauing made a strict serch, refused to abolish this Order, and pronounced this sentence against them, in the presence of the Kings of France and Nauarre, of Charles Earle of Vallois, Philip and Charles brethren to Lewis Hutin and others. The execution of this sentence was suspended, in regard of the Knights Templers of Castille, Arragon, Majorca and Portugal, the suppression of whom the Pope referred to the disposition of the Apostolike see, to prouide according vnto reason.

C Thus ended the Order of the Templers, which had continued about two hundred yeeres: a president which should be followed in other things, which hauing beene instituted to a good end, and whose beginnings were not wholly to be blamed, are since so degenerated, as the professions of Christians is made odious and abominable to other nations. In time the knights Templers of Castille, Portugal and Arragon were suppressed with the rest, being growne the more odious to all men, for that they had beene condemned by a counsell. The Knights of Saint Iohn of Ierusalem were enriched with the spoiles of these Templers, who had in the yeere of our Lord 1308. taken the Island of Rhodes, or at the least hauing beene conquered by other Christians, were put in possession by Pope Clement the fifth. These Rhodiens (as they were afterwards called) made profession of the order of Saint Augustine, and obtained great preuileges from the Popes, enioying this Island aboute two hundred yeeres. They had helpe to ruine the Templers, and therefore had part of the spoile. Pope Clement and King Philip the faire diuided their mouable goods betwixt them.

22 Other Orders of holy knight-hood had their beginnings by the ruines of this, as those called of Christ in Portugal, by the deuotion and diligence of the King D. Denis: who assigned them rents and reuenues of the Templers Comanderies and benefices: and it was ordained that they should carry for a marke or badge, a white crosse with a red. This King of Portugal wrought so, as the knights of Saint Iames were separated and exempted from the subiection of the Maistry of Castille, wherein hee was assisted by the Apostolike Authority, who made Alcacar de Sal the chiefe place of the order of Saint Iames, the which was afterwards translated to Pamela, D. Fernand King of Castille seized vpon the places, townes and forts, and all the reuenues of the Templers in his country, to dispose thereof as should be thought fit.

E 23 The Order called our Lady of Montez took its beginning by the ruine of the Templers, in the realme of Valencia which is like vnto the knights of Calatrava, and vnder the Order of Cisteaux, vnto whom were rents assigned out of the Templers confiscations. This Order was afterwards confirmed by Pope Iohn the two and twentieth, successor to Clement the fifth. In the time of this Clement, Robert King of Naples sonne to Charles the Limping, was crowned in Auignon, being before Duke of Calabria, a great enemy of D. Frederic King of Sicily, of which Kingdome of Naples, we will forbear to speake, for that it concernes not the affaires of Spaine, vntill that the Arragonois were called to that crowne by Queene Ianne the two and twentieth, as we shall hereafter shew.

Entenza, gave a notable defeat to Michel Paleologus, sonne to Andronicus (who had A with him all the Cavallarie of Constantinople) nere to the towne of Apros in Thrace, so as Michel being wounded was forced to save himselfe by flight, and shut himselfe into Adrianopoli, whereas the Castellans besegged him long.

Their tort of Calipoli being afterwards assailed by Andriol Moro (who led Theodore Paleologus Marquis of Monterrat into Italy with an army) was so well defended, as there were about six hundred with their commander Andriol slaine there. Yet necessity in the meane time did consume these Castellans troupes being in an enemies countie, few in number and farre from all succors, so as finding themselves in extreame despeire, D. Fernand, Infant of Majorca, arrived happily, being sent by D. Frederic King of Sicile, to give them some releefe. Then was Berenger Entenza returned from prison, who B seeking to resume his authority of capitaine generall, against Bernard of Rochfort, there grew such a quarrel betwixt them and their partisans, as Entenza was slaine; wherefore the Infant of Majorca detesting so rash and mutinous an army left them, and thinking to returne into Sicile, fell vpon the Ile of Negrepoint, where hee was slaine and carried prisoner to Saint Omer, a fort of Athens: being put into the hands of Gautier of Brenne, ruling in that country.

Soone after Bernard of Rochfort and Albert his brother, commanding the Castellans at Calipoli, suffred themselves to be surprized by the Gouvernor of Negrepoint called Taliband of Sipoise, who deliuered them to Robert King of Naples, who caused them C to die in prison: by reason whereof the Castellans troupes beganne to ouerrunne the country like made men, without commanders, and without order, and falling vpon the country of Macedonie which was nere, they past through it like a lightning, overthrowing all they encountered, untill they came into the territorie of Athens, whereas the French commanded; slaying there they demanded to be entertained in pay by Duke Gaullier, but hee desirous rather to chafe away this vagabond people, who were poore and insolent, went to encounter them with his forces, to fight with them, by whom notwithstanding hee was defeated and slaine, and almost all his men. By this victory the Castellans made themselves Maistors of all that the French held in that country, and lodged themselves there, whereas since they had many commanders successfully, as D. Manfroy son to D. Frederic King of Sicile, then D. Frederic Alphonso his brother, who remained Gouvernor there, and married the daughter of Boniface of Verona a Nobleman of great power in Negrepoint, with others from thence is come the title of Dukes of Athens to the Princes of Arragon. D. Fernand Infant of Majorca being deliuered out of prison through the favour of Robert King of Naples, his kinsman, married Isabel the heire of Morea by whom he had D. James who was King of Majorca after D. Sancho his vnkle; hee tooke Clarence, and made many other conquests in Morea. D. Fernand to his second wife married a Princesse of Cyprus, of whom Fernand was borne, who was husband to Elshine daughter to Hugues King of Cyprus. After this second marriage, and the birth of this sonne, D. Fernand of Majorca Prince of Morea, hauing performed great matters both in the East and West, died in the floure of his age, about the yeere of our Lord 1315, so as the affaires of the Arragonois in that countrie went to ruine.

He was the third sonne of D. James King of Majorca the first of that name, whose posterity we haue gathered out of histories, after this manner. He had by his wife Eldermonde of Foix, James his eldest sonne, who being wholly giuen to deuotion, left the succession of the realme to his younger brother, and became a Franciscan friar. D. Sancho the second sonne was King after the father, in the yeere of our Lord 1312, who hauing married the daughter of Charles the second King of Naples, named Marie, had no children by her, wherefore dying, hee left the Realme of Majorca, to Don James sonne to his brother D. Fernand above named. Of this first stemme of Majorca, wee finde there issued these three Iohnes, D. James, D. Sancho and D. Fernand, and one daughter named D. Sancho, married to Robert Duke of Calabria; to the which some adde D. Philip the fourth sonne.

But returning to Spaine, we finde that about the time of these last wars of Granado, whereof

A whereof wee haue newly made mention, or soone after, the Nauarrois renewed their old quarrels against them of Arragon, to whom (notwithstanding any accords) they were neuer good friends: so as going out of Pitiella, a place then of the Kingdome of Nauarre, they entred the neighbour country of Arragon, and committed great spoiles, whereas D. James King of Arragon being incensed, hee sent an army to beseege that place, but they were dislodged by the Inhabitants of Sanguette, a frontire towne of Nauarre, being assisted by some French troupes, who fought with them and they were defeated: The Arragonois being returned againe into Nauarre, and hauing runne as farre as the towne of Olite, and forraged the country, they were againe charged by them of Sanguette and other neighbor places, being ready to passe the riuer of Arragon, at the ford of Saint Adrian, and were there defeated with great slaughter of their men, and the losse of the Standard royal of Arragon, which they of Sanguette carried away, by reason whereof, and in remembrance of their vertue and valour, they carry for their armes, by grant from King Lewis Hutin, the bands gueules of Arragon, but in a field argent.

26 In the yeere of our Lord 1312, were the troubles of Lions vpon Rhofne, betwixt the Inhabitants of the towne and their Archbishop Peter of Bresle, by reason that he did vsurpe vpon the Kings Iustice: King Philip sent his sonne the King of Nauarre thither, who tooke this Prelat prisoner, and sent him to the King his father, for which cause, and for that he durst presume to lay his hands vpon an Archbishop, he was called Hutin, or mutin as some say. The citizens of Lion beeing pacified, they mutined againe, by reason of the differences which they had with their Archbishop, but they were lupprest, and punished by the same King of Nauar, and reduced vnder the King, his fathers obedience. It was at that time that Marguerite Queene of Nauar, the Countesse Isabelle of Poitiers & Blanche of la Marche, who had married the three brethren of France, Lewis Hutin, Philip and Charles, were accused of adultery, & put in prison at Chateau Gaillard, of the which the Countesse Isabelle of Poitiers, was found innocent and absolved: but Marguerite Queene of Nauar, and the Countesse Blanche being conuicted, were condemned to perpetual prison, whereas Marguerite died soone after: the adulterers were put to death with cruel torments: the which were Philip and Gautier of Aunoy brethren. An vther of the chamber, who serued as baud and messenger of their lous, was hanged. It is reported of this Queene of Nauar, that seeing any faire yong man passe by, shee caused him to be taken, & brought secretly at night into her chamber, & that after the had taken her dishonest pleasure with him, shee caused him to be cast into the riuer of Seyne, to the end hee should not vaunt thereof: the which was discouered by a scholler, who saved himselfe by swimming, being not wel bound. Thereof grew that ambiguous sentence, Reginam interficere nolite timere bonum est. This vnchastnesse is attributed by some to Isabelle mother to Lewis Hutin, Queene of Nauarre, who was a scourge to the Flemings, and the cause of all the wars betwixt the King and them.

The king D. Fernand about the end of the war of Granado, gaue order for the building of Saueterre, and Azpeity in Guipulcoa, granting then the rights & preuileiges of Victoria: he married his daughter Isabel to Duke John of Brittain, and made D. John Manuel of Castile, sonne to D. Manuel, Lord Steward of his house, taking that dignity from his brother D. Pedro, to whom in recompence he gaue Almagar and Berlanga: whereby it appeares that these offices depended on the kings pleasure. This D. John Manuel had two daughters, which were both Queenes, the one named D. Isabelle, wife to Henry the second King of Castile, and the other D. Constance, married to D. Pedro King of Portugal. During the marriage of Duke John of Brittain, and of D. Isabel at Burgos, the Infant D. John of Castile, alwaies like himself, turbulent & seditious, came nere vnto the city, accompanied with soldiars, & would not enter without assurance, the which was giuen him: yet notwithstanding the King commanded he should be taken and slaine, wherefore he advertised by the Queene mother, vpon whose word hee was chiefly entered into the Citie; hee went forth verie early in the morning, seeming for to goe a hunting, and so escaped: Being pursued in vaine by the Kings men which hee had sent after him. Many knights and among others D. John Nugnes de Lara, detesting the Kings treachery, and withal ill affected to him, followed D. John, and beganne new troubles in the Realme of Castille. The Duke of Brittain gave them leaue to end A their quarrels, and carried away his spouse into Brittain. The Queene mother, with the Archbishop of Saint Iames, and the Bishops of Palence, Lugo and Mondogedo, labored to pacifie, and content these rebels, and in the meane time D. The King of Castille and Aragon, had an interview at Calatajub, where a promise of marriage was made betwixt D. Leonora of Castille, who was but three yeeres old, and the Infant D. James of Aragon, and an other marriage was concluded betwixt D. Pedro brother to the King of Castille and an other marriage was concluded betwixt D. Pedro brother to the King of Castille with Donna Maria daughter to the King of Arragon, and there the two Kings made a new league and confederation against the Infidels, to make warre against whom the King of Castille called an assembly of the Estates of Castille at Villedolit, from whence D. Pedro the Kings brother was sent with an army, to beseege Alcaudete. In the meane time the King staied in Castille, making seizures, and taking by force certaine castles which did belong vnto his Rebels. Afterwards hee came in person into Andalusia where being arrived at Martos, hee caused two knights brethren to bee apprehended, being accused for a murder committed on the person of Don Iohn Alphonso de Bieda, who had bene slaine at Palence, going out of the Kings lodging. These two brethren whom they called Peter and Iohn of Carauajal, being condemned without any great proofes, to bee cast downe head-long from the top of the rocke of Martos, as they were at their execution, protesting of their Innocency, they admooned the King to appeere before the Tribunal seat of Almighty GOD, within thirty daies after, to giue reason of the death which he made them suffer vniuilly: notwithstanding all this, they were executed.

The King being come to the Campe before Alcaudete, hee beganne to beill, and came to Iaca, where hee remained some daies, little regarding his Physitions, in the meane time D. Pedro tooke Alcaudete.

Moore.

IN the realme of Granado, the younger brother having dispossessed the elder, had much ado to be receiued, and obeyed by the Moores Granadins, who resisted him, especially Ferrachen his brother in law, captaine of Malaga: so as Alcaudete could not be releued. The new King Mahumet Aben-Azar. Aben-Lemin, being in some sort settled and assured of his Kingdom, caused his brother that was prisoner to be cruelly slaine, and sent to the King D. Fernand being at Iaca, to renew the league which the Kings his predecessors the King D. Fernand being at Iaca, to renew the league which the Kings his predecessors had with Castille, the which was done, the Infant Don Pedro being present, where amongst other resolutions, it was concluded, that all together should make warre against Ferrachen of Malaga: but the sodaine death of Don Fernand, crossed this designe.

The King being laied to sleepe one afternoone, the thirtieth day from the assignation on which was given him by the two gentlemen which were executed at Martos, when as they of his chamber thought that he slept more then was fit, they entred into his chamber to see what he did, where they found him starke dead, the which was attributed to the iudgement of God. This vnexpected death which happened in the yeere of our Lord 1312. did much trouble the Realme, he was about fife and twenty yeeres old, he had reigned about seuentene, and was buried in the great church at Cordoua.

Marra.

Soone after Philip the French King died, leauing the Crowne and Scepter to Lewis Hutin King of Nauarre his sonne. Some hold that this King Philip had the like adiournment to the iudgement of God, in the towne of Bourdeaux, where there was a knight of the Templers executed in his presence, being borne at Naples, who seeing the

A the Pope and the King at a window, to behold this execution, cried out with a loud voice, seeing there is no worldly power to the which I may appeale from the sentence giuen against the Templers by the Pope, at the Kings instance, I doe adorne them both to appeere before God within one yeere, so as that yeere being 1313. they both died.

An. 1313.

Lewis Hutin had then reigned eight yeeres in Nauarre, when he came to the crowne of France, King Philip the faire his father is noted to be very vnfortunat in many things, both in religion, in the gouernment of his realme, and in his owne house. Hee was neuer in peace with the Church of Rome, in the which (although hee were the eldest sonne) hee caused many scandales, hauing had deadly hatred with the Popes, especially with Pope Boniface the eight, whom hee forced to die miserably: hee transported the Sea of

Rome into France, Clement the fifth being made Pope, whom he used as a fit instrument, in many bad practises, as hatred and couetousnesse did moue him: hee did ruine with a strang cruelty and without discretion the Order of the Templers, which sect, admit it were corrupted yet many deserved better vlsage: he falsified the money in France, exacted tithes of the Clergy, imposed the tribute called Maletofts, and the fifth penny vpon all Marchandise: he was prodigall without iudgement: hee intreated the Flemings vniuilly, and their Princes cruelly, by captiuities and vnworthy vexations, not sparing the innocent virgin Philip daughter to Cont Guy, who had bene giuen him in hostage, whom they say hee caused to be smothered: others affirme hee caused her to be poisoned: some say shee was drowned, with many gentlewomen and maidens of honour which

C did attend her, others, and it may be the most certaine, write, that she died for griefe. All this Kings children died young, their wiues were accused and convicted of adultery, and his owne suspected to haue bene vnchaste: yet hee instituted the Court of Parliament of Paris, and caused the palace to bee built, which may bee numbred amongst his memorable deeds. The first notable act which his sonne Lewis Hutin did after his coming to the crowne of France, was that hee caused Enguerrant of Marigni, Earle of Longueville to be hanged, being accused to haue hindered the King from subduing the Flemings, but the chiefe occasion was, for that he was suspected to haue robbed King Philips treasure, the which was found empty by his children Lewis, Philip and Charles: he had no greater enemy then Charles of Valois the Kings vnkle, to whom Enguerrant had once giuen the

D lie, debating in council of the bad gouernment of that traitor as they say. There is no great memory of that which past in Nauarre, after that King Lewis came to the crowne of France, his daies being but short, for eightene monethes after hee died at Bois de Vincennes, being about foure and twenty yeeres old, leauing Clement his second wife, daughter to Charles the second King of Naples and sister to King Robert, great with child of a sonne, which liued not. Hee had married Clement presently after the condemnation of his first wife Marguerite, by whom hee had one daughter, named Jeanne, who was Queene of Nauarre, but not so soone for attending Queene Clementes delivery, Philip of France, Earle of Poictiers, was chosen Regent of the two Realmes of France and Nauarre, so gouerne them vntill the child which should bee borne, if it

Whatsoeuer it were, this law was then practised, as well in regard of France, as of Nauarre, whereas Philip the Long brother to the deceased King reigned, in the yeere of our Lord 1315. not without great troubles and tumults amongst the Nauarrois.

John of Castille, and D. John Nuges de Lara (two firebrands which had often put the Realme into combustion) hearing of the Kings death, were returned, the one from Valencia, the other out of Portugal, whether they were fled, to ruine the Estate, after their accustomed manner; and seeing that the Infant D. Pedro, brother to the deceased King, by the consent of the Queene, was entred into the manning of the said fautes, and the government of the King, who was at Auila, they came to Vailledolit, and told the Queene Donna Maria, that they were well content she should gouerne, but that they would neuer endure that D. Pedro should haue that authority: and from that time they sought all meanes to get the King into their hands, but the Inhabitants of A- uila, and D. Sancho, their Bishop elect, gaue him so good guards as they labored in vaine, being resolu'd not to giue the possession and government of this yong Prince to any one that were not appointed by the assembly of the Estates: imitating therein the slye- ness and care of their ancestors towards King Alphonso the ninth, whereof followed great factions, and tyranous ciuill warre throughout the whole realme: the ring-leaders where- of, on the one side, were the Infant D. Pedro, a watlike and factious Prince, who had ioyned vnto him on the other the Infant D. John, a warlike and factious Prince, who had ioyned vnto him D. John Nuges, and the fauor of Queene Constance the Kings mother: either of them be- ing followed with a great number of knights: a generall assembly being called at Pa- lence, the deputies of the Estates were also diuided, some desiring that the Queene D. Maria and her sonne D. Pedro should haue the government of the King, and others de- manding that D. John alone should haue this charge: so as there was nothing done, but to animate them more to ruine the publike, and their priuat enemies. The Inhabitants of Auila, without any further respect, did acknowledge the Queene Donna Maria and D. Pedro for tutors to the King, and Gouernors of the realme, yet would they not suffer them to lead the King out of their towne. D. Pedro with this aduantage made a progresse throughout the Realme, and coming to Toledo, and from thence into Andalusia, hee was receiued, and generally obeyed.

Ismael the fifth King of Granada.

Morocco.

Section in Granada against King Mahomet.

IT happened that in the realme of Granada, the citizens of Granada had rebelled against King Mahomet Aben-Azar, the murderer of his brother: the Author of which rebellion was Ismael, the sonne of Ferrachen, and of the Kings sister, who held Malaga. He with the fauor of his father, and of a mighty Moore, of the lignage of the Merin of Maroc, called Ozmin, pursued King Mahomet in such sort, as he shut him vp, and besieged him in the fort of Granada, called Alhambra, the which notwithstanding was well manned with Moores of his party, and strong both by nature and art. D. Pedro aduertised of this disorder by King Mahomet, who was a friend and ally to Castille, and intreated by him to succor him, went to field with such troupes as he could gather together in so short time: but before he could come to Granada, hee had newes that the fort was yielded to Ismael, and that King Mahomet had resequed the realme vnto him, being contented to liue in a priuat Estate in the towne of Guadix, without any other title, then Lord of Guadix: whereupon D. Pedro returned, and came and assaulted the castle of Rute, a verie strong place, and which hee tooke, whilst that the affaires of Granada were yet in disorder. Thus King Mahomet was dispossessed of his crowne, which hee had gotten

A gotten by tyranous cruelty, hauing enioyed it about foure yeeres.

The faction of Castille which followed D. John, assembled in the towne of Sahagun, whereas Queene Constance fell sicke, and died so poore, as shee had beene forced to sell her Jewels to feed her. This death and the prosperities of D. Pedro, made D. John to propound some meanes for an accord, so as he and D. Pedro agreed, that the nourishment of the King should be at the disposition of the Queene Donna Maria his grand-mother, & as for the government, it should be common betwixt them two, as it seemed the Estates of Palence had thought fit: wherewith the Queene D. Maria seemed wel pleased: for at the least shee got by this accord, that the Kings person was deliuered vnto her, whom she led to Toro, in the yeere 1314, where shee caused him to be bred vp, vnder the care of a noble Lady, grand-child to Theodora Lascari, sometimes Emperor of Grece, her name was Vatafa. An other assembly of the Estates was called at Burgos, where it was decreed that the government of the King, and the regency of the realme should be reduced al- to one body betwixt Queene Mary, D. Pedro and D. John, and if any one of them should die, it should remaine to the two others, that did suruiue, and to one if two died. There was an order set downe for the augmenting of the reuenues of the crowne, with many other decrees, for the good of the King and realme. D. John Nuges de Lara died then be- coming come to the assembly of the Estates, and left no children.

The Estates being ended, D. Pedro came into Andalusia, to assist Mahomet Aben-Azar, who held Guadix, being deprived of the realme of Granada, leauing the Queene D. Maria, and the Infant D. John to gouerne in Castille. D. Pedro had an encounter vpon the frontiers with the Moores, whereas hee slue a thousand five hundred, and did afterwards take from them the castle of Cambil and Ardaudos. Mahomet Aben-Azar, caused him- selfe to bee stil called King of Granada, notwithstanding that hee had promised to leaue this title to Ismael: but this victory of D. Pedros freed him, hauing in his company the masters of the knights of Saint Iames and Calatraua. They write that among the Moores which were slaine vpon the place, there were about forty captaines, and almost all the flower of Granada, so as King Ismael found himselfe much weakened, wherefore D. Pedro and his captaines, both this yeere, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1315, and the next following, made many courtes and enterprises in the territory of Granada,

D spoiling the vignes and fields, cuen vnto the city gate, King Ismael making no resistance in field, nor any pursuite, when as they retired charged with spoiles. After this the King of the Moores hauing tried to besiege Gibraltar, hee was repulst, and forced to retire with shame, by D. Pedros army, the which surprized the towne of Belmes, which was ill garded, and then forced the Moores of the castle to yeeld, at which siege they lay three weekes, and yet no succours came from Granada, (being but eight small leagues from thence) but too late, after the yeelding, which succours returned notwithstanding without fighting. During this warre Ismael laboured to haue a truce, or to make an accord with the Christians, but D. Pedro would not harken to it, desiring to roote that race of Infidels out of Spaine, whereof hee seemed to bee in a good way, and in great hope, wherefore they anoyed one another all they could, but King Ismael seeing that in the end he should not be able to subfist, he sent to sollicite the King of Maroc, for the community that was betwixt them in sect and nation, to aide him to defend the realme of Granada against the Christians, the which being lost hee must not thinke that euer the Arabians should haue any access or entry into Europe, for assurance of which African Kings armies, hee not onely offered Algezire, but also all the places which are from Algezire vnto Ronde inclusively; Ronde, Castellar, Axunuea, Estepona, Marbella and others.

29 Whilst that Christian Princes made warre against Infidels, the Clergy and pillars of the Romish Church were not well vnited amongst themselves. After the death of Pope Clement the fifth, the Cardinals being assembled at Carpentras for the election of a new Pope, they grew into so great a fury, as two of them were murdered in the Conclauce, the rest disbanded, and were dispersed throughout France, abandoning all, seeing there was no meanes to accord them.

King Lewis Hutin who liued then, was very careful to pacifie this scandale, causing them all to come to Lions where they held their conclave in the convent of Iacobins, A where after his death, there was chosen by two and twenty Cardinals, James of Oca, Cardinal of Saint Rufinus, Bishop of Portuense, borne at Cahors, who was called Iohn the two and twentieth. This Pope made Sarragossa an Archbishopricke, and likewise Tolouse, and erected Cahors, the place of his birth, to a Bishopricke.

Philip the long, the second of that name, the seuen and twentieth King of Nauarre.

Nauarre.

30 IT was in the yeere of our Lord 1315. that Philip the long came to the crowned France and Nauarre, at whose entrance they beganne to dispute of the law Salique: for many Noblemen were of opinion, that Iohn Posthumus, the sonne of King Lewis Justin being dead, the realmes of France and Nauarre did belong by right of succession to Isabelle of France his daughter, by Marguerite of Bourgongne.

Those which held this partie, were Eude Duke of Bourgongne, Lewis Earle of Nevers, Himbert Dauphin of Viennois, and others of their faction: but Philip, who for the diuersity of opinions and interpretations feared that the law Salique did not extend to the succession of Kingdomes, and that possibly his right was not grounded thereon, contrary to the custome receiued in all other nations, and especially in Nauarre, where of he pretended to disaioynt Isabelle the heire thereof as well as of the crowne of France, heayng also many noblemen which fauoured him, hee wonne his cause, by means of greater efficacy then disputes, and allegations of rights: for hee gaue Isabelle his eldest daughter in marriage to the Duke of Bourgongne, and for doury the countie of Bourgongne her patrimonie: To the Earle of Nevers his second called Marguerite, and Marie the third to the Dauphin: in this manner hee stopp their mouthes, and made them consent with the rest, recoyling Isabelle his Neece not onely from the crowne of France, but also from the Realme of Nauarre, which was not to bee questioned with Force and authority preuailed in this point; besides this Princeesse was not gratus with the French, by reason of her mothers fault. The Nauarrois followed the authority of the French, because they could not withstand it, and receiued Philip the long for their King, that yeere 1315.

Castile.

The Kings Tutors, and the Gouernors of the realme of Castille were required by the Estates in an assembly made at Carrion; to giue caution for their government, and to giue an account what they had done, Don Pedro obtained liberty from the Pope to receiue the tithes, and to proclaime a Croisade against the Moores, against whom hee made violent and successfull warre, as hath bene sayd, whereof his fellow Tutor was enuious, and gaue him many crosses, to draw him into danger; of such force is enuie, that to preiudice an other, hee doth often bring ruine vnto himselfe, and to a whole Estate.

Thus the affaires of great Monarkes are often times ill managed by them, who haue the most important charges, who being loth to yeeld one vnto another, in that which concerns the good and profit of the State and the seruice of their Prince, and being alwaies enuious of the honour and glory of their companions, let slippe occasions, dissemble, delay, and had rather incur the perpetuall infamy of traitors, cowards and peruerse emulators, then to aide one another in a good action.

Thus did D. Iohn against D. Pedro, crossing and hindring his gallant designs and enterprises of warre, vpon the Moores frontiers, whilst that hee gouerned within the heart of the Realme; sometimes slaying the Nobility of Castille and Leon from going to D. Pedro, sometimes keeping backe the treasure, and alwaies finding meanes to crosse him, and to make the people lesse obedient vnto him, so as the Queene Donna Maria, who was a verie wise Ladie, and saw cleerely into these troubles and bad affections, had

A had much toyle to keepe them from an open diuision: and did often and wisely call an assembly of the Estates to that effect, sometimes at Vaileadolid for the Castilians, and sometimes at Medina del campo for them of Leon and Extremadura.

In their year 1317. Don Berenger Arch-bishop of Saint Lemes, brought a commandment and censures from the Pope to put Don Alphonso de la Cerde in possession of the lands and goods which were adiudged by the Arbitrators at Tarassone; whereunto the Gouernours would not obey, but sent their reasons to the Pope, excusing themselves, that the Infant had not for his part kept the conditions set downe in the sentence.

31 Don Pedro notwithstanding the enuie which his vnkle Don Iohn bare vnto him, did still seeke to annoy the Moores all he could, and in the beginning of the year, 1319. he resolved to beseege the towne of Tiscar, which was held by a Moore, called Mahomet Andon, and was one of the strongest places in Spaine: yet the happines, iudgement, and good fortune of Don Pedro were such, as (notwithstanding it was with great toyle and danger of the souldiers) it was taken: whereat euen the Christians themselves wondered, considering the strength of the place. The castell made some resistance after the taking of the towne, but in the end it yeelded by composition: That the Moores which were within it with their Lord Mahomet Andon, should depart with bag and baggage, the which was granted and kept. 4500. soules went out of the place, and were put in safety into Baena. This did increate Don Iohns enuie against the prosperities of Don Pedro: wherefore he approached then vnto the frontiers, being thrust on by ielousie, to attempt something against the Moores for his part: hee came to Baena, euen as Don Pedro prepared to beseege the towne of Belmar, being aduertised of Don Iohns coming, he marched that way, that they might ioyn their forces together, and do some notable exploit in the enemies countrie. Having ioyned at Alcudete with great demonstrations of loue, they led the armie ioynly through the champion countrie towards Granado, whereof Don Iohn led the foreward, and hauing taken the castell of Ylora, they presented themselves before Granado, standing a whole day in battell in the fight thereof, and yet king Ismael neuer sallied forth, not sent any one forth to skirmish with them, nor to discouer them.

Don Pedro was of opinion to begin the sege, but Don Iohn held it fittest to retire, saying, that they neither had men enough, nor munition sufficient to beseege such a towne: whereas the king was in person, accompanied with all the flower of his knights and souldiers, and an incredible multitude of people: for at that time they thought there liued within that citie about 200000. persons, although there were scarce 500. heads of families: Moores by race, for all the rest were Christians Renegados or their descendants, or Christian slaves.

Vpon these perswasions, the Princes and Captaines began to turne head, hauing changed the order of their march, Don Iohn being in the rereward. When as the Granadins saw them dislodge, king Ismael sent forth his men, commanding them to charge the enemy in the rereward, and to presse them in such sort, as they might put them out of order, if it were possible, and that they should not then forget that which the discipline of warre required: the which they did execute resolutely, so as Don Pedro was forced to turn head with the foreward to succour Don Iohn: but the disorder was such amongst Don Pedros men, as he could not bring them to march in Battaille, nor to keep any good order: where hee tormented himselfe in such sort, hauing his sword drawne, crying sometimes to one, sometimes to another, as he was out of breath, and lost his speech, and in an instant by this strange accident he fell downe dead from his horse: the which being reported to D. Iohn who saw himselfe in danger, the contrarie of passions wherewith he was afflicted, were of such force, as it happened to him as to his nephew, so as loosing his speech, hee amazed from his horse. The armie hauing lost their two Commanders, notwithstanding any indeauour of the Arch-bishop of Toledo, and the Masters of the militarie Orders of S. Lemes and Calatrava, all were put to rout, and were pursued farre by the Moores with great slaughter, who spoyled their campe, and ceased their pursuit: wherefore the Christians which were about Don Pedro that was dead, and Don Iohn drawing towards his end had meanes to escape, laying him that was alieue on an horse, and the dead bodie vpon a moyle: but being surprized by the night, they which conducted Don Iohn marching ching more slowly then the rest, saw him expire: wherefore fearing to be pursued, they A left the bodie vpon the field, and saued themselves as they could. Don Iohn left one son of the same name, who for that he had lost an eye, was called the blind, and was his heire and successor in the Segneurie of Biscaia. He sent to intreat King Ismael to send him his fathers bodie. The King caused it to be fought for, which being found, hee commanded it should be brought to Granado, where it was layed in a great hall, in the fort of Alhambra; vpon a herfe covered with rich cloth of gold, setting a great number of waxe tapers about it, the king commanding the Noblemen, and knights Moores, with all the Christians captiues that were in Granado, to pray about the dead body: doing many other solemnities after their manner, then he sent to D. Iohn, that he should send for his fathers bodie, which he gaue him willingly, being sorry for the accident which had happened, for Don Iohn had neuer done him wrong. Don Iohn the blind sent many Knights thither, to whom the bodie was deliuered, and they were accompanied to the first towne of the Christians, then they tooke their way to Cordoua, from thence it was transported to Burgos, whither they had carried D. Pedro, and there they were interred. By this unexpected victorie the affaires of Ismael king of Granado grew in reputation and force, recovering many places which had bene lost before. Don Iohn Manuel the sonne of D. Manuel of Castile maintaining the warre against the Moores. Towards Murcia Ismael tooke Huelcar, Ores, and Galere, places belonging to the Order of Saint James: and returning towards Andalusia, he besieged Martos, and tooke it by force, commanding them to kill all they found aliue in it: yet most of them saued themselves in the fort, and defended it against the Moores, who lost many of their best men: and among others, a Nephew to C Ozmin, the which gaue great occasion of murmure against king Ismael, for that he did so hazard his Nobility in these dangerous assaults. In this estate stood the warre of Granado, the which was ended with them of Andalusia, vpon king Ismaels returne to Granado, vpon condition, that the Castilians, being ready to chuse new tutors for the yong king D. Alphonso, should not receiue nor acknowledge any; but that should confirme this true.

Castile.

During these alterations, the Q. D. Maria was gone into Portugal, where the had conference with her son-in-law, D. Alphonso Infant of Portugal, at Font d'Aguileto, a Bourg of Cite Roderigo, & frō thence was returned with the yong K. of Castile to Toro, where the had newes of the miserable end of D. Pedro and D. Iohn: whereupon she made present dispatches to all the chiefe townes of the realme, and to the Noblemen, aduertising them D of this disaster, and exhorting them to continue faithfull vnto the king her grand-child, and not to receiue commandement from any, but from him or them that should bee appointed by the Estates: for the feared D. Iohn Manuel, who was rich and mighty, and delirous of innouations, would seeke to attaine to the Regencie of the king and Realme: and saw on the other side, that D. Iohn the blind had the like ambition: against whom the Q. opposed D. Philip her son, (but as the most certaine Authors say D. Alphonso) vnto the king D. Alphonso. All these Noblemen being well followed, and keeping the field with good troupes of soldiers, they were ready to ioyne in battell neere vnto Auila, the which E was preuented by D. Iohn Manuel. The Infant D. Fernand de la Cerde, who was Lord Steward to the king, was an actor in these ciuill seditions, so as the realmes of Castile, Leon, and their appurtenances, were full of all excesse, violence, and insolencies, the which continued long: notwithstanding that the Estates had chosen for tutors D. Philip or Don Alphonso, D. Iohn Manuel, and D. Iohn the blind in the year 1320. In the meane time the K. D. Alphonso to make his name more reuerent among his subjects, granted certaine priuiledges vnto townes, and among others, to wall in a Bourg, called Renteria, the which was named Villanoua of Ojarcum in Guipuzcoa, and gaue it the title of a town, & the priuiledges of S. Sebastian from whence it is but a league distant. The Infant D. Philip, or Alphonso, sware the truce made betwixt the king of Granado and them of Andalusia, where in the Citie of Cordoua was comprehended, for that they had giuen their voice for the gouernement of the King to Don Iohn Manuel, against whome King Ismael was F incensed.

This yeare D. Iohn, Infant of Arragon, son to the king D. James the 2. was consecrated Archb. of Toledo, in the towne of Lercida in Cattelogne, in stead of D. Gonzales deceased, many Tumults in Castile for the gouernment.

An. 1320.

A many Prelates beeing present, and namely, D. Ximenes de Luna Arch-bishop of Tafragone, and Don Pedro de Luna, first Arch-bishop of Saragossa, erected to that dignitie in the year 1318. by Pope Iohn the 22. ouer the Bishops of Pampelona, Calahorra, Calatassone, Huelca, Segobia, and Albarazin. These two Arch-bishops of Tarragona, and Saragossa did watch if the new Arch-bishop of Toledo, as Primate of Spaine, would march through their Dioceses with his crosse before him, to the end they might oppose themselves by vertue of a certaine Constitution made at the Council of Tarragona, and so it happened: whereupon the Arch-bishop of Toledo and all his followers were excommunicated by them, for entering into their Iurisdiccions: which censure and excommunication was published by him of Saragossa: whereat the King Don James was much offended, and did write vnto the Pope, making great complaints of this manner of proceeding: but being afterwards perswaded that it was done to maintaine the dignity of the Churches of his Realme, he was pacified. The Primate appealed from their sentences and proceeded against them. The Pope calling the deciding of this question to the Apostolicke sea, absolved the Arch-bishop of Toledo in the meane time, and gaue him facultie to absolve his followers and seruants. He was the seuen and fiftieth Arch-bishop of this sea, Primate of Spaine.

At the same time, or litle before, the king of Arragon had giuen to the knights of Monteca, the towne and castell of Monteca, whereof this Order carries the name: the first Master was William of Errill, who tooke the white habite of Calatrava, in the year 1319. In the Monasterie of Santa Cruz, from the hands of the Commander of Alcaniz. These knights had some yeares after facultie to leaue the habite of Cisteaux, and in stead thereof to carrie a redde crosse vpon their breasts granted by Pope Benedict the thirteenth, and confirmed by Pope Martin the fifth. The King D. James by the aduice of his Estates held at Tarragona, did make a perpetuall vnion of the Realmes of Arragon and Valencia, and the principallitie of Cattelogne, the which from that time, should not for any occasion be di- united. In which assembly, the Infant Don James the eldest and heire to the Crown, being ready to marrie D. Leonora of Castile, suddenly by a strange affection, quitting both his wife, and so goodly a succession as that of the Realme of Arragon, told the king his father, that he had made a vow neither to marrie nor to raigne: so as notwithstanding all the perswasions of the king and Noblemen, he quit his birth-right to his brother D. Alphonso, after the example of Esaú. Beeing there let at liberty by the king, he discharged the Estates of the oath they had made vnto him, and presently put on the habite of the Knights of Ierusalem, the which he receiued by the hands of Bernard Solier, in the presence of his brother Don Iohn Arch-bishop of Toledo, Don Symon of Luna, Arch-bishop of Tarragona, Berenger Bishop of Vic, and Raymond of Ampurias, Prior of S. Iohn in Cattelogne, and others. Afterwards this ill aduised Prince, hauing left this Order, became one of Monteca, where he spent his dayes in dissolutenes and filthy pleasures. This age afforded other such like examples in Don James, eldest sonne to the king of Maiorca, and Lewis sonne to Charles the lymping king of Castile, who became Franciscan Friars: but they were moued by zeale of religion, and were not giuen to vices. His second brother D. Alphonso was by the same Estates of Tarragona acknowledged, and sworne heire of those kingdomes after the decease of Don James their father. This Infant had married D. Theresa of Entenza, and had in her right the County of Urgel, which came vnto her by succession from her vnclē Don Armingol of Cabrera, vpon condition she should marrie the Infant Don Alphonso: of which marriage was borne at that time Don Pedro, who was king of Arragon, the fourth of that name. At the same Estates of Arragon were pacified the quarrels betwixt Don Artal of Alagon, and Don Symon Cornely, who kept the Realme in diuision: and that according to the aduice and order of the Magistrate called the Iustice Maior of Arragon, called Symon Peres of Salanoua, the parties should vndergo the iudgement of the King and his Estates. Doubtlesse the authority of this Magistrate at that time was great, who might both censure the King and the Estates, and appoint them a place, and admit them that did assist, or reiect them.

But returning to the affaires of Castile, the election of Don Iohn of Arragon to the Arch-bishopricke of Toledo, did not much please the Queene D. Maria, fearing he would would not greatly fauour D. Alphonso king of Castile, but would alwaies hold the partie of Don Manuel his brother-in-law, who was a mighty Prince in Castile, and wonderfull factious: but the Pope assured the contrarie, and past his election: and to speake the truth he neuer supported D. John Manuel in any action that was preiudiciall to the King, although that Toledo and the iurisdiction thereof were in his gouernment, by reason of the turtelage: so as they fell to such debate, as Pope Lohn was forced to send a Cardinal Legate into Spaine, to reconcile them, and to bring the Archbishop into his sea, the which he had abandoned. The Queene D. Maria hauing called the Estates at Palence, in the year 1322. as she prepared her selfe to go thither, she fell sicke at Vaileddolit, wherof she dyed, to the great griefe of all good men: for by her wisedome and bountie, she had bene the support and onely defence of Spaine, against the rebellious and ambitious desires of Princes and Noblemen, wherein she laboured wonderfully, with great happinesse and commendable successe. The young king and the Realme were deprived of this support, for the which he soone after smarted. The Queenes bodie was layed in the Monastie of las Huelgas at Vaileddolit, which she had caused to be built, hauing also founded in her time that of Saint Paul in the same towne, and that of the preaching Friars at Toro, with others. We read as a memorable thing, vpon the religious exercises, and concerning the diuine seruice, in the Constitutions of D. John Arch Bishop of Toledo then liuing, that the Priests do offer the Hostie at the least foure times in the yere, and that after Morning prayer.

The same yere the Estates being assembled in the towne of Siracusa in Sicile, the king Don Frederick caused his sonne Don Pedro to be crowned king with him, and they reigned together in that lland. Don Pedro did afterwards marrie Isabel daughter to John King of Bohemia, or of Henry Duke of Carinthia, as some say. It was at such time as the expedition was made for the conquest of Sardinia, wherof D. Alphonso, Infant of Aragon, was General by the resolution of the Estates, held at Gyrene, and in consideration of the subuention giuen by them for the charges of that warre. We haue sayd before, that the llands of Sardinia and Corsica had bene giuen in fee by Pope Boniface the eight vnto Don Lames King of Arragon, and to his successors males or females paying a certain rent to the Church of Rome, for an acknowledgement of Soueraigntie, and that hee should conquer them at his owne perill. The same donation had bene confirmed by Pope Benedict in the year 1304. to the same king Don Lames, and facultie giuen him to leaue the tythes for this conquest, and a Legate appointed to assist therein: but it was deferred by reason of other lets. The reasons which moued the Popes to make this donation, were their passions and hatred against the common-weales of Genoua and Pisa, who commanded in those llands: but the pretext was, that these llands lying in the Mediterranean sea, as a barre betwixt Affricke and Italy, diuiding it from the North to the South, they entertained the Potentates of Italy, especially these two common-weales of Genoua and Pisa, who were then very strong at sea, in continuall quarrels and warre, most pernicious for Christendome: fighting for the possession thereof, with great effusion of blood, and wasting of their forces and treasures, the which they should haue employed in better occasions, against the Infidels, vnder this colour, the fame of the Castilians and Arragonois and of their Princes being then great, it seemed expedient for the suppressing of all ieaousie and quarrell betwixt the Geneuois and Pisans, to take from them the right of these llands, and to transferre them to a greater power, which might be able to keep and defend them from the inuasions of Sarracons and Arabians, who still made some breach there. The conquest therefore of the lland of Sardinia being vnderaken in the time of Pope John the 22. sitting in Auignon, by this king D. Lames the 2. there were many ships of warre and burthen prepared, as well in a port called Fangoso, vnder Tortosa, at the mouth of Ebro, as at Barcelona, Tarragone, Valencia & other places of that coast, wher-in they spent much time, whilst that the king D. Lames tooke his fourth wife Eclifende sister to Othom of Moncada, a woman of good yeares: and he made D. Pedro his son Earle of Ribagorça and Ampurias, the last Earle Mangolin being dead without children. And for that the enterprise seemed difficult, by reason of the Pisans power, who enioyed the lland, and had newly made a peace with the Geneuois, the king of Arragon did sollicite Pope

A Pope John the 22. by his Ambassador Fidal of Villanoua, to assist him in this warre with his meanes and fauour, to the Princes of Italy: but this Pope being distastied by certaine Cardinals which fauoured the Pisans, sought to diuert this enterprise all he could: exhorting the king of Arragon rather to porsue his right by Iustice, then by armes: notwithstanding the fleet being in a manner readie to set sayle, and the king persisted in his resolution, and bound himselfe to pay great tributes vnto the Church. At that time the chiefe men in the lland were Brancalton of Oria, and Hagues Vicont of Bassit: this last being corrupted by the king of Arragon, shewed himselfe an enemy to the Pisans, and began the war of Sardinia with happie successe. The king drew vnto his partie Guelphe Earle of Donoratico, Kinman to Caidinall Luke Fieser, and suddenly sent Dalmis Vicount of Rocabertin, and his vnle Girard, Berrand of Castelet, and Hugh of S. Paix Cattelans, with 200. horse, and 2000. foot, to fortifie his partisans in the lland. Whilst that the armie assembled in the port of Fangoso, where there met about the end of Iune, in the year 1233. sixty galleies, and 20. ships armed, and about twice as many other vessels carrying victuals and baggage. The Infant D. Alphonso parted with his fleet, vnder the conduct of Francisco Carrogo Admirall, and came with a good wind to the port of S. Marke, neere vnto the ruines of the ancient cittie of Sull, a Colony of the Carthaginians. The souldiers being landed, began to presse the towne from the Church, in the which were Barnabes d'Oria sonne to Brancalton and other Capitaines, who after long resistance yielded into the Infant D. Alphonso. The citties of Caillieri, Eglise, Aquafredda, Iosafuarda, Orguilos, Oleastro, Quirano, Patra and other places, held good for the Pisans: whilst they battered the towne of Eglise, the Admirall Francisco Carrogo, with 20. galleies beleeged the port of Caillieri, and Dalmis Vicount of Rocabertin by land, seized vpon an hill which commanded the castell, or fort of that city: but this place was relected by Manfroy sonne to Regnier, one of the Earles of Donoratico, who came to Terranova with 25. galleies of Pisa, and some number of souldiers, the which hauing landed at Decimo, a Bourg so called, for that it is ten myles from Caillieri: by the fauour of his armie, he gathered together a great number of Sardes, and fortified himselfe in such sort, as hee presumed to offer battaile to the Arragonois. Those that were before the towne of Eglise were wonderfully afflicted with sicknesse, which grew through the bad disposition of the ayre of Sardinia, and euen the Infant D. Alphonso was in danger of death, yet persisting at the sege, the towne being prest by force, and want of victuals, it was yielded, hauing held out eight moneths: during the which many dyed through the infection of the pestilent ayre, Don Artal de Luna, and his sonne of the same name, Gambault of Beneuent Dalmis of Chastelnoua, Girard of Rocabertin, Gillebert Centillas, Pedro Querauls, Raymond Berenger Cerruillon, Raymond Alleman, Galcerand S. Paix, and Raymond of Cardona, all men of note: so as the taking of the towne of Eglise, cost the Arragonois deare. After this exploit, the Infant D. Alphonso led the armie to the sege of Caillieri, against whom Manfroy aduanced with those Pisans which he had brought, and some Sardes gathered together, where there was a fierce and bloudie battell: but the Arragonois had the victorie, hauing lost D. Alleman de Luna, nephew to D. Symon de Luna Arch bishop of Tarragone, who was much lamented: Manfroy being wounded, saued himselfe in the fort of Caillieri: and at that instant there arriued 18. galleies of supplies to the Infant D. Alphonso from Barcelona. Wherefore the towne and fort of Caillieri were more straightly and violently battered then before, so as the beleeged being reduced to great extremities, following the aduise of Manfroy their Captaine, and by his leading, made a sudden sally forth with all their horle, (among the which were 500. souldiers, the best and most resolute spirits among all the Pisans) and charged the Arragonois army, with great terror and amazement: yet through the diligence of the Infant and his Capitaines, the enemy was repulled, with the losse of three hundred horse. Here Manfroy was grievously wounded againe, whereof, and for griefe of this last losse, he died soone after; the which draue the beleeged into such despaire, that hauing aduertised the Pisans of their estate, and they sent a demand a peace of the king D. Lames, being at Barcelona, by the meanes and negotiation of Brancalton d'Oria, they came to composition vpon these conditions: That the city and castell of Caillieri should be yielded vp to the Infant, and the prisoners of either either part deliuered; which city and castell should be deliuered againe vnto the Pifans, A vpon condition, that they should hold it, and all they enioyed in Sardinia, in fee and homage of the crowne of Arragon; Yea some Authors among the Arragonois say, that the city it selfe of Pifa, and that it should be lawfull for the Pifans to trafficke in Catalogne and Arragon, and to haue a Confull in the city of Barcelona. These things being accorded and performed, the Infant D. Alphonso gaue many castles, lands and reuenues to Noblemen and Gentlemen which had serued faithfully and valiantly in this warre, in the which many gallies of Majorca had continued. He left D. Philip de Salces Gouverneur of Sardinia, and Commander of the men of warre, and D. Berenger Carrofo, sonneto Don Francis, to command the gallies which were left there for the guard of the Iland. Hauing thus disposed of the affaires, the army imbarked at Saint Macaire, and sayled with their Generall D. Alphonso towards Barcelona, where they arriued with a prosperous wind, a bout the beginning of August, in the year 1324. There were great signes of ioy made at the landing of this victorious armie, and thank-giuing vnto God in the city of Barcelona; but some write, that the king Don James going forth to meet his sonne triumphing and full of glorie, for the warre of Sardinia to happily ended, seeing him attired in the habit of a Sarde, he grew sad, and would not speake vnto him, vntill hee had taken a more seemely garment: wherefore in the midst of this pompe, the Infant put on his coate of armes, and then the king his father embraced him, and honored him much, saying aloud, that he tooke great delight to see him attired like the Commander of a victorious warre, and not in the habit of a slaue. After the conquest of Sardinia, the king D. James was followed by Castruccio Castracani, gouerning at that time at Luca, to make the expedition of Corsica against the Geneuois, promising that he would provide them such worke in Italy, as the enterprise of that Iland should be easie: but Barnabas d'Oris, who was then in fauour with the king D. James, diuerted him, shewing that it should bee more expedient and profitable, to pacifie the chiefe Noblemen of Corsica, and to draw them to his seruice. The affaires of Sardinia continued not long quiet, as we will shew: but it is necessary to relate first what pass in the other parts of Spaine, during these wars and conquests of the Arragonois.

35 In Portugal there was then erected the Order of Knights of Christus, by Bulls from Pope John in the year 1320. by the which it was receiued into the protection of the Apostolike sea of Rome, and the towne of Castro Marin assigned for the chiefe of this Order, being neere vnto the Moors, and since the conuent was transported to Tour. The knights of this Order carry a red crosse split and opened by the four branches, with a white line, so as one crosse makes two, the one red, the other white. The election of the Master belongeth to 13. persons: that is, the Prior, the Commander maior, the Treasurer, the Secretary, and nine Commanders. The election was made, euery one of these 13. gi-uing his voyce: the which being publicly pronounced, he that had most voyces was chosen Master. The first was D. Gil Martinez, who had beene Master of the militarie Order of Aunis. The elect is bound (swearing in the Priors hands) to promise to bee in fauour with the Pope, and the Church of Rome, and to present himselfe vnto the King, to do him the homage of fealty. The Commanders of this Order, are, the Prior, the great Commander, the Treasurer, Secretary, Commander of Arquin, of Rodano, of Prouença, Ollas, Castilejo, Sanacheira, Prucos, Segura, Lardoça, and Derofmanichal. Since there hath been added the Commanderies of S. Michel, and S. Mary in the Ilands, by the king Don Mannuel. In the year 1323. the king D. Denis endowed this Order with priuiledges fit for the dignity thereof, and the ornament of his religion. The same year D. Beatriz wife to the Infant D. Alphonso, was brought in bed of a son in the city of Coimbra, who was named Peter, and raigned after his Grandfather and father: This king Denis was in so great esteem among the Portugals, as they haue a Prouerbe in vie at this day: El Rey D. Denis, que fez quanto quiz, that is to say, The king D. Denis who did all he would. It is as well by reason of the institution of these militarie Orders, as of many foundations and remembrances he left of him: as the Monasterie of S. Francis of Portalegre, and the Monasterie of Nuns of the Order of Cisteraux, or S. Bernard: of S. Denis, of Odiuela a league and a halfe from Lisbon, where he appointed his body should be interred: and other public workes,

A workes, as caueys, towers, castles, walles, fortifications, and reparations of townes with cur number. By him the new street of Lisbon, so much esteemed in Portugall, was made, as also the castles of Serpa, Moura, Oliuencia, Campo maior, Argela and the fortresse: that of Portalegre, Odiana, Marban, the castell of Abibe, Alegrete, Monches, Monfort, Beyros, Arroyolos, Hebora monte, Bosba, Villauiciofa, Montcarraz, Redondo, Model, Beja, Geromena, Sabugal, Alfayates, Castelrubio, Villamaior, Castel-lobon, Castellomejor, Almeida, Castelmendo, and Pinel, most of the which were walled in by this king. He did also wall in Braga, Guimaranes, Miranda of Duero, with the Castell of Monçon, and Carastolo. He built new Muija, Saluetteer, Montargel, Atalaya, Acerceyra, and many others, which we will omit for breuities sake. The king Don Denis spent his time, and employed his treasure in such things. He had some warre against Ca-stille in fauour of the rebels and otherwise; as we haue formerly related: and moreover, against his owne brother, whom he spoiled of his lands, forcing him to retire into Ca-stille to his wiues kindred. Towards the end of his dayes, there was no good agreement betwixt him and his sonne Don Alphonso: for the sonne bred such a reuolt and sedition throughout the whole Realme, as he was often in armes against the father, and ready to give battell, neere to Coimbra, Saint Iren, Albaran and else where, being thrust on by flatterers and counsellors of iniquity: which disorders Queene Isabel, a Princeesse full of piety, did happily repaire, and prevented the effusion of blood, praying continually vnto God for concord betwixt the father and sonne, the which shee obtained before the decease of the king her husband, which was in the year 1325. hauing reigned 45. yeares, nine moneths, and 5. dayes, and the 64. of his age. He dyed at S. Iren, and was interred in the Monasterie of S. Denis of Odiuelas, as hee had ordaind by his testament, by the which he gaue 140000. lyures of money then currant in Portugall, to be distributed to poore hospitals, monasteries, widowes, orphelins, marrying of maydens, redemption of prisoners, and such like, at the discretion of the Queene his wife, and the Executors of his testament. Besides, his lawfull children, he had by one, or by diuers concubines, Don Alphonso, the beginner of the family of Albuquerque, Don Pedro, who gaue himselfe to studie, and hath compiled a Volume of the great Houses of Spayne, D. John, and D.
Fernand, one daughter that was married to D. Iohn de la Cerde, and one daughter a Nun:
This holy Queene Isabel, daughter to Don Pedro the third king of Arragon, and of Donna Constance daughter to Manfred king of Naples, was married being but eleuen yeares old, and carried her selfe so wisely and religiously, as she was admired and honoured of all men: she shewed in her royall estate a wonderful humilitie and modestie: shee laboured with her hands to auoyde idleness, and what shee made shee gaue away for Gods sake, wherein shee did not spare her means which were otherwise great: fasting and prayer were her delights, and she was in continuall anguish for her sins, and for her peoples: she serued God as she had beene instructed, by gifts, offerings, Masses, and suffrages without measure. Finally, she was so giuen to contemplation, and to the spirit, as she tooke no delight in any thing that pleased the senses: shee fledde and forooke (as much as possibly shee could) all royall Pallaces, being the Magazine of delights, and of perverse affections, so as the king Don Denis who was of a contrarie disposition, made small account of her, giuing himselfe often to vnlawfull and lustfull loues, by whom hee had children, the which this good and vertuous Queene caused to bee bredde vp as her owne, although shee were wonderfully afflicted to see this bad course of the King her husband; fearing, and rightly, that God would punish him: for this consideration shee pray continually for his amendment, which happened in the end. The K. D. Denis did oft vie her roughly, wherein she shewed such patience, as she neuer vsed any word of complaint, but only prayed to God to let him vnderstand the truth: yea when she was in a maner chaled from his presence, and retired to her house at Alenguer, by reason of the quarrels betwixt the father and the son, whereof the minions of the Court layd all the blame vpon her, perswading the king that shee intertayned them, against all likelihood of truth. Shee did wonderfully esteem the Orders of begging Friars, thinking that their estate was the most perfect among the Christians, and therefore shee gaue as well to them within the realme as without. Shee built the monastery of S. Clair the royal of Coimbra, she finished the house of the Innocents at S.Iren, the which was begunne by D. Martin Bishop of La Garde; and did the like to the Monasterie of Almofter of Nunnes, the which was begun by a Lady called D. Berenguela Ayres; and after the decease of the King her husband, these gaue herself wholly to a religious life, and tooke vpon her the habit of S. Claire, which she vied euer after: she fouled her Jewels, and conuerted them into Ornaments and vessels to serue churches, the which she gaue to many Monasteries. Shee went vnknowne on foot to visit the Sepulcher of S. James, asking almes, and past her dayes in like workes with great zeale: she dyed in the towne of Elstremos, whether she went to mediate a peace betwixt her sonne and the king of Castile her grand-child, borne of her daughter. Besides these aboue-named workes, she had built at Torrefinuous a Monasterie of repentants, and at Leyra an hospital of poore bathfull men. Her body was carried to Coimbra, and layd in the Monasterie of Santa Cruz. The apparitions which the Spaniards write happened vnto her in her life time, and at her death, with such like things, are the impressions of Monkes of those times.

Castile.

36 As for the affaires of Castile, wee find, that after the decease of the Queene D. Maria, (who by her wisdom preuented many mischiefs) the troubles grew greater then euer: all Iustice ceased, and the most insolent were most in credit. King Don Alphonsus, although he were young, was much discontented at these disorders, and fought to redresse them, but he was not obeyed: so as by reason of the violences, tyrannies, ruine of places, murders, and other such wickednesse, which then raigned, he saw his subjects abandon their houses, and retire into Arragon, Nauarre, Portugall and else-where, there to secke peace and rest: the Gouvernours were the cause of all these miseries, vsing the people of their Iurisdiccions tyrannously, being in perpetuall discord among themselves. Those that were of the priuie Councell aduised him to leaze vpon the places belonging to D. Blanche his Cousin, daughter to the deceased Don Pedro, the which were in the hands of Garçilaso de la Vega, in the name of Donna Maria of Arragon her mother: for that (sayd they) it was not fit the King of Arragon should meddle much in the affaires of Castile, nor that he should know all the vices of that kingdome, the which hee did, more then was conuenient, by the means of these places, and vnder colour to procure the good of Donna Blanche his Grand-child, watching in the meane time to make his profit with the prejudice of Castile.

See is taken from the de l'ishop of Toled
do.

He which was most vehement in this Councell, was Don Garçilaso himselfe, being Marin Maior of Castile. Don Iohn of Arragon Arch-bishop of Toledo, was by that reason suspected of them, hauing for his chiefe aduersarie Don Iohn Manuel, one of the Kings tutors, who had his gouernement in the Countrey of Toledo, and against whose disordinate desires, the Arch bishop of Toledo, (a better seruant to the King then they esteemed him) had alwaies opposed himselfe. So as they treated secretly with the king to take the royall seales from him, for they held it dangerous, that an Arragonois should be Chancellor of the Realme; who by reason of that dignity was priuie to all that was treated and resolved in the kings Councell.

According to this resolution, there was an occasion offered: The Arch-bishop being in the Kings Pallace, and being demanded of the affaires of the Bishopprieke, touching the Estate, and the kings reuenues, hee excused himselfe vpon the actions of Don Iohn Manuel his brother-in-law, who was there present, who answered very peemptorily for himselfe, so as there were bitter words betwixt them in the Kings presence. For this cause soone after the seales were taken away, and giuen to Don Garçilaso de la Vega: whereas the Arch-bishop Don Iohn being much discontented, hee neuer ceased vntill hee had exchanged his Arch-bishopprieke of Toledo, with that of Tarragone, causing Don Iohn de Luna, to be aduanced to the Archiepiscopall dignitie of Toledo, and Primacie of Spaine by Pope Iohn.

37 In the meane time came the yeare 1326. when as the King tooke vpon him the gouernement of his Realme, at a Parliament held at Vaileddolit, whereas D. Philip or Alphonsus, Don Iohn Manuel, and Don Iohn the Blind were discharged of their administration, which they had managed with great scandall. There did the king sweare to obserue the fundamentall Lawes of the Realme, and to administer Iustice, maintaining euer

A euerie one in his estate, goods, and honour. To whome also the Deputies of the Estates did sweare fidelitie, and offered the rights and ordinarie seruices due vnto the Crowne. This done, the King did choofe two wife Knights to bee of his Councell of State, Don Garçilaso de la Vega, aboue-named, and Almar Nuges Osorio; and for his treasure a lew called Isoph of Ecchia, to whome he gaue the Superintendencie of the Customes, Impoles, Kents and Reuenues of the Realme.

In the disposition whereof, hee did not gouerne himselfe by the aduice of Don Iohn Manuel, nor Don Iohn the Blind, nor did much esteeme them: whereat being ialous and discontented, they parted from Vaileddolit without taking any leaue of the King, and made a league together at Cigales. The king was soone aduertised hereof, and did in few dayes breake this plot, making himselfe sure to Donna Constance Manuel, daughter to Don Iohn Manuel at Vaileddolit: but this marriage tooke no effect: and he gaue vnto Don Iohn Manuel, (to draw him vnto him) the gouernement of the frontier. Thus was Don Iohn the Blind abandoned, so as hee was more incensed then before: this Prince entertayned such bad designes, as his end was miserable. Hee sought to marrie Donna Blanche daughter to Don Pedro of Castile, to the end hee might enioy the places which shee held vpon the frontier of Arragon, and from thence make warre against the King Don Alphonsus: Hee made a league with the new King of Portugall against him, and attempted all meanes to annoy his Prince, notwithstanding that the king Don Alphonsus tryed all waies to pacifie him, so as he was forced to vse more violent remedies.

38 During these home-bred troubles of Castile, Ismael king of Granado was slaine by his subjects, vpon this occasion. Among the prisoners which the Moores had brought from Martos, there was a Christian woman, exceeding fayre, who fell into the hands of the kings Cousin, sonne to the Gouvernour of Algezire, who was called Mahomet. This prisoner being seene by king Ismael, he grew so in loue with her, as he demanded her of Mahomet: who yielding more vnto his desires, then to the respect hee ought vnto his Prince, refused him plainly: whereupon the king gaue him many bitter and threatening words: Mahomet either for feare or disdain, to haue beene threatened with iniurious words, layed a plot with Ozmin, who was already much discontented for the death of his sonne, whome they had so little spared at the assault of the rocke of Martos, and resolved together to kill king Ismael, and to place in the royall Seate of Granado, a Moore called Mahomet Aven Alhamar, or the Vermeil, who descended from the first king of Granado, and carried the same name, saying, that the Crowne belonged more rightly to him, then to Ismael, who was allyed to these kings only by the Mothers side. This king was called to this Councell, and they made a new confederacie with Ozmin, who should bee readie in Armes with his friends and seruants, whilest that Mahomet, sonne to the Gouvernour of Algezire, with his father, and another brother, should execute the murder vpon the person of king Ismael. These things being concluded, the Conspirators entred into Alhambra of Granado, and addreッシング themselves vnto him, they told him, that they had some matters of great importance to impart vnto him, desiring him to giue them audience in some retired place: the which the king willingly granted, who being entred into a gallerie, the father and the sonne marching before the king, and his brother after, with the great Prouost, or Constable of Granado, whome they called Alguazil Maior, the two foremost turned suddenly vpon the king, and gaue him two wounds vpon the head. The Alguazil seeing this disloyaltie, drew his sword to defend his king, and fought so valiantly against these two traitors, father and sonne, as hee made them giue backe vnto the end of the gallerie, and to enter into a chamber, into the which hee shut them, notwithstanding that the brother, who was the third murderer, had wounded him behind in foure places, who returning afterwards against the king, gaue him a mortall wound in the shoulder. The Alguazil hauing shut vp the two first, came against the third, and forced him to enter into an old cabinet, into the which he also shut him. Being thus freed of the traitors, this faithfull seruante came vnto the king, whom he found grievously wounded, and almost fainting, hauing taken him in his armes, and carried him into a chamber, in the which were his mother, widow to Ferrachen and his wiues, where leauing the cure and care of him to them, hee went into the pallace

Court of Alhambra, where as he found many, as well of the conspirators, as of others A which might haue heard the noyse, and vnderstood something of the fact, to whome hee sayd, there was no great danger, and that the kings wounds were light: and hauing called some vnto him, whom he knew faithfull vnto the king, he entred with them into those places where as the traytors were shut, and cut off their heads: then he returned into the chamber where as the king was in the Phisitions and Surgeons hands, but there was no hope of life: wherefore going out of Alhambra, he met with Ozmin, who came running at this noyse well accompanied, and asked him of the kings life. The Alguazil discerning the truth, answered, that all was well, intreating him to accompany him to seaze sembling those that were suspected to be of this conspiracie, the which Ozmin durst not re-puse: thus of a traytor he became faithfull by constraint, and running through the city B of Granado, they seazed vpon all the friends and seruants of the murthrer Mahumet, and brought them into Alhambra, where in the heate they were put to death. In the meane time king Ismael breathed his last, hauing reigned by force about nine yeares: this was in the yeare 1322. and the 705. of the Arabians.

Mahumet the sixt K. of Granado.

TO him succeeded his sonne Mahomet the sixt, by the meanes and dexteritie of the Prouost or Alquazil, who hauing seene the kings death, and keeping it as secret as he could, he gaue the Noblemen and Knights Granadins to vnderstand, that they should C shew themselves in armes before the castell, to receiue the Kings commandements, and namely Ozmin, who was not well assured in his conscience, but studied what hee should do: yet he came well followed. The Nobility being assembled, the Alguazil being faith-full to the king, euen after his death, taking the eldest of three sons (which he had left) in his armes, he went out of Alhambra, and declared the truth vnto the assembly, how the king had benne slaine by the treason of Mahumet, and what had followed, and presenting the child, who was but twelue yeares old, vnto the knights, hee recommended him vnto them, and perswaded them to acknowledge him for their lawfull king. Ozmin who was of greatest authority among them, was wonderfully perplext, and wauering in his discouries, yet thinking that he should rule this Infant better then any other, he was the first that D gaue his consent, saying, Mahumet is our king. His voyce was allowed by all that were present, and the brute both of Ismaels death, and of the election of Mahumet his sonne, was disperced through the town: and soone after the new king was led through the streets and shewed vnto the Granadins, who were discontented at this sudden change, as wel by reason of the King murthred, as of the hasty election of his sonne, beeing to young, yet it held good: but notwithstanding that this yong Mahumet obtained the Realme by a law full meanes, yet his end was miserable, being a familiar thing among the Arabians, one to spoyle and dispossesse another by wicked and cruell treasons, as a people alwaies void of all good gouernement. Such of the conspirators as were not taken, fled: among the which was Mahumet Aben-Alhamar, who in time returned to Granado, and reigned, as E we shall hereafter shew.

Nauarre.

What past in Naurre during the raigne of Philip the Long, who dyed about the time of these reuolutions in Granado, we find not any thing worth the relating: only mention is made of a Gouernor for the king in that Realme, called Ponce of Morentain, whome some terme Lord of Rosillon: others, Vicont of Anay, of Arnaud of Barbazan Bishop of Pampelona, D. Martin of Ayuar Standard-bearer of the Realme, D. Iuigo Peres de Re-da a Knight, D. John Arnaud of Elpeleta, of the Abbot of Lerin, of D. Martin Imenes of Vris, D. Pedro Ximenes of Mirafuentes, D. Garcia Martinez of Ollaquai, Diego Martinez of Vris, and Michel Martinez of Arleeta, knights, who made the Councell of state of that Realme.

Charles the Faire, the first of that name, and eight and twentieth King of Navarre.

TO King Philip, being dead at Fontainebleau without heires male, succeeded in the yeere of our Lord 1321. his brother Charles the Faire, in the two Realmes of France and Navarre, to the prejudice of his Neece Jeanne, the lawfull heire of Navarre. Charles when hee was farre from these successions, had put away Blanche his wife, being convicted of adultery, as hath beene sayd, whose lifewas faued, for that the marriage might bee dissolued without death, by the Popes authority, for that there was betwixt the husband and the wife a spiritual alliance, which had made the marriage unlawfull, so as by consequent there was no adultery, but simple fornication, for that Charles the Faire was Godfather to Blanche. Wherefore hee tooke to his second wife the daughter of Henry of Luxembourg Emperor, and sister to John King of Bohemia, having first demanded in marriage Donna Violant of Arragon, daughter to the King D. James the second, but could not obtaine her, for some reasons. In the beginning of King Charles his raigne, Ponce Morant being Gouvernor and Viceroy of the country, the castle of Gorriti was surprized by them of Guipuscoa from the Navarrais: for this and other considerations, the Gouvernor having raised an army of Navarrais and French, entred into Guipuscoa, being resolved to put the country to fire and sword: and beginning by Toloufa in Guipuscoa, he burned Beraategui, and did incredible harm, sparing neither holy nor prophane. Marching towards Beotiba, the Navarrais army was stayed at the foot of the mountaines by the Guipuscoans, who were gathered together to the number of eight hundred (some say eight thousand) in armes, vnder the conduct of Gil Lopes of Ognés, Lord of Larrea, and were seized vpon the Straights and places of advantage, where the army should passe, having planted some pealants vpon the tops of the rockes and precipices, who when the body of the army being advanced in these difficult passages, should march, they should roule downe pipes full of stones, which they had prepared, the which ouerthrew many, and besides put such a disorder in the army, as that eight hundred armed men which were vpon the passages, presented themselves, and put all their enemies to rout, with a wonderfull slaughter, and tooke all their baggage: the which was esteemed worth a hundred thousand liuers, a matter almost incredible, considering the inequality of their forces, but it is witnessed, not onely by the records of Guipuscoa, but also of Navarre, so dangerous is the hazard of warre, and so great an advantage doth the scituation of a country giue, when it is well chosen by a wife and expert captaine.

E Amongst the men of marke that were slaine in the Navarrais army, were found the Viceroy's brother, and D. Michel Sanchez Alauas, D. Martin of Roncal, Martin Pritz, the Lord of Rosobel, John Carboran of Leer, John Martines of Medrano, John Henriques, D. Martin de la Pegna, Pero Sotes, John Lopes of Vitos Merin Major of the Mountaine, Peter of Ayuar, Martin of Vrla sonne to Martin of Ayuar, who carried the Standard royal, and others to the number of fife and fifty knights. Amongst the prisoners was Martin of Ayuar and an other sonne of his. The number of souldiars that were slaine, was very great: and of this incounter they doe at this day sing songs, both in Castille and Guipuscoa, in their country language. Here of grew other warres betwixt Castille and Navarre.

F In the yeere of our Lord 1324. Queene Mary being dead, King Charles married the third time with Jeanne daughter to Lewis of France, Earle of Eureux, and sister to Philip of Eureux, who was King of Navarre soone after, by reason of his wife Jeanne, daughter to King Lewis Hutin, heire of Navarre. The same yeere Navarette of Pampelonne, by the permission of Charles, was begunne to be re-edified, having beene ruined eight and forty forty yeeres before by Robert Earle of Arthois. This King Charles the Faire, nor his A brother Philip the Long, neuer came into Nauarre, by reason whereof many grew insolent, especially vpon the frontiers, against the will of their Prince, the Gouernors, and Viceroyes winking at them, who regarded more their owne priuat profit and passions then the honour and seruice of their Maister; wherefore betwixt the Nauarrois and Arragonois, of the frontiers of Sanguessa Real, and other bordering places, notwithstanding any accord the Kings had made, there was still roades and spoyleing one of another, so as the Arragonois were forced to keepe great garrisons in those parts, where of the King of Arragon complained to King Charles, who commanded still that they should liue like neighbours and friends, but he was not obeyed.

In the yeere of our Lord 1328. King Charles died at Bois de Vincennes, hauing reigned seuen yeeres and some daies, leauing Queene Ieanne his wife with child, who was deliuered of a daughter, called Blanche, married afterwards to Philip Duke of Orleans, hee was buried at Saint Denis in France. After the death of this King, there were great quarrels and diuisions both in France and Nauarre. In France, for that during the Queenes being with child Edward King of England, sonne to Isabel of France, sister to the deceased King, maintained that the Government did belong to him: On the other side Philip sonne to Charles Earle of Valois, cousin germaine to the three last Kings, said that the regency did belong to him, as next heire to the crowne of France, which did not belong but to males descended of males, and was regent. The Queene being deliuered at Bois de Vincennes of a daughter, Philip, of Regent was proclaimed King, against the pretensions of Edward King of England, who was put by, vnder colour of the Salique law. Hereupon followed great and continuall warres, which had in a manner ruined France, if God had not releued it. These contented a doubtfull tide, which belonged to neither of them, if the crowne had fallne to the femal: for Ieanne daughter to King Lewis Hutin, did preceede them al.

The death of King Charles being knowne in Nauarre, this nation, which was accustomed to liue licentiously, for that they had not a long time seene the face of their Kings, thought now they had gotten liberty to doe what they pleased; so as they beganne to mutine and to raise seditions in all the townes of the realme. In the end they discharged their choller vpon the Iewes who were dispersed throughout the townes in great numbers, and very odious to the Christians, as well by reason of the diuersity of religion, as for their excessiue vsury, whereby they did exhaust al their substance: wherefore they beganne to spoile them in all places as enemies, at Estella, Viana, Funes, Matzilla and many other places, with so great cruelty, and greedinesse to get, as it is sayd they slue aboute tenne thousand persons of that sect, men, women and little children. To redresse which excessse, and to take away the cause, the Estates of Nauarre assembled at Puente la Reyna, to resolute without any respect, to whom the realme of Nauarre belonged, whether to Edward King of England or to D. Ieanne Countesse of Eux. The Estates were referred to Pampelone, the chiefe towne of the Realme, whereas their opinions were diuers, many holding that King Edward should haue the Realme of Nauarre, as grandchild (borne of the daughter) to Queene Ieanne, daughter to King Henry, rather then the Countesse of Eux, in regard of the sex: others, and with more reason, held for the Countesse, who was in the same degree, but daughter to a sonne, and heire to Queene Ieanne; and prevailed, drawing the rest to their opinion.

3 Thus was Ieanne Countesse of Eux declared the true and lawfull Queene of Nauarre, in the yeere of our Lord 1328. the realme hauing beene vacant aboute four months. And vntill that she and Count Philip her husband, should come and take possession of the Realm, they declared Regent and Viceroy D. Iohn Corboran of Lect, Standard-bearer of the realme, and Iohn Martines of Medrano.

Philip

Philip the third of that name, the nine and twentieth King of Nauarre.

Philip Earle of Eux, sonne to Lewis of France, who was sonne to Philip the third, sonne to the King Saint Lewis, is counted by vs for the nine and twentieth King of Nauarre, the third of that name, and was furnished the noble. As soone as the Election was made by the Estates of Nauar, they sent Ambassadors to Ph. of Valois the French King, to let him vnderstand the reasons that the King elected had vnto the realme, which had moued the Estates to make this election; and by the same Ambassadors they aduertised Philip of Eux and Ieanne his wife thereof, summoning them to come and take possession of the realme, and to gouerne it. The French King did no way hinder it, wherefore the Kings of Nauarre elect prepared for their voyage, and arriued there about the beginning of the yeere of our Lord 1329. hauing not seene a King in their country of a long time. The Prelats, Knights and wife men of the realme before their coming, had set downe in writing the conditions whereto they would receiue them in the luccession of the realme, the which before the solemnities of the coronation and soth, they presented vnto Philip and to Ieanne his wife, the which they yeelded willingly vnto. The Estates being assembled at Pampelone, these conditions were sworne by C them, whereof the principal Articles were.

Articles sworn by the Kings
of Nauarre.

- 1 First to the Estates to maintaine and keepe the rights, lawes, customes, liberties and preiudges of the Realme, both written and not written, and whereof they were in possession, to them and their successors for euer, and not to diminish, but rather augment them.
- 2 That they should disanull all that had beene done to the preiudice thereof by the Kings their Predecessours, and by their Ministers, without delay, notwithstanding any let.
- 3 That for the terme of twelue yeeres to come, they should not coine any money, but such as was then currant within the Realme, and that during their liues they should not coine aboute one sort of new money, and that they should distribute part of the reuenues, profits and commodities of the realme vnto the subiects.
- 4 That they should not receiue into their seruice aboute foure strangers, but should employ them of the country.
- 5 That the forts and garrisons of the realme, should bee giuen to gentlemen borne and dwelling in the Country, and not to any stranger: who should doe homage to the Queene, and promise for to hold them for her, and for the lawfull heire of the countie.
- 6 That they should not exchange nor ingage the realme for any other Estat whatsoever.
- 7 That they should not sell nor ingage any of the reuenues of the crowne, neither should make any law nor statute against the realme, nor against them that should lawfully succeed therein.
- 8 That to the first sonne which God should giue them, comming to the age of twenty yeeres, they should leaue the Kingdome free and without factions, vpon condition that the Estates should pay vnto them for their experiences a hundred thousand Saneches (which was a peece of gold then currant) or in other French money equivalent.
- 9 That if God gaue them no children, in that case they should leaue the realme after them free, with the forts, in the hands of the Estates, to inueit them to whom by right it should belong.
- 10 That if they infringe any of these Articles, or any part of them, the subiects should bequit of their oath of subiection which they ought them.

These Articles being promised and sworne by the King and Queene, they were solemnly crowned, and the Deputies of the Estates, Noblemen and Officers of the crowne tooke tooke their oath of obedience, in the Cathedral church of Pampelone. And afterwards A there were orders set downe by the King and Queene for the Government of the Realme: the which being written were sent into France, and confirmed by King Philip of Valois at Paris the same yeere of our Lord 1329. After that time the French Kings had no command in Nauarre, hauing held that realme eight and fifty yeeres vnto the crowne of France: yet King Philip of Valois retained of the inheritance of his cousin, the Countesse of Bry, and a while after hee gaue them other lands in exchange, yet not of that value.

Philip and Jeanne King of Nauarre had these children following, Charles who succeeded in the realme, Philip Earle of Longueuille, Lewis Earle of Beaumont le Royer, and afterwards Duke of Duras, Jeanne married to the vicon of Rohan, Mary Queene of Arragon, wife to D. Pedro the ceremonious, Blanche Queene of France, last wife to Philip of Valois, and Agnes Countesse of Foix married to Gaston Phibus: some of which were borne before their Election, and some after. Lewis the third sonne of this marriage was Earle of Beaumont in Normandie, for that he married the heire of that house, by whom he had one sonne called Charles of Beaumont, who married the daughter of the Vicon of Maulcon in Nauar, and was the first Standard-bearer of the realm, through the fauour of King Charles his vncl. Of this Charles of Beaumont is descended the house of Beaumont in Nauarre. After the death of the Countesse of Beaumont, Lewis married Jeanne daughter and heire to the Duke of Duras, vpon the coast of Macedonia, towards the Adriatique sea, and was intitled Duke.

These things being done in Nauarre, King Philip being aduertised that the French King marched with a mighty army against the Flemings rebelled, who had chased away Lewis their Earle, and committed many insolencies against the Kings Officers, both in words and deeds: he parted out of Nauarre, being loath to faile him at need who had so kindly suffred him to take possession of the Realme, leauing the Queene D. Jeanne to gouerne Nauarre. He was present at the batraile which King Philip of Valois gaue the Flemings at Cassel, whereas twenty thousand were slaine vpon the place: by means whereof Count Lewis was restored to his Estate, and the Flemings subdued. This warre being ended, the King of Nauarre returned into his realme: It was then that the Infant D. Alphonso de la Cerda, sonne to D. Fernand, eldest sonne to King D. Alphonso the Astrologuer, being ill intreated in Castille, where he pretended the crowne, made a donation vnto the crowne of Nauarre, of the rights which he pretended in Guipulcoa, Alaua, Rioja and other lands, the which had in former times belonged to Nauarre, and were usurped and retained by the Kings of Castille. Some asseme that this donation was made in the yeere of our Lord 1330. But howsoeuer, King Philip desirous to do Iustice, & to gouerne his Realme wel, which had great need, and therefore was necessary to entertaine peace with his neighbours, made no great account thereof at that time, but sent Ambassadors to D. Alphonso then reigning in Castille, to seeke his friendship. The Ambassadors found the King at Talauera la Reyna, who entertained them well. Their Ambassage was, that the Realme hauing many yeeres wanted the Soueraigne Magistrate, and in a manner abandoned by their Kings, it was no wonder if many things had happened contrarie to the ancient alliances betwixt the houses of Castille and Nauarre, for what did the Viceroyes and Gouernours care, being strangers (hauing no resemblance of manners, nor other bond of friendship with the Spaniards) how all things went so as they were obeyed in the country, and that they might vaunt they had rather done wrong, then receiued any keeping continuall garisons of strangers, ready to commit any insolencies: whereof God had some times shewed his Iudgement, euen in the last encounter neere vnto Beotibar: where by an extraordinary and miraculous punishment, God had chastised the negligence of the foure last Kings, which had held the realme of Nauarre, who had respected it so little as they had scarce looked towards it, yea the two last neuer came neere it, which had made the bad to grow more insolent, and so to continue, vntill that the lawfull heires of the crowne of Nauarre were come to their possession, by the decease of King Charles the Faire, Philip Earle of Euerux, husband

A husband to their true Queene D. Jeanne, being called to raigne, who had sent this Ambassage vnto him, to let him vnderstand these things, as a neighbour Prince and friend, with whom they desired to entertaine peace and friendship, by all good offices which Princes and neighbour Estates may receiue one from another.

The King D. Alphonso hauing heard this Ambassage, fitted vnto the desires of the new Kings of Nauarre, moderating the things which had past betwixt these two realms, before their Election, answered, that hee was glad the Nauarrois had had meanes to recover them for their Kings, to whom the crowne did by right belong, and that for his part he desired to entertaine a perpetuall friendship with King Philip and Queene Jeanne, and to shew it by the effects in any occasion that should be offered, wherewith he would acquaint his subiects, to the end their Kings vassals, both Nauarrois and French, should be well intreated in Castille, and if any wrong were done them, it should be repaired: and that they should aduertise their Kings on his behalfe, to doe the like in their countries. The Ambassadors returning with this answer, gaue great contentment to King Philip, who to administer Iustice, erected a new Court of Parliament in Nauarre, the which was called New to distinguish it from the Old, hee and the three Estates of the realme naming men, worthy of that charge. The like Ambassage was sent by him into Arragon and Portugal, who were returned with pleasing answers. Matters being thus settled in a better Estate then before, the King and Queene returned into France, leauing for Gouernor a French gentleman, called Henry of Guliac, or of Solibert; but C with a more limyted power then former Viceroyes and Gouernours. Such was the Estate of Nauarre vnto the yeere 1331.

Letvs now returne to the History of Arragon, the which we haue left at the new conquest of Sardinia, in the which soone after the departure of the Infant D. Alphonso they set to rebellion, beginning in the towne of Sassari, the which is one of the greatest of the Island, by the faction of them of the house and family of Oria, great and mighty Lords, especially in that towne, whereof the chiefe were Francequin, Mastin, Branca, and Vinciguerra, all of the family of Oria. These with their partisans hauing sought many meanes to expell the garrison of Arragonois which was at Sassari, in the end they rebelled openly, and by their example, and vpon the first opportunity, the Pisans holding the city and castile of Cagliari, seemed to haue a desire to doe the like: whereof the King of Arragon being aduertised, he neglected all other desires, and thought of the preservation of this Island, which hee had subdued with great charge and losse: and for the which and for that of Corsica, hee was bound to pay vnto the Pope and to the Sea of Rome, an excessive tribute of two thousand markes of siluer, and to entertaine a certaine number of souldiers for the defence of the church.

The decease of D. Sancho King of Majorca without children, had made him desirous to ioyne the Islands and the Siegneuries which he had enjoyed vpon the firme land to his crowne of Arragon, wherefore he had sent the Infant D. Alphonso into the counties of Rossillon and Cerdagne, with forces to seize thereon, but he was so careful of the affaires of Sardinia, as he did easily incline to the request which D. Philip, brother to the deceased King of Majorca, made in fauour of his Nephew D. James, sonne to the Infant D. Fernand, brother, who as wee haue sayd died Prince of Morea: wherefore the realme of Majorca, and the succession of the King D. Sancho was left vnto this D. James being yet very young, except the right of Soueraignty. Being now forced to send an army into Sardinia, to his great charge, the Pope was intreated by the Infant D. Pedro (who was sent Ambassador expressly to that end by the king his father) being at Auiignon, to abate this tribute to five hundred markes, and to exempt him from the moiety of the souldiers pay, wherevnto he was liable by reason of the same contract, and for the sayd Islands, for the defence of the territories of the church. The Infant D. Pedro was courteously receiued by the Pope, and fauourably heard in the consistory, where he obtained abatement of halfe the tribute and of the souldiers pay for tenne yeeres, and moreouer to receiue the tithes for two yeeres.

In the meane time the King D. James armed twelue gallies in Cattelogne, and sent the before to Sardinia, vnder the charge of Bernard Celsuade, to assist the Arragonois, and and others that held for him in the Island: Barnabo who had beene faithfull to the King. A of Arragon, was now dead, whose children Cassan, Galtor, Geoffroy and Brancalen, threw themselves enemies vnto him, and so in like manner did Federic, Azon and Iohn Malefina, Marquises, who were rich and of great power in Sardinia: Norwithstanding that their vnclcs Christian Spinola, entertained the friendship of the King D. James, and was acceptable vnto him. These men by a general conspiracy, had taken armes, in fauour of an army which the Pisane and the Gibiline faction of Genoa did raise to send into Sardinia, the which was newly increased by two and twenty Genoua gallies, which had beene first entertained by Frederic King of Sicile, making warre against Robert King of Naples, of the which Gasper d' Oria was General, who afterwards leauing the party of the Arragonois and Sicilians, and carrying away the King D. Fredericks money, hee ioyned with the Pisans, who made him Admiral of all the fleet. Then beganne there cruel warres betwixt the Cattelans and Geneuiois, whom Francisco Carrofo, General of the Gallies of Arragon, and a sworne enemy to that nation, did punish severely when as he tooke any one of their Pirates. Having imbarcked certaine troupes of old fouldiers, Arragonois and Cattelans, he came and presented himselfe before the port of Cailieri, about the end of August, in the yeere 1325. and held the city and fort as it were besieged.

Estates of Arragon.

This yeere the Estates were called at Sarragossa in Arragon, where were present D. Pedro de Luna, Archbishop of Sarragossa, D. Sancho de Arragon the Kings brother, Don Cornel, D. Pero Martinez de Luna, D. Blasco de Verga, D. Iohn Ximenes of Vitrea, Don Symon de Foffes, Don Raymond de Pezau, Don Martin Gil of Atrofil, Don Gombald Tramsasset, Don William Entenza, Don Michel Peres Gortorio, Don Gil Garces of Atrofil, Don Michel Gurrea, Don Blasco Mazza de Celles, Don Symon Peres de Punia, Don Artorella of Ortis, Don Garcia Peres penna acuta, D. Pedro Ruis de Sagra, D. Ponce Ignes Entenza, D. Lope Ximenes de Luna, D. Pedro de Laino, D. Michel Peres Zapata, with other Noblemen and Knights that were present, and the Deputies of D. Blasco de Alagon, of D. Lopes de Luna, of D. Alphonso Fernand of Ixar, and others absent, and the Deputies of the townes and commonalties hauing any place in the sayd Estates. There D. Pedro, sonne to the Infant D. Alphonso, was sworne presumptiue heire, and successor to the crowne, after the decease of the Grandfather and father: the which was then decreed and practised, for that Don Pedro Earle of Ribagorça and Ampurias did maintaine that if his brother D. Alphonso should die before their father, the realme did belong to him by right of Proximity, wherefore he refused then to sweare vnto his Nephew, but hee did afterwards. There the Articles of the generall priuiledges were confirmed, the which had beene accorded and sworne by the deceased King Don Pedro, and it was ordained for a law, that no free man should be put to the racke, and that confiscations should not be allowed, but in cases of coynying, and high treason.

The young King of Majorca being vnder the Gouernment of his vncl D. Philip, E was there made sure to Don Constance of Arragon, daughter to the Infant Don Alphonso, hee beinge eleuen yeeres old, and she but fiue: these were the chiefe actes of this assembly.

The Pisans army, led by Gasper d' Oria, approaching neere vnto the Gulph of Cailieri, whereas Francisco Carrofo laye with the army of Arragon, there was a cruel and dangerous battaile for the looser, for their rests were vp: but the Arragonois were victors, who by this memorable victory, tooke a part of the towne of Caillieri, called Stampace; being assailed at sea by Francisco Carrofo, and at Land by Raymond de Sealarra. Soone after there fell so dangerous a sedition betwixt the Land and seaforces of the Arragonois, as both captaines and fouldiers ranne like madde men one vpon another with greater obstinacy then against their enemies, and many were cruelly slaine: so as this rage had in a manner ruined the Arragonois Estate in that Island, but God had otherwise decreed: for the Pisans being very weake, and brought low with the long precedent warres, which they had sustained both against the Geneuiois and Arragonois, did quit the Island of Sardinia, by an agreement made betwixt the King Pisanes quite the Island of Sardinia.

A King of Arragon, and their Senat, in the yeere of our Lord 1326: so as the towne of Saffari was yielded to the Arragonois, the Marquis of Malapina succeding, and promising to be obedient to the King and his Liegeaus. Thus the Kings of Arragon became Lords of Sardinia without contradiction, for a time: but in their owne country of Cattelogne, and Valencia, there wanted no troubles and quarrels, which grew amongst the Nobles of the country, beinge an extraordinary thing, that whereas there is great store of idle Nobilitie; there is alwaies warre and contention; to the oppression of the people. In the yeere of our Lord 1327, Arnold Roger Earle of Palliers, and Raymond Folch Vicount of Cardona, went then in armes one against another, by reason of a murder committed on the person of D. William Queral, whereof the Earle of Palliers was accused, and either of them hauing a great troupe of friends and Partisans, held all Cattelogne in confusion; with their horrible insolencies. In the country of Valencia, D. James, Lord of Xerica, was in quarrell with his owne mother, D. Beatrice of Loriz, and would haue put her out of her lands and possessions, so as this quarrel did in a manner diuide the King and his sonne D. Alphonso, the one supporting the mother, and the other the sonne. These quarrels were reconciled with much paine: for when as the Soueraigne Magistrate doth meddle in his subjects quarrels, and of a Iudge becomes a Partisan, his authority leanes to the one side, and the remedies are more difficult, and lesse effectuell. D. James of Xerica, during these troubles, married the widowe Queene of D. Sancho of Majorca, whose name was Mary, sister to Robert King of Naples, a woman of an vnchast life. In the yeere of our Lord 1327. Don James the Young of Majorca did homage for the Islands, and Land which hee held, as well in Cattelogne, as on this side the mountaines to the King of Arragon, as to his foweraigne, in the presence of Don Philip his vncl and Tutor, Don Pedro and Don Raymond Berenger, the Kings children, Casten of Moncade, Bishoppe of Huelca, and many others: and within few daies after Don James King of Arragon died in the towne of Barcelona, hauing reigned fixe and thirty yeeres, foure monthes and a halfe. A Prince rather inclined to good then bad, to whom learning and learned men owe the foundation of the Vniuersitie of Lerida; in Cattelogne, seuen and twenty yeeres before his death, which hee endowed with many preuiledges, and would haue that alone throughout all his dominions, forbidding all other schooles but for Grammer and Logicke. His bodie lies buried in the Monastery of Santa Cruz.

The two sides should be reconciled, as a Judge and not a Partisan in his subjects quarrels.

D. Alphonso the fourth of that name, the twelfth King of Arragon.

E On Alphonso his sonne, succeeded him, to whom was giuen the surname of pittifull. Hee was not the eldest, but that Don James his eldest brother, quitting in his fathers life time, the succession of the crowne of Arragon, as wee haue said, entered and inserted himselfe into that Order of Knights of Saint Iohn of Ierusalem: Hee was King.

This was his issue. During his fathers life, hee married first Donna Theresa of Entenza, Countesse heire of Virgell, by whom hee had the Infant Don Pedro, borne at seuen monthes end, who was King, and the Infant Don James Earle of Virgell and Vicount of Ajar, and moreouer foure other sonnes and one daughter, who died verie yong, and are interred at Sarragossa in Saint Francis Church with their mother Donna Constance, who was wife vnto Don James the last King of Majorca. Donna Theresa had not the title of a Queene, for that shee died foure daies before the King Don James her father in lawe. Being King, hee tooke to his second wife, Donna Leonora of Castille, daughter to the King Don Fernand the fourth, who was mother to Don Fernand Marquise of Tortosa, who married at Eborra, Donna Maria of Portugal, daughter Genealogy of Arragon.

Don John Manuel revolted against his King and country, by reason of the disloyalty A voted to D. John the blinde, and allied himselfe with the Kings of Arragon and Granada, being the more incensed with the newes hee had, that the King treated a marriage with the Infanta of Portugal, leauing his daughter D. Constance Manuel, to whom hee was made sure, as we haue sayd. The Infanta was called Mary, and was daughter to King D.
Alphonso, who had in the yeere of our Lord 1325, succeeded King Denis his father in the realme of Portugal, and of D. Beatrice of Castile, sister to the King D. Fernand the fourth, so as she was cousin Germaine to his future Spouse.

Portugal.

Genealogy of Portugal.

8 THIS D. Alphonso of Portugal was surnamed the braue, for that he was valiant and generous. He was about five and thirty yeeres old, when hee beganne to reigne, and had bene made sure to D. Beatrice, being but eight yeeres old, and was married at the age of sixteen. They had many children, whereof Alphonso, Dennis and Iohn the young; then they had D. Pedro, who was King after his father, Donna Maria, of whose C marriage with King D. Alphonso of Castile, we haue begunne to speake, and D. Leonna or Eluira, who was wife to D. Pedro the Ceremonious, King of Arragon. This King
D. Alphonso had bene very turbulent in his fathers life time, maintayning certain rebbels against him: yet being come vnto the crowne, hee became vertuous, and a great fauourer of Iustice, making many good lawes, and governing his realme wisely: yet hee had great quarrels with D. Alphonso Sanchez his bastard brother, to the great oppression of his subiects: for Don Alphonso Sanchez was a braue knight, and could well defend himselfe, hauing the fauour of the Castilians, and of the King of Arragon, who sought many meanes to reconcile them, but in vaine. The subiects of their quarrels was onely ielousie, conceiued in the heart of King D. Alphonso, for that King Denis D their father had loued this bastard exceedingly. But in the end the King was Maister, neuer ceasing vntill he had chased him into Castile, after which he confiscated his goods, and proceeded against him by course of Iustice.

Castille.

Dukes, Mar-
quises and Earles are hereditary in Spaine.

9 During the treaty of marriage betwixt D. Maria of Portugal and D. Alphonso King of Castile, D. John Manuel, with the helpe of the Arragonois and Granadins, be-ganne to ouerrunne the territories of Castile, from Almanza vnto Pegasus, ruining, burning and spoyling all they encountered: Then did the King make his well-beloued fauorite and counsellor, D. Aluar Nunez Osorio, Earle of Translamar, Lemos and E Sarrica, and Lord of Riuiera and Cabrera, for in those daies there was no Earldome hereditary in Castile nor Leon, and hereof Spaine doth yet retainne those maiesties of antiquity, that the children of Noblemen carrying the titles of Dukes, Marquises or Earles (which were all personall and temporall dignities) dare not take them after the decease of their fathers, without a new permission from the King, except some which haue that right by priuilege.

Murder of Garciado de La Vega.

Hee did this to oppose him to D. John Manuel, against whom hee sent D. Garci-do de la Vega, whilst that hee remained at Cordoua, and prepared for his future marriage with the Infanta of Portugal: Don Garciado comming to Soria, was ill recei-ued, for the Nobility hauing had a false aduertisement that hee was comethether to be carried many Knights prisoners, they murdered him in Saint Francis Church, being at Masse with his people. These were the fruites of the Infidelity which F King had vsed against Don John the Blinde, a Prince of his owne blood, by reason whereof euerie one grewe very ielous both of him, and of his priuate seruants. This murder did much displease the King, and incensed him against Don John Manuel more then before.

Hee

A Hee came to Toledo, where hauing assembled great forces, hee went and besieged Eicalona. D. John Manuel on the other side laid siege to Huete, but neither of them preuailed. The marriage with the Infanta of Portugal was in the end concluded, and moreouer D. Blanche, daughter to the deceased D. Pedro of Castile, the Kings vic-cle, was accorded to the Infant D. Pedro of Portugal. Pope Iohn being aduertised of the result of Castile, gaue charge to Don Pedro of Toledo, Bishop of Carthagen, newly made Cardinal, to mediate a peace in the realme, interposing his Apostolike authority: but hee labored in vaine; for hee found the King so incensed, as hee would not heare of any composition with his subiects, giuing the Cardinal probable reasons: wherefore hee made his report vnto the Pope, and discharged himselfe of his B commission.

During these troubles, D. Fernand Rodriguez of Bilbao; Prior of Saint Iohn, a great friend to Don John Manuel, caused the cities of Toro and Zamora to rebell against the King, saying that it was by reason hee had aduanced D. Aluar Nunez Osorio to the dignity of an Earle: the towne of Vaileddolit did the like, whereas Ioseph of Ecceia a few intending generall of the imposts, had like to haue bene slaine. Hereupon the King left the siege of Eicalona; and came to Vaileddolit where the inhabitants, being animated by the Prior of Saint Iohn, shut the gates against him: yet being come to a parle with Don Iohn Martines de Leyua, Iohn Velez of Gueuara, Fernand Ladrón of Rioja, and Rais Diaz his brother, Pero Rodriguez of Villega, and Garciado de la Vega, sonne to him that had bene slaine at Soria: these knights and others wrought so, as C the King dismissed the Earle Don Aluar Nunez, and so was receiued into the towne; and by the same meanes hee made a composition with Toro and Zamora, from thence hee went to Ciudad Rodrigo, to celebrate his marriage.

Seeking for to retire out of Don Aluar's hands, the forces which hee had giuen vnto him in charge, hee could not recover them all, and moreouer Don Aluar, being discontented with this disgrace, hee presently went and ioyned with Don John Ma-nuell: whereupon the King was aduised to kill him: And seeking a murderer, and a fit occasion, hee found a man furnished with the qualities of a disloyall Courtier:
this was Rasmyr Flores de Guzman, who notwithstanding that hee had bene a verie D great friend to the Earle, offered to dispatch him, vpon the great promises which the King made him: wherefore sayning to bee in disgrace with him hee went vnto the Earle, by whom being well entertained, luying and lying together, hee had meanes and opportunity to kill him: whilst that the King did celebrate his marriage in Alfayates, and did capitulate with D. Alphonso King of Portugal, who came in person to Font Grimald.

The Court being come neere to Medina del Campo, the King was aduertised of the death of Count Aluar, to iustifie the which hee caused his processe to bee made, and condemned him himselfe sitting in the seat of Iustice at Tordehumos: hee caused his body to be burned, and his goods to bee confiscated as a traitor, whereof Ramis Flores E of Guzman had for his reward, and the price of his friends blood, which he had shed, the castle of Beluer, and the towne of Caberos. These are commonly the fauours of the best beloued Courtiers, which abuse the familiarity of their Kings, or relie to much thereon. King Don Alphonso perceiving the misery whereinto hee did runne, desired to make a peace with Don John Manuel, but hee laboured in vaine, for the Prior of Saint Iohn vndid all that hee could doe.

The same yeere, being the yeere of our Lord 1329, the marriage which had bene treated some monethes before, betwixt Don Alphonso King of Arragon and D. Leonora of Castile, sister to this King Don Alphonso of Castile, was celebrated at Tarassone, Arragon.
F whereas both Kings met, being accompanied by many Princes, Princesses, Prelates and Knights, and the Ambassadors of Don Alphonso King of Portugal. There was the league renewed betwixt the three Estates of Castile, Arragon and Portugal, and decreed not to receiue one an others Rebels, promising withall to assist the King of Castile in his warres against the Moores, with the forces of Arragon and Portugall Tt 3 what what issue came of this marriage wee haue before related, when as D. Leonora saw her A selfe mother to Don Fernand her first sonne, which was at the end of the yeere, beefing desirous hee should succeed the King his father, theee fought by all meanes to shewe her selfe a stepmother to Don Pedro, her husbands sonne by his first wife, but hee finding it, hee kept himselfe farre off during his fathers life. Don Pedro for his part was of a rough and fowert disposition.

As soone as the Infant D. Fernand was borne, the King his father gaue him the Marquisate of Tortose and Albarazin, contrary to the Edit and law of Daroca, whereof wee haue made mention, whereas the Estates were much discontented, and with them the Infant D. Pedro, Don Pedro de Luna, Archbishop of Saragossa, Don Michel Gurrea, who was at it were Governour of the Realme, a dignity which they were wont B to giue to the eldest Princes of Arragon, Don Pedro and Symon Gurrea brethren:
this last was Abbot of Montarragon, Vidal of Villanoua, Garcia de Leris, Michel Zapate, and other Noblemen: yet they were forced to haue patience, for D. Alphonso King of Arragon suffered himselfe to bee wholly governed by D. Leonora: this was the first subiect of hatred betwixt D. Pedro and her.

Castile.

The King of Castile being much discontented for the death of D. Garcilaso de la Vega, came presently after his marriage to his aunt being at Soria, where causing informations to bee made against the murderers hee condemned the guiltie to death, and did confiscate their goods. Hee assembled the Estates of all his realmes at Madrid, of whom hee obtained a guilt of great summes of Maraudis of gold, to make C warre against the Moores, who that yeere had sodainly taken the towne of Priego.
D. John Manuel, as well for the marriage betwixt the King of Arragon, and the Infanta of Castile, as for that his wife, sister to the King of Arragon, was newly dead, lost his support on that side: yet hee married againe with D. Blanche, daughter to the Infant
D. Fernand de la Cerde, younger brother to D. Alphonso de la Cerde, cousin to D. John Nugnes de Lara, which de Lara married at the same time the daughter of D. John blinde, the heire of Biscay, who was yet at Bayone, whether shee had bene conuied, when her father was slaine, her name was Mary.

The King being prest to resist the Inuasions of the Moores, hee found meane to make a peace with Don John Manuel, to whom hee restored Donna Constance his daugh- D ter, whom hee had kept in the castle of Toro, and graunted vnto him certaine other conditions, whereby hee pacified the intestine troubles of the realme. Being at Val-ledolir, hee caused Joseph of Eccia, the Jew, to yeeld an account of the reuenues of his customes, and for that there had bene great complaints made of him, hee tooke that charge from him, ordaining that from thenceforth it should bee discharged by Christians, with the title of Treasurers, and not of Customers.

In the yeere of our Lord 1330. the Kings of Castile and Portugal, meeting at Font Grimald, renewed their alliances and leagues, and did capitulate a new, that the King of Portugal should assist him of Castile, with six hundred horse for the Moores of warre: and then was a marriage celebrated betwixt Don Pedro the Infant of Por- E tugal, and Donna Blanche daughter to Don Pedro of Castile. The Rendezvous for the Christians army was appointed at Cordoua, whether the King came with his hundred horse Portugois: led by the maister of the troupes of the Order of Christus: so as all things being ready they laied siege to Thiebe Hardales.

Moores.

Mahumet King of Granado, who kept himselfe in a manner alwaies in the castle of Alhambra, gaue the whole conduct of the warre to Ozmin, who hauing taken Pruna by treason came and lodged with six thousand horse, and good troupes of foote at Tuchiron, three leagues from Thiebe, seeking by his continuall alarmes to diuert the Christians seage, making daylie skirmishes about the riuer of Guadathiebe, which was the common watering of both armies: notwithstanding all this, the Christians continued their battery, and the towne was valiantly defended by the Inhabitants, who burned F
the Engines of battery with wilde fire, and did frustrate many of the assaillants attempts.
In the end Ozmin desirous to raise the seage, hee resolved to charge the campe with this pollicie. He diuided his army into two, and sent three thousand horses farre about, and by

Str. 1227m
of Ozmin.

A by covered places, to charge the Christian army behind, or in flanke, vpon signe giuen, whilst that he with the other three thousand, and his footmen did set vpon them in front, thinking that the whole armie would make head against him, and that whilst they were in fight, the rest falling vpon them with great cries, should amaze them, and easily disorder them: but hee layed in this disservice: for the king of Castile being aduertised by his spies, that part of the Moores army was disbanded, and that the rest came against him, hee appointed a good squadron of horse to defend the reere, and he with the rest went to incounter Ozmin, whom hee fought withall and repulsed, and had defeated him, if the three thousand horse, which hee had sent to charge the armie behind, had not turned head, (finding all things in good order) and come in time to succour Ozmin, which was the B cause hee was not wholly defeated. Whilst they were in fight, the king sent two thousand horse to assaile the Moores campe, and to spoyle their baggage, the which they effected, bringing away many prisoners.

This ill-succeeding enterprize was poorly repayed the next day by the Moores, who sue about fifty fouldiers whom they found disbanded about the riuer, and this was all:
wherefore they retired, and the seage was continued: and then the Moores being out of hope of succours, yeelded to haue their liues saued. Afterwards Priego and Lagnera were yeelded, and the forts of Cuenas and Ortexica recouered, which had bene abandoned by the Moores.

With these victories king D. Alphonso returned to Seuille, being much incensed against Don John Manuel, who had still secret intelligence with the king of Granado, and being ill affected to D. Alphonso, had not stirred during the seage, notwithstanding that hee had promised to assaile the Moores towards Murcia, neither was hee much contented with the Portugois, who left him almost at the beginning of the seage of Thiebe, and returned to their houses. By reason of these infidelities, hee resolved to haue peace with the king of Granado, who sought it and accepted what hee offered to haue peace with the king of Castile, who should pay him twelve thousand doubions of yearly tribute, and do him homage for his Realme of Granado, so as he might be allowed to draw victuals out of the Christians country, paying the twentieth penny.

The king D. Alphonso being at Seuille without any cares of warre, he gaue him-
D selfe to the long sought loue of Donna Leonora of Guzman, daughter to Don Pero Nug- nes de Guzman, who had bene wife to Don John de Vela, whom hee enioyed. This Lady (who had not her like for beautie in all Spaine) did so gouerne him, as hee did not any thing but by her will, excusing himselfe that the Queene Donna Maria, whom hee had married but two yeeres before, had no children. Being come from Seuille to Xeres of Ba-dajoz, to visit Queene Elizabeth his Grand-mother, Dowager of Portugall, being yet aliue, hee found there by chance the Infant D. Alphonso de la Cerde, that came out of France, who kist his hand and yeelded vnto him the right which he pretended to the Realmes of Castile and Leon, the which hee had long disputed but in vaine. He had the same yeere (as some hold) yeelded to Philip king of Nauarre, the interest which hee had or might pretend E asking of Castile, to Alaua, Rioja, Guipulcoa, and other lands adjacent, of the ancient patrimony of Nauarre. The king of Nauarre in recompence gaue him certaine places and pensions, to entertayne his estate, and so they continued good friends. This D. Alphonso de la Cerde had married a Lady in France of the blood Royall, named Maisade, by whom hee had two sonnes, Don Lewis and Don John: this last was Earle of Angoulesme, and Constable of France, during the raigne of King John, whom the Historiies of France, cal Don John of Spaine. Thus Don Alphonso was provided for, being issued from the eldest sonne of D. Alphonso the Learned. Don John Manuel the king, seeing that it was now time to liue in peace, employed Donna Leonora of Guzman, to bring him into fauour, the which hee obtained, yet was it not wholly to his content. This Lady was deliuered in F the yeere 1331. of a sonne by the king, who was named Don Pedro, and to whom the king assigned for a perpetuall inheritance, Aguilar del campo, and many other reue-nues.

11 In those times they of the Prouince of Alaua, had a custome to chosse a Lord, vnder the souerainety of Castile, who did gouerne, and enioyed the reuenues which were
